Regulator Says Civil Suit Likely For Raines (WP)

By Terence O'hara, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Fannie Mae's top regulator yesterday said it is "more than likely" the federal government will sue former chief executive Franklin D. Raines and other former company officers, seeking to recover bonuses and salary and perhaps impose fines for the mortgage finance company's accounting debacle.

While Fannie Mae paid a $400 million government fine in May for violating myriad accounting rules and overstating its profit by more than $10 billion from 2000 to 2004, as yet no action has been taken against Raines and his former chief financial officer, J. Timothy Howard.

"We will more than likely be filing litigation against them," Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight Director James Lockhart told reporters after delivering a speech at the American Enterprise Institute. It was the strongest statement yet of the regulatory agency's intent to seek financial penalties against former Fannie Mae officials or try to claw back tens of millions of dollars in bonuses paid to the two men on the basis of what turned out to be inaccurate information about company earnings.

When asked if action was likely against Raines or Howard, Lockhart said, "They are the top two," according to an account by the Associated Press.

Lockhart declined to comment on his remarks, though a spokesman yesterday confirmed their accuracy.

Lawyers for Raines and Howard yesterday declined to comment. In past statements, lawyers for the two men have said they did nothing improper.

Lockhart's agency has power to lodge only civil or administrative complaints. The Securities and Exchange Commission is also weighing civil action against former Fannie Mae executives. The Justice Department last month said it had closed its criminal investigation of the company's accounting scandal, though it is looking at whether Raines and Howard committed perjury in congressional testimony about Fannie's accounting practices.

One lawyer with knowledge of the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to publicly speculate on OFHEO's intentions, said the agency could file a lawsuit before the end of the year. One thing OFHEO may be waiting on: the completion of a mandatory investigation by Fannie's independent directors to determine whether the company itself should sue Raines, Howard or others. The results of that investigation are due at the end of next month.

Such strong statements from Lockhart are not new. In May, after his agency and the announced the $400 million fine against Fannie Mae, Lockhart took aim at the $52.8 million in bonuses Raines received during the six years the company used improper accounting.

In addition, since neither Raines nor Howard were technically fired by the company when the accounting improprieties came to light in 2004, both men took home millions of dollars in severance payments, and Raines received retirement pay of $114,000 a month for the rest of his life.

Fannie Mae, based in the District, is a congressionally chartered private company that provides ready cash to the home mortgage market by purchasing mortgages from lenders. Fannie Mae keeps some loans on its own books but sells most to investors in the form of securities. It is one of the country's biggest financial institutions.

Grasso Asks Presiding Judge To Recuse Himself In Compensation Case (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 14, 2006

The battle over former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's multi-million dollar compensation package continues to heat up.

Grasso's attorneys have filed a motion asking Justice Charles Edward Ramos, the presiding judge in the case, to reassign the matter to a different judge.

"Throughout this lengthy case, the Court has steadfastly expressed its desire that this significant case be handled in a way that engenders public confidence in the justice system," attorneys for Grasso said in papers filed with the court last week. "At this time, reassignment of the case would best serve that important goal."

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has challenged Grasso's total compensation under New York's not-for-profit laws.

Gerson A. Zweifach of Williams & Connolly who represents Grasso, laid out three grounds for recusal in the motion. The first stems from ex parte settlement talks with Ramos, which Grasso entered into based on the court's "advance agreement not to serve as trial judge should Mr. Grasso object."

After the judge decided to conduct a bench trial to address the separate issue of whether Grasso's compensation of more than $139 million was reasonable, Grasso sent a letter to Ramos expressing concerns over his continued involvement with the case.

"Having obtained Mr. Grasso's and his counsel's consent to participate in an ex parte conference based on this commitment, it would be improper, to say the least, for the Court now to try the case over Mr. Grasso's objection."

The second grounds for recusal, Zweifach said, were that Ramos, during the course of the settlement discussions, expressed views on "factual and legal issues that lie at the heart of any upcoming trial."

"The Court's statements could reasonably be interpreted as impairing Mr. Grasso's right to have his case resolved in a fair and impartial manner," Zweifach said.

The attorney claims that Ramos "candidly" expressed his views regarding whether Grasso ought to return some portion of his compensation to the stock exchange; whether Grasso played an improper role in receiving compensation; whether Kenneth Langone, a co-defendant in the case, acted improperly in his duties as chairman of the NYSE's compensation committee; whether Grasso was properly advised to accept the contractual payout from the stock exchange; and whether Grasso's compensation was too high.

The third ground for recusal involved the claim that Ramos twice sought a position, unsuccessfully, as a member of the board of the directors of the New York Stock Exchange.

In October 2002, an executive search firm working on Ramos' behalf approached Grasso about the judge's possible employment at the stock exchange. Grasso later leaned that in October 2003, Ramos also sent a letter to John S. Reed, Grasso's successor as chairman.

This letter, Grasso's attorneys say, specifically cited a tobacco class action settlement with the state of New York in which Ramos had objected to the reasonableness of certain attorney fees. Spitzer did not oppose those fees. The judge's objection was subsequently reversed by Appellate Division, First Department in New York v. Phillip Morris Inc., 30 A.D.2d 57.

Zweifach said the development was "deeply troubling" because Ramos had failed to disclose that he had again sought a position on the stock exchange board weeks after Grasso's termination and seven months before the filing of the government's suit, and because the second letter, addressed to Reed, "specifically focused on the Court's willingness, sua sponte, to set aside agreed-upon compensation where the Court questioned its reasonableness."

The fact that Ramos had specifically called attention to his decision in the tobacco case is seen as evidence by Grasso and his attorneys that Ramos is "offended by high levels of compensation."

Zweifach said the fact that Ramos is set to decide in a bench trial the issue of whether Grasso's pay was reasonable raises "substantial public questions about the fairness of such a proceeding" giving his endorsement of his opinion in the tobacco case.

In addition to Zweifach, Grasso is represented by Mark C. Zauderer, a partner at Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. Zauderer declined to comment.

A spokesperson for Spitzer's office said the government expected to file a response later today to Grasso's motion.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Says Year-old Task Force Is Deterring Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales credited a task force he established a year ago with deterring fraud in the Hurricane Katrina relief effort, citing as evidence money returned to the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Gonzales addressed members of the Hurricane Katrina Task Force Wednesday, the first anniversary of its creation, during an appearance in New Orleans, where the hurricane flooded 80 percent of the city on Aug. 29, 2005.

"People need to know that they will not get away with these crimes," Gonzales said.

The report released at the meeting said that by Oct. 17, 2005, the task force had charged 36 people in 17 cases with hurricane-related fraud. By Sept. 6, 2006, Gonzales said that number had grown to more than 400 people charged in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation.

Most task force prosecutions in the past year involved fraud in obtaining individual assistance benefits from FEMA and the Red Cross, the report said.

Between them, the agencies had more than $18.2 million returned by recipients individual aid, the report said, calling it a "sign that our prosecutions are deterring fraud."

The report identified trends in post-disasters, including charity-fraud schemes and emergency-assistance schemes that begin as soon as the public is informed of assistance available for disaster victims.

Criminals learn to exploit systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls of disaster relief programs, the report said.

"In short, when these criminals find a weak spot - a short cut to the money - they tend to return to it," Gonzales said.

Gonzales promised a crackdown on individuals who use their positions with governmental agencies and disaster relief programs to line their pockets.

"Our goal is that every dollar be used in the affected counties to rebuild, not to pat the bank accounts of criminals," Gonzales said.

Fraud cases have been made in 16 states ranging from Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida to California and Oregon, the report said.

Attorney General Gonzales Promises "Zero Tolerance"

NEW ORLEANS, LA — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spent Wednesday in New Orleans getting a one-year report from his National Katrina Fraud Task force.

He predicts fraud cases will rise as more and more federal recovery dollars reach the Gulf Region.

"Billions of dollars are headed to the Gulf Coast region for the rebuilding effort," said Gonzales. "We know that fraud, sadly follows dollars."

Gonzales a group of prosecutors and law enforcers meeting at the Downtown Sheraton, so far his Katrina Fraud Task force is responsible for 400 arrests nationwide, half of them in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"It is disturbing to see not only the volume of fraud, but the lengths to which people will go to take advantage of others sufferings," said Gonzales.

The cases include two FEMA workers who pleaded guilty to soliciting bribes at a disaster recovery center in the Algiers neighborhood of New Orleans.

The task force also accused St. Tammany Parish Council Member Joe Impastato of trying to get money from a debris removal contractor.

That case is expected to go to trial early next year.

"I will tell you we have a lot of important investigation that are going on right now, some very significant, involving various public officials of course I can't go into the details," said New Orleans U.S. Attorney Jim Letten.

The Attorney General is also sending re-enforcements to protect the new round of federal dollars.

"We have petitioned Washington and Washington is sending down another squad of investigators which will be devoted solely to Katrina fraud," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazanni.

"I think as long as you have that kind of money, going into an effected area, there are going to be people who want to take advantage of it," said Attorney General Gonzales. "I think it's important to send a very clear message that we're watching this very closely and we're not going to tolerate fraud."

Fraud Deterred, Gonzales Says (NOTP)

Victories chalked up, warnings renewed

Thanks to a federal fraud task force created within days after Hurricane Katrina, more than 400 people around the nation have been prosecuted for helping themselves to government and charity money meant for storm victims, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday in New Orleans.

"People need to know that they won't get away with these crimes, and that message is getting out there," said Gonzales, giving some examples cited in a year-to-date report on the task force's work.

There was an Illinois woman who told the Federal Emergency Management Agency that she was displaced by Katrina and had seen her two daughters drown in floodwaters and float away.

She sought FEMA aid to bury the daughters, once their bodies were recovered, and to reimburse her for counseling she got to cope with the loss.

"This woman had no daughters," Gonzales said. The woman was indicted by a federal grand jury in June, according to the report.

Gonzales pointed to another example, a man who got financial help from FEMA by falsely claming it was needed by individuals left homeless and without food or clothing by Katrina.

The man was indicted by a Nevada grand jury last spring after the task force found out he had used the FEMA money to rent seven Las Vegas hotel rooms, which he rerented to other people for purposes investigators think included drug dealing and prostitution.

In Louisiana, a total of 126 individuals -- 23 of them in the New Orleans area -- have been prosecuted on Katrina fraud charges, according to the report Gonzales cited.

Gonzales made his comments to task force members gathered at the Sheraton New Orleans Hotel for a daylong symposium to take stock of their accomplishments in the past year and make plans for future work.

Prosecutions prompted by task force efforts also have caused some would-be lawbreakers to think twice, Gonzales said. More than $15.8 million in FEMA benefits was sent back, while $2.4 million was returned to the American Red Cross.

Despite the task force's success in making Katrina-related fraud cases for everything from public corruption to identity theft, it faces an enormous job ahead: keeping tabs on the billions of dollars of government money now in the pipeline to help rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast region.

"When the criminals find an easy route for money, they tend to return for more, giving law enforcement an opportunity to stop it," Gonzales said.

He devoted his first remarks at the podium to New Orleans' struggle to recover from the hurricane at the same time it is contending with a rising tide of crime.

"This great city cannot return to its former glory if it's being held hostage by criminals," he said, adding that the federal government is doing all it can to help the city's struggling criminal justice system.

Task Force Flooded With Katrina Fraud (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- More than 400 people -- including government and charity workers -- have been charged so far with illegally benefiting from Hurricane Katrina and the ensuing flooding, according to a Justice Department report released Wednesday.

However, the Katrina Fraud Task Force hasn't even begun to skim the waters, and the number could climb into the thousands, the report stated on the first anniversary of the task force.

"Disaster relief agencies have reported to law enforcement that they have identified thousands of questionable or possibly fraudulent payments to purported hurricane victims," the report said.

To date, the multi-agency command center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, has received more than 6,800 complaints or tips for investigators to pursue.

The prosecutions of negligible fraud schemes has had a deterrent effect, as ineligible recipients of aid have voluntarily returned $18.2 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the American Red Cross, the report says.

Most of the cases have involved people trying to obtain assistance from FEMA or the Red Cross, though cases of identity theft, procurement fraud and public corruption are emerging, the report states.

It adds that the task force found a "particularly distressing pattern of criminal activity" involving government and charity insiders. Among those being prosecuted are employees or contractors with FEMA, the Army Corps of Engineers, the Louisiana Department of Labor and the Red Cross.

The report came as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales met with about 170 police and prosecutors investigating and litigating fraud cases surrounding hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

"We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed," Gonzales said.

Of the federal prosecutions thus far, 115 were in Louisiana, 79 in California, 50 in Texas, 48 in Mississippi and 31 in Florida.

Judge Drops Two Charges In Gotti Racketeering Case (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

A federal district court judge dropped two counts against John A. Gotti yesterday involving two of his businesses that prosecutors claimed had been set up and operated with illicit funds.

The charges had been added by the government for Mr. Gotti's third racketeering trial, but Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said prosecutors had not offered sufficient proof to support the charges.

"The facts do not prove that Gotti invested the proceeds from loan sharking and construction industry extortion into" the companies, she said. "No reasonable juror could find Gotti guilty beyond a reasonable doubt" on the charges, she said.

The companies in question are JAG Brokerage and the 216-02 Hempstead Avenue Corporation, which mainly collect rents on property owned by Mr. Gotti in Queens.

Mr. Gotti, known as Junior, still faces five charges related to witness tampering and racketeering, including extorting construction companies, loan sharking, money laundering and ordering the 1992 kidnapping and beating of Curtis Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels and a radio talk show host. Mr. Gotti has twice been tried on similar charges, and in each case a jury was unable to reach a verdict. Also yesterday, in what could prove to be a critical development, Mr. Gotti's lawyers questioned whether Mr. Gotti could be heard saying on a secretly recorded F.B.I. tape that he was angry about being demoted from the top echelon of the Gambino crime family to a captain.

The recordings, made when Mr. Gotti was in Ray Brook federal penitentiary on unrelated racketeering charges from 1999 to 2004, are the centerpiece of the government's case against Mr. Gotti. The tape, which records a conversation between Mr. Gotti and his sister Angel in August 2003, is critical because it appears to show that Mr. Gotti retained a leadership role in the Gambino family as late as 2003.

Mr. Gotti's primary defense against the racketeering counts is that he left the Mafia some time before mid-1999, and is therefore protected from prosecution by the five-year statute of limitation on racketeering charges.

While the words on the tape are difficult to make out, the F.B.I. transcription of the recording reads: "'I'm a captain? What happened? And when I get out, I want to see this kid. He can send me all the love letters he wants, I don't have to answer to him."

But Steven Dobies, who prosecutors say is an associate of the Gambino crime family, testified that he was present during the conversation and never heard the word "captain" used.

"What did you hear?" Mr. Gotti's lead lawyer, Charles Carnesi, asked Mr. Dobies.

"John says, 'Honestly, well, what happened?'" Mr. Dobies said.

"Did you ever hear the word 'captain'?" Mr. Carnesi asked.

"Never," responded Mr. Dobies.

2 Charges Against Gotti Tossed (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

The case against John A. Gotti, son of the late Gambino crime boss, got a little lighter when a federal judge threw out two of the charges he faced in his racketeering trial.

Despite the dismissal of the counts by Manhattan federal judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday, "Junior" Gotti still faces serious racketeering conspiracy and related charges, including allegations he was involved in extortion, loan-sharking and the 1992 beating of radio talk show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

Though she didn't issue a written opinion, Scheindlin essentially agreed with the defense that prosecutors had failed to prove Gotti used a company known as 216-02 Hempstead Avenue to invest funds from construction industry, extortion and loan-sharking activity. Scheindlin also formally dismissed a similar charge related to an inactive brokerage company Gotti ran until 1999, court records show.

James Cohen, a professor at Fordham University Law School, said in a telephone interview that Scheindlin's ruling indicated the evidence on those charges was quite weak.

The judge's action came the day before federal prosecutors were scheduled to begin summations in the trial, the third time Gotti, 42, has had to face a jury on the racketeering charges. Defense summations were expected to begin Friday and jury deliberations could start at that time.

Through his defense attorneys, Gotti maintains that he turned his back on life as a mobster before July 21, 1999, a date that would put the 2004 indictment outside the statute of limitations. Much of the defense case this week was aimed at proving that Gotti not only negated his life in the mob, but also wanted to leave New York and his old gangster cronies for a more peaceful life, possibly in Canada.

Yesterday Gotti's old friend, Steve Dobies, continued on the witness stand. Dobies, a 6-foot-8-inch-tall man dressed in blue jeans and sweatshirt, told the jury Tuesday about Gotti's plans to start a hip-hop magazine while he was in federal prison in 2003. The defense had called Dobies to rebut prosecution claims that he allegedly visited Gotti in prison to relay messages to mobsters on the street.

Under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Dobies insisted that he never passed messages of a criminal nature for Gotti. Dobies also said that Gotti stated a number of times in 2002 and 2003 that he wanted nothing to do with his former mob associates, wanted out of the mob life and wanted to get away from New York.

Questioned about Gotti's anger that his uncle Peter and others had allegedly stolen his father's money, Dobies said that Gotti believed it was money that was due his mother and sisters.

JUDGE WHACKS TWO CHARGES AGAINST GOTTI (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 14, 2006

A federal judge dealt a blow to prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case yesterday, tossing two new racketeering charges after the feds failed to show enough evidence at trial.

It was the second time Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin tossed the charges, which accused Gotti of trying to hide illegal cash from loan-sharking and construction-industry extortion in two businesses.

Prosecutors hoped to show that Gotti continued to live off criminal proceeds right through this year - part of a strategy to combat his claim that he quit the Mafia in 1999.

Scheindlin initially threw out the pair of racketeering counts on the eve of trial, only to flip-flop and immediately reinstate them after prosecutors argued that they would present fresh evidence.

Yesterday, the judge ruled there was not enough proof to link the illegal cash invested in the businesses to a specific crime - or that additional dirty cash came in during the five-year statute of limitation period beginning in May 2001. This is Gotti's third trial after two previous juries failed to reach a verdict.

He stands accused of several racketeering charges, including the 1992 kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio host allegedly targeted for bad-mouthing Gotti's father, John "Dapper Don" Gotti, on the air.

A towering reputed Gambino associate who was Junior's "gofer" during his imprisonment from 1999 to 2004 testified that he collected up to $5,000 in rental income every month, but denied ever collecting criminal proceeds for Gotti.

Steven Dobies, a 6-foot-8 defense witness, said he was Gotti's most frequent visitor at the upstate Ray Brook prison and used some unusual tactics in helping the former Gambino leader prepare his defense.

During cross-examination by prosecutors, Dobies admitted he planned to wage a smear campaign against Sliwa through a Web site to be called "He's no angel.com"

Judge Throws Out New Racketeering Charges For Gotti, Saying Prosecutors Did Not Prove Claims (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the second time, a judge on Wednesday tossed out new racketeering charges filed against John "Junior" Gotti, finding the evidence introduced at his trial insufficient to support a conviction.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin decided the government had not proven its claims that money invested in several of Gotti's properties stemmed from alleged loansharking or construction industry extortion.

The government filed the new charges several months ago in a bid to boost its case against Gotti, the son of late mobster John Gotti, after two juries in the last year deadlocked on racketeering charges against him. Closing arguments in his retrial could begin as early as Thursday.

A spokeswoman for prosecutors, Lauren McDonough, said the government had no comment on Scheindlin's ruling.

Scheindlin had thrown out the new charges last month before Gotti's retrial started but changed her mind and reinstated them days later.

With the new charges, the government had tried to prove that Gotti continued to benefit from Gambino crime family money even after he said he quit the mob when he pleaded guilty to charges in another racketeering case in 1999.

The government's new strategy did have some benefits because the judge decided that jurors could consider new evidence about Gotti's finances even though they could not use that evidence to convict him on the new racketeering charges.

Gotti is still charged with racketeering related to other alleged crimes, including an allegation that he ordered two 1992 attacks on radio show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father.

The elder Gotti died in prison in 2002, 10 years after he was sentenced to life for racketeering.

Last Gambino Holdout Caves, Pleads Guilty To Numbers Charges (WPJN)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR, THE JOURNAL NEWS

White Plains Journal News, September 14, 2006

The last defendant in the massive roundup of the reputed leaders of the Gambino crime family has joined the ranks of his convicted compatriots.

Louis "Little Louie" Natrella, 33, of Yonkers pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to all charges against him. Natrella admitted to conspiring to defraud the United States, conspiring to operate an illegal numbers business, illegal gambling and operating an illegal numbers business.

Natrella was one of 32 reputed leaders, members and associates of the notorious organized-crime family charged in March 2005 in a racketeering indictment.

"We are very pleased with the efforts of the investigative team," said David Velazquez, the senior supervisory resident agent in charge of the FBI's White Plains office, "and the resulting clean sweep of 32 convictions for 32 defendants."

Natrella pleaded guilty after the lunch break yesterday during the first full day of testimony in his trial before U.S. Judge Alvin Hellerstein. Natrella's lawyer, Robert Soloway, could not be reached for comment.

Natrella was accused of operating a thriving Gambino numbers operation in the Bronx that was handed down to him by longtime Gambino associate Leonard Minuto Sr. from Dobbs Ferry.

Minuto was one of the 32 defendants originally named in the racketeering indictment, but he struck a plea deal with federal prosecutors. In part, Minuto said he turned on the mob after finding out that Natrella and Scarsdale capo Gregory DePalma conspired to steal $20,000 from him.

Minuto said he found out about the plot in government papers turned over to him in preparation for his trial.

Minuto testified during DePalma's trial that Natrella told him that the money was seized by the FBI from a wall safe in his house during a raid on his Yonkers home.

Natrella's guilty plea marks the 31st in the case. DePalma, the sole defendant to place his fate in the hands of a jury, was found guilty in June of racketeering after a trial in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. COMMENT ON THIS STORY IN OUR FORUMS

The Mafia: A 21st-century Cosa Nostra (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 14, 2006

"Anybody who thinks that the Mafia is breathing its last breath is just wrong," says Matt Heron. Heron oughta know--he's just finished running the FBI's Organized Crime Section in New York and is moving down to FBI headquarters in Washington this month to oversee its anti-mob operations nationwide. The Mafia, Heron says, has "had over 100 years in this country, but we didn't start successfully dinging them until the last 20 years. We've still got a lot of work cut out for us."

There's good reason to think the Mafia is down and out. At its height, the American mob wielded influence from labor unions to presidential elections, with big interests in longshoring, trucking, gambling, construction, waste disposal, and garment making. But the wiseguys have been reeling since the 1980s, with one set of indictments after another. Once boasting 26 families nationwide, the mob is down to 11, half of those confined to the New York area. And in recent years, every top boss of those five New York families--the heads of the Bonanno, Colombo, Gambino, Genovese, and Lucchese gangs--has been indicted or imprisoned or has passed away. So scarce are the godfathers that the Commission, the Mafia's ruling council, hasn't met for a decade, investigators say. And, though far from the front pages, the arrests go on. Since 2004, more than 70 members and associates of just the Bonanno family have been prosecuted in New York.

Those kinds of facts make it tempting to ignore the mob in this age of terrorism. But the cases also suggest just how active the Mafia remains. "We've hit them very hard, but they keep adapting and regenerating," says Tom Metz, acting chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Section. There's also a new generation of smarter, more educated mobsters. "They're not like their fathers and grandfathers and uncles," adds Heron. "Some of these people have law degrees, business degrees." Call it the New Mafia--their members tend to avoid thuggish acts like extortion and murder in favor of white-collar crimes, like Internet and stock market frauds. In January, a Gambino Family soldier was sentenced for running sophisticated telephone and Internet porn frauds that investigators say raked in an extraordinary $650 million. "Just when you think you've seen it all, they come up with another scheme," says Metz.

Moreover, the Mafia's influence still extends far beyond New York. There remain active families in Chicago, Detroit, New England, New Jersey, Philadelphia, and Miami. Last year, the feds arrested reputed mob figures in Illinois, Florida, and Arizona for 18 unsolved murders spanning four decades, including that of notorious Las Vegas hitman Tony "the Ant" Spilotro. As part of the indictment, prosecutors offered a fascinating history and description of the entire "Chicago Outfit"--Al Capone's old gang--for the first time formally charging it as a criminal "enterprise" under U.S. antiracketeering laws. The names of those indicted read like an episode of The Sopranos. There's Joey "the Clown" Lombardo, Paul "the Indian" Schiro, and Frank "Gumba" Saladino. (Gumba didn't make it--when the cops arrived to arrest him, they found Saladino dead in a hotel room, with tens of thousands of dollars in checks and cash beside his body.)

The wiseguys may be down, folks, but don't count them out just yet. There's too much money to be made. "It's an organization that's wounded but not dead," says Heron, who's worked Mafia cases for 20 years. "It will never be dead."

Malone Agrees To Plead Guilty On Eve Of His Trial In Las Vegas (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 14, 2006

Deal likely involves 50 months in prison

Lance Malone, a strip club mogul's bagman who was convicted in a San Diego corruption scandal last year, has agreed to plead guilty in the parallel Las Vegas case on the eve of his trial.

Malone pleaded guilty in exchange for a sentence of about 50 months in prison that would run concurrently with a sentence in the San Diego case, said a source close to the defense. The plea agreement is likely to include the requirement that Malone abandon his appeal of the San Diego conviction, the source said.

Malone is accused of bribing Las Vegas politicians with cash, lap dances and ski-school tuition in exchange for votes that would benefit strip clubs owned by his boss, Michael Galardi.

If a judge approves the agreement, it would avert the trial in Las Vegas, which is set to begin Monday. The specific crime to which Malone would plead guilty could not be confirmed Wednesday.

In San Diego, Malone was convicted July 18, 2005, along with former San Diego Councilmen Michael Zucchet and Ralph Inzunza, of extortion, wire fraud and wire-fraud conspiracy in a scheme to trade campaign contributions for political favors.

Malone worked for Galardi, who wanted the law that prohibits touching between strippers and patrons repealed so the club would make more money. Galardi made a deal with the government and testified against the others.

In November, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey T. Miller threw out a jury's guilty verdicts against Zucchet, acquitting him of seven corruption counts and granting a new trial on the remaining two counts.

During the same hearing, Miller also sentenced Inzunza to 21 months in prison and Malone to 36 months in prison. Inzunza and Malone are free on bond pending a decision on their appeals.

The government has not decided whether it will appeal Zucchet's acquittal. A decision is due by year's end.

In Las Vegas, Malone's trial was severed from that of politicians Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, who were convicted in May and sentenced last month to 50 months and 2½ years in prison, respectively.

Galardi, who at the time owned Cheetahs in San Diego and Cheetahs and Jaguars in Las Vegas, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in the San Diego case in September 2003 and to a count of racketeering in the Las Vegas case a month later. He testified in the San Diego and Las Vegas trials and was scheduled to do so at Malone's trial. Galardi has yet to be sentenced.

Former Clark County Commission Member's Trial Set To Begin Monday (LVRJ)

By Adrienne Packer, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 14, 2006

Former Clark County Commissioner Lance Malone is negotiating with federal prosecutors in a last-ditch effort to avert trial on political corruption charges, a source close to the case said Wednesday.

The government offered Malone an agreement that, in exchange for a guilty plea, would allow him to serve a prison term that will run concurrently with the three-year sentence levied last summer in San Diego in a similar political corruption case. Malone also would agree to abandon the appeal he filed after the San Diego conviction.

Malone is the last of five defendants to go to trial, culminating the 3-year-old public corruption case that centered around Michael Galardi, who admitted bribing politicians to protect the financial viability of his strip clubs in Las Vegas and San Diego.

Galardi and Malone were accused of providing cash bribes to three San Diego councilmen and former Clark County commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. In exchange for the cash, the commissioners voted favorably on Galardi-related matters.

Galardi, the money source, and Kenny pleaded guilty in 2003. Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey, recipients of the bribes, were convicted in May. Malone, the middle-man who is accused of delivering the cash to politicians, had vowed to fight the charges in Las Vegas. But negotiations between Malone's attorney, Dominic Gentile, and federal prosecutors, intensified in the last week, the source said.

Gentile did not return telephone messages Wednesday, but confirmed Tuesday that he was in negotiations with the government.

Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Wednesday, "Plea negotiations are under way, but we're still scheduled to go to trial beginning Monday."

Malone was charged with conspiracy to commit wire fraud, wire fraud and conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

"He was really in a very, very difficult situation," said Douglas McNabb, a Houston defense attorney who specializes in federal criminal cases and has followed the Galardi case closely.

"When you have so many cooperating people and you have those who actually did go to trial and lost, you run the risk of having your sentence stacked. There's a huge amount of pressure to try to work something out."

Although the plea agreement had not been signed as of Wednesday evening, there were several indications that the trial will not proceed Monday.

For example, in the week leading up to the trial of Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera, defense attorneys and prosecutors filed a flurry of motions, submitted proposed questions for jurors and attended a status conference, according to court documents.

Only one motion on behalf of Malone has been filed this month.

Herrera's legal team made repeated visits to the Clark County Government Center to speak with potential witnesses who were later subpoenaed. Clark County Deputy District Attorney Mary-Anne Miller said Gentile has subpoenaed no county employees.

Additionally, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess has not met or briefed Galardi, the government's star witness who testified against Malone in San Diego, according to the source familiar with the case.

Schiess had not subpoenaed Tony Montagna, an undercover informant and head of security for Galardi, whose wiretaps and testimony played a key role in Malone's conviction in San Diego, the source said.

Also, according to another source, FBI Special Agent Chris Byers is out of the country. Byers testified for the prosecution in the trial of Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera and was expected to do so again in Malone's trial.

If Malone lost at trial, he could face a five or six-year sentence on top of the three years he received in San Diego, one source said.

In San Diego last year, Malone was found guilty of paying off San Diego councilmen Michael Zucchet, Charles Lewis and Ralph Inzunza.

Malone, working as Galardi's lobbyist, attempted to reverse an ordinance prohibiting dancers from touching customers at Galardi's club in the San Diego suburb of Kearney Mesa.

In May, jurors in Las Vegas returned a guilty verdict against Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey. During the eight-week trial, the jury heard hours of recorded telephone conversations between Malone and the defendants setting up meetings.

They also heard conversations in which Malone and Galardi use language that prosecutors said should be interpreted as code phrases for payoffs.

Malone's trial was severed from that of his two co-defendants because his two former colleagues on the commission planned to -- and did -- attack his credibility.

Herrera's attorneys suggested that Malone pocketed bribes Galardi intended to be delivered to the elected officials.

"I have never received a payment from Mr. Galardi or Mr. Malone, anywhere," Herrera testified on April 20.

Malone was captured on a recording of an intercepted telephone call telling Kincaid-Chauncey he planned to "supply" her.

But Kincaid-Chauncey testified she often ignored Malone's ramblings, saying, "Lance would talk a lot and not always say a lot."

Kincaid-Chauncey testified she often found herself concerned for her friend, who was floundering as Galardi's lobbyist. Kincaid-Chauncey said she bowed to Malone's requests to call Galardi and thank him. She explained that Malone wanted to prove to his boss he had a close relationship with commissioners.

Jurors didn't buy it.

During the San Diego trial, Gentile attempted to convince jurors that Malone was simply fulfilling his duties as a lobbyist when he kept in close touch with the council members and flushed them with campaign contributions.

Malone was convicted of one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, 33 counts of wire fraud and three counts of extortion.

In all, Malone delivered between $35,000 and $40,000 to the councilmen. Most of the payments were bundled. Malone solicited individuals to make contributions, then reimbursed them. The limit on donations in San Diego is $250.

The amount of money changing hands in Las Vegas was far greater, according to testimony during Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey's trial.

Galardi, a government witness expected to take the stand in Malone's trial, testified against his two co-defendants. Galardi said he paid Herrera between $150,000 and $200,000 and Kincaid-Chauncey about $80,000. Galardi told FBI agents all the payments were delivered by Malone.

ETHICS INQUIRY: FBI Investigation Involves KC Councilwoman (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2006

An attorney representing Saundra McFadden-Weaver acknowledged Tuesday that there was an ongoing FBI investigation involving the Kansas City councilwoman.

Attorney Ron Partee confirmed the FBI investigation the same day the city's ethics commission launched its own investigation into her involvement in $400,000 in mortgages for a Lee's Summit home.

Members of the Municipal Officials Ethics Commission — which had not met in this decade — asked McFadden-Weaver to answer questions before she testified next month before the panel. They also want her to produce loan and purchase documents, and a list of addresses where she has lived since taking office.

McFadden-Weaver asked for the ethics investigation after The Kansas City Star reported in August that she obtained the loans, apparently with no money down. Loan documents stated she would occupy the home outside the 3rd District, which she represents. The councilwoman maintains she always has lived in Kansas City.

FBI Joins Police To Arrest 22 Reputed Crips Members (NSL)

By Jonathan Schuppe, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, September 14, 2006

Nearly two-dozen reputed members of the Crips gang have been arrested on federal gun and drug charges in what U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie promised would be the start of a lengthy multi-agency campaign against street gangs and other violent criminals in Essex County.

"Federal law enforcement is getting into the business with our partners in local law enforcement to take on the street gangs who are victimizing the citizens of Essex County," Christie said. "Over the next three years I'm in office, I will be focusing on taking on street thugs like those we're taking on today."

The 22 reputed Crips members -- including the leader of a chapter called 98 Main Street Mafia and ranking members of three other factions -- were arrested by FBI agents and local police in roundups that started Tuesday and continued yesterday morning in East Orange, Irvington and Newark.

Although the gang members claimed allegiance to different chapters, or sets, many of them worked together, authorities said.

In Irvington, for example, members of the Grape Street and Rolling 60s sets plotted to sell crack cocaine in a Crescent Lane public housing complex this summer, according to law enforcement authorities and complaints filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark.

Several of the gang members were caught on videotape selling crack to an undercover informant, authorities said.

In East Orange, members of the Hoover 5-2 and Grape Street sets held a meeting in March in which they discussed selling crack, heroin and Ecstasy, according to the complaints. Over the next few months, they were caught selling the drugs to undercover informants on Park Avenue and surrounding streets.

The sale of illegal firearms took place in Newark and Irvington, where gang members allegedly took thousands of dollars for handguns, assault rifles and a shotgun, authorities said.

"These are the weapons of their trade, and they're using them not only on each other but also on innocent people trying to live their lives in their communities," Christie said.

None of the charges filed yesterday mentioned any violence related to guns sold by the gang. That part of the probe, along with an examination of how the guns got into Essex County, is continuing, authorities said.

Feds Arrest 22 High-level Crips Members (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Capping a year-long investigation into drug and weapons dealing in Essex County, federal authorities arrested 22 members of the Crips street gang Wednesday morning, and said many of them were high-level members.

"These are upper-echelon guys, not just street dealers," said Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI's Newark office.

The suspects were arrested in Newark, Irvington and East Orange, and face charges including possession with intent to distribute heroin, crack cocaine and ecstasy. Several also were charged with illegal sales of weapons, including assault rifles.

Siegel said the arrests were unrelated to raids carried out in Britain and New Jersey Wednesday morning that broke up an arms trafficking operation supplying guns to criminals in London.

More than 100 federal and local agents, including an FBI SWAT team, participated in the early morning street gang arrests.

Federal Jury Convicts KC Gang Member (KMBC-TV)

KMBC-TV, September 14, 2006

Wright Could Face Life In Prison

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- A federal jury convicted the former leader of the 51st Street Crips gang Thursday of three homicides, drug trafficking and firearms violations.

Steve L. "Moody" Wright, 23, of Kansas City, was found guilty on 15 counts contained in a 2004 federal indictment.

Federal authorities said that Wright and other members of the street gang were repeatedly involved in illegal drug trafficking and had guns that they used to protect their drug supplies and drug profits.

"Wright's modus operandi was to rob other drug dealers, often shooting to kill, steal their supply of drugs, then sell them for profit," U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said a news release.

Wright could be subject to sentence of life in prison without parole. A sentencing hearing has not been set.

'Dangerous Gangster' Convicted In 3 Murders (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2006

It took more than a month of testimony in federal court to chronicle the alleged criminal exploits of Steve L. Wright Jr.

And it took a jury about 15 hours of deliberation over three days to sort through it before finding the 23-year-old Kansas City man guilty of three drug-related killings and other crimes.

Prosecutors portrayed Wright as a key member of a Kansas City street gang involved in drug dealing and fatal and nonfatal shootings during 2000 and 2001, when Wright was a teenager.

The jury convicted him of 15 counts, including two murders related to drug trafficking and one to prevent a witness from cooperating with police. He also was found guilty of conspiracy to distribute drugs, and other drug and firearms counts.

"Wright is a vicious and dangerous gangster, therefore we are asking the court to protect the public by sending him to prison for the rest of his life," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said after the jury verdicts in Kansas City.

In closing arguments Tuesday in U.S. District Court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Ambrose described one incident after another in which police found drugs and weapons after arresting Wright or persons with him.

Ambrose described the pattern that was established when Wright was still a teen: "Vehicle speeding away from police with weapons and drugs on board and Mr. Wright on board."

The defense argued that weapons and drugs that were found in houses, cars or on other persons associated with Wright were not enough to convict him.

Defense attorney William Shull said that every witness who testified about Wright's involvement in murders was facing legal problems and worked out deals with prosecutors. Shull said none was "credible and worthy of belief."

He also noted that none of the wounded persons identified Wright as the triggerman, and that none of the weapons Wright actually possessed was linked to any crime of violence.

But Ambrose said that Wright was part of a conspiracy to distribute drugs and that he was responsible for criminal acts committed by other members of the conspiracy.

Several homicides the jury heard about involved Wright and his associates stealing drugs and shooting the one who was selling them.

"They, like so many others in this case, were paid in lead instead of cash," Ambrose told jurors in closing arguments.

After one of those rip-offs in 2001, one of Wright's associates, Michael L. Birks, was killed because he showed weakness by taking one of the victims to the hospital, Ambrose said. Wright was concerned Birks might also cooperate with police. Birks was on his knees begging for his life when he was killed by another man with a gun Wright provided, according to testimony.

Wright also was convicted for the June 2000 killing of Hector Santos and the June 2001 murder of Alex Clark.

Map Dealer Deserves Stiffer Term, British Say (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn., Sept. 13 — The 486-year-old map, bound for most of its life in a book that helped shape Britain's view of the world, survived the burning at the stake of the archbishop of Canterbury, who owned it, civil war, royal intrigue and the Nazi bombing of London.

Everything, it appears, but the arrival in London in 2005 of Edward Forbes Smiley III, an American dealer in antiquities who specialized in obtaining hard-to-find trophies for his customers.

In June, Mr. Smiley, 50, pleaded guilty in federal court in New Haven to having stolen 97 rare maps from some of the world's leading universities and libraries, a staggering haul estimated at about $3 million.

Targets of his seven-year crime spree included Harvard, Yale and the New York Public Library. Also on the list of items taken was the centuries-old map by Peter Apian that was ripped from a book Mr. Smiley found at the British national library.

Because of that $100,000 map, and three more missing maps that the British Library believes Mr. Smiley may have snatched, the library is arguing that he deserves more than the 57 to 71 months in prison that prosecutors and Mr. Smiley's lawyers backed at the time of the guilty plea.

In a legal brief dated Wednesday, the library's lawyer, Robert E. Goldman, urged Judge Janet Bond Arterton of Federal District Court to impose a harsher sentence — of at least 78 to 97 months — when she revisits the case on Sept. 27. By law, the judge can impose up to 10 years, or 120 months, because the case involves the theft of a major artwork, although sentencing guidelines suggest a lower range.

So far as the British Library is concerned, Mr. Smiley is no ordinary thief, and what he systematically stole transcends monetary loss. It complains in its brief that the sentencing guidelines "substantially understate the seriousness of the offense," and it quotes liberally from Theodore Roosevelt, Robert F. Scott, the Antarctic explorer, and Samuel A. Alito Jr. to bolster its case.

"The case of United States v. Smiley has made painfully clear that Smiley created his marketplace and built his inventory through the systematic looting of the world's great libraries," the brief says.

As the brief put it, "The Apian world map stolen from the British Library by Smiley tells but one tale of the 97 maps stolen," adding that it was torn from a volume once owned by Thomas Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, who was a key adviser to Henry VIII and was burned at the stake for his beliefs by Mary I in 1556.

The book, which was confiscated, became part of the Royal Library and was eventually given to the British Library at its inception in 1973, according to the brief, where "the volume remained intact until visited by Smiley."

But Mr. Smiley's lawyer, Richard A. Reeve, said: "It's all very interesting, but the reality is that map has been recovered. It's going back to the British Library."

Mr. Reeve added that Mr. Goldman's memo "ignores a central part of this case, which is that the libraries are getting back maps that they would never have gotten were it not for Mr. Smiley's cooperation."

Of the 97 maps that Mr. Smiley acknowledged stealing, federal agents have recovered 88 so far, said Thomas Carson, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in New Haven.

Map-stealing Collector Robbed Future Generations, Library Says (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps should be severely punished because he systemically looted treasures that told the story of the new world and had survived catastrophic events over the centuries, the British Library argued Wednesday.

The maps that E. Forbes Smiley III stole far transcended their estimated value of $3 million, the British Library said in documents filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court.

"The maps stolen by Smiley created the dreams of the explorer, merchant and powerful," the library wrote. "They charted the paths of national expansion and empire building. They marked the rise of British dominance, the origins of a new nation and the demise of a native population. The maps drew the lines between where knowledge ended and imagination began."

Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted.

DOJ_NMG_0062844

"Smiley's actions ripped at the heart of our public institutions which stored, protected and made available to the public over centuries maps which provided a bridge between past and future generations," the library wrote.

One of the stolen maps had survived civil war, royal intrigue, economic depression and the Nazi bombing of London.

"They had been cared for and preserved for centuries until Smiley ripped them from their volumes and slid them into his coat," the library wrote.

Smiley, a 50-year-old resident of Martha's Vineyard, faces up to six years in prison under federal guidelines and restitution when he is sentenced on Sept. 27. The British Library is urging the court to impose a higher sentence, citing similar cases in which courts imposed stiff sentences.

Smiley admitted in June that he stole 97 maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard University library and the British Library in London. The oldest maps dated back to the 1500s and some are the first records of settlements, terrorities and discoveries in America, experts say.

With Smiley's help, prosecutors said most of the maps have been recovered from dealers and galleries. Prosecutors said four maps have not been returned by those who have them and five others are lost.

Smiley's attorney, Richard Reeve, called the British Library's arguments "factually and legally flawed." He said authorities could only prove Smiley stole 18 maps, but his client cooperated with the additional thefts.

"In effect, the libraries are getting back 80 maps that they never would have been able to prove Smiley had taken," Reeve said. "He could have sat back and said, 'Prove it.'"

But that tactic would have exposed Smiley to more prosecutions in other jurisdictions, said Robert Goldman, attorney for the British Library.

Smiley was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. Yale and other top map libraries reviewed their security procedures after Smiley's arrest.

The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps and accused him of "selective cooperation" with authorities. They said prosecutors denied their request to look at Smiley's statements to them, while Smiley has refused to let them examine whatever records the government may have obtained from him.

Prosecutors said they disagreed with some of the arguments by the British Library, but declined to elaborate.

Reeve said the British Library lacked proof of additional thefts.

The British Library said one of the stolen maps was torn from a volume owned by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury who precipitated England's break with Rome by marrying King Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn in 1533. The map, which has been recovered but the library says was altered, shows Cranmer believed America was a separate continent and not part of Asia as many believed at the time.

"Like a drop of oil on a still pond, the number of his victims spreads with time," the library wrote. "Smiley's victims include students, scholars, academics, the general public and individuals yet to be born who will not have the opportunity to sit at a desk, open a leather bound volume and see the world as Archbishop Cranmer and others saw it in the 16th century."

Moroccan Court Jails Two Men For Internet Worm Last Year (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-low

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Authorities in Morocco sentenced two individuals for their role in unleashing an Internet worm dubbed Zotob that infected computer networks at hundreds of companies last year.

A court in the Moroccan capital of Rabat on Tuesday sentenced Farid Essebar, a 19-year-old student and a Moroccan national born in Russia, to two years in prison. Another student, Achraf Bahloul, 21, received a one-year prison sentence. Both men were convicted of charges relating to virus-writing, illegal access to computers and conspiracy to commit credit-card fraud.

The Zotob worm affected machines at a number of media companies, including Time Warner Inc.'s CNN unit, New York Times Co. and ABC, a unit of Walt Disney Co. Among other companies that suffered from infected computers were Kraft Foods Inc. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group. The virus, which took advantage of a flaw in the "plug-and-play" feature of Microsoft Corp.'s Windows 2000 software, emerged just days after Microsoft warned of a security flaw and released a software fix for it. That left customers little time to patch their systems.

The case, which U.S. and Moroccan authorities say they believe is connected to a credit-card theft group in Turkey, illustrates how geographically dispersed cybercriminals have become. Traditionally, much of the online criminal activity has come out of the U.S., Eastern Europe and parts of Asia, security experts say. "It's a global problem now," says Graham Cluley, a technology consultant at antivirus-software company Sophos in the U.K.

Lawyers for Messrs. Essebar and Bahloul plan to appeal the ruling, according to a court official cited by the Associated Press.

Mr. Essebar, who goes by the online moniker "Diabl0," also was connected with a man in Turkey named Atilla Ekici, says the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, which aided the probes in Morocco and Turkey. The case against Mr. Ekici, whom Turkish officials charged with unauthorized access to computers and disseminating a virus, is pending.

Virus Authors Sentenced (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

Two Moroccan men have been sentenced to prison terms for helping write the Zotob computer virus that attacked major U.S. networks last year, a court official said Wednesday. Science student Farid Essebar, 19, and his friend Achraf Bahloul were sentenced Tuesday at the court in Sale, Morocco, near the capital Rabat, a court official said. Essebar was sentenced to two years and Bahloul to one year, the official MAP news agency reported. The Zotob worm and its variations, first unleashed in August 2005, targeted computers that run Microsoft Corp. operating systems, with Windows 2000 users most seriously affected.

California DNA Program Suffers From Lack Of Funding (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

Two years after California set out to create a vast DNA database to help unravel tens of thousands unsolved crimes, the program is being severely hampered by a lack of resources, officials across the state say.

The state crime lab has a backlog of more than a quarter-million DNA samples it is unable to process because of a funding shortfall and a lack of manpower, directors acknowledge. At its current rate of progress, the lab would have to spend 2 1/2 years to clear the backlog -- if it received no more samples, which is hardly likely, since it is currently taking in about 20,000 samples a month, officials said.

State officials, Los Angeles police officers and the director of the Santa Monica Rape Treatment Center say the backlog means that crimes are going unsolved and that criminals who could be nabbed may still be walking the streets.

"There will come a time when we will be sitting on a case where we have the offender profile and we are waiting for a match in (the database) who is among the 300,000 unprocessed samples and this offender will strike again," said Tim Marcia, a veteran detective in the LAPD's cold-case unit who has used DNA to solve rapes and murders.

The problems stem from overly optimistic funding projections when California voters in November 2004 resoundingly passed Proposition 69, designed to make the state the nation's leader in the use of DNA technology as a crime-solving tool.

Prop. 69 requires all convicted felons, certain misdemeanor offenders and those arrested for rape or murder to give up DNA samples. Prison officials swab offenders' mouths with an object called a buccal which looks like a tongue depressor. The samples are subjected to genetic testing, and the results are uploaded into the FBI laboratory's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS. The database can be run against evidence from crime scenes for DNA matches that will help identify new suspects.

More than 285,652 DNA samples have been uploaded into the data base and the program has yielded 2,670 "hits" in some long-languishing cases. But despite those successes, the funding problems have resulted in a backlog of 287,294 unprocessed DNA samples.

"Proposition 69 is the gold standard model for the world, but full and robust implementation is currently hamstrung," said Bruce Harrington, the Newport Beach, Calif., home developer who financed the ballot measure in 2004.

Harrington said the primary reason for the backlog is that the state crime lab in Richmond pays dramatically lower salaries than local crime labs, making it difficult to hire young scientists and hang onto more experienced ones.

Lance Gima, director of Forensic Services for the state attorney General, said the starting salary at the Richmond lab is $3,100, compared to $4,600 a month at the Los Angeles Police Department laboratory and $4,200 a month at the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department. Local labs in large Northern California cities also pay more than the state, Gima said.

Although the program was supposed to pay for itself, it has not been fully funded. Under the law, the counties were to turn over $1 of every $10 in misdemeanor fines to a "penalty pot," amassing $25 million a year for the project. Instead, for reasons that are unclear, not all the counties are contributing, and the penalty pot stands at only $7.5 million.

The state legislature just enacted a measure to allocate another $1 for each additional $10 in fines. Harrington and Gima called that a positive step but said that will not ensure that the fines are collected and the money sent to the state.

The problem is likely to get worse at the start of 2009 when officials will start taking samples from all persons arrested as well as convicted of felonies. In 2004, the latest year for which figures were available, there were 522,781 felony arrests in California.

For Gail Abarbanel, director of the Rape Treatment Center at Santa Monica-UCLA Medical Center, the program has been a source of both exhilaration -- some rape cases have been solved very rapidly -- and enormous frustration.

"We have the law, the technology and the voice of public behind Prop. 69, but we also have a lot of valuable DNA evidence waiting to be processed," Abarbanel said.

Prominent criminal defense lawyers also are alarmed by the program's failings.

"It is a loss for prosecutors who want to expeditiously solve crimes before the perpetrators can commit more acts of violence and a loss for innocent suspects who do not want to be wrongly arrested an prosecuted," said Peter Neufeld, co-founder of the Innocence Project at Benjamin Cardozo Law School in New York, which has used DNA evidence to exonerate more than 180 wrongly convicted persons over the past 15 years.

Currently, the state lab, located in a modest office park, has 34 vacant employee spots. At the same time, it faces an onslaught of new work.

Gima complimented state Corrections officials for doing an efficient job of collecting samples . But the Richmond lab simply has been unable to keep up -- even with many staffers working overtime and weekends.

"We are very proud of what we have accomplished but we are not happy with that backlog," Gima emphasized.

The new law provides that if the state lab is unable to process a sample within six months it should be outsourced to a private laboratory. So far, the state has sent 166,000 samples to three private labs. However, the state lab staff has to verify every DNA profile the private lab processes, adding to their workload. Earlier this year, the state had to stop sending out samples because it couldn't pay the private labs, Gima said.

"DNA testing has really outstanding potential in terms of not only helping the police to investigate crimes, and also exonerate people who are innocent. But there are a lot of gaps to get DNA where it needs to go," said Barry Fisher, long time director of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's crime laboratory.

Slaying Suspect Free By Mistake (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Prince William County officials accidentally released a man charged with murder and didn't notice the mistake until five days later, authorities said yesterday.

Authorities said that they have no idea where Christopher T. Broady is and that he is dangerous.

"He is on trial for murder so that should give you an indication of the seriousness of this, of how hard we are trying to get him back," Manassas Detective Christine Perry said. "This is a priority. . . . It is number one."

Broady, 19, is charged with shooting a D.C. man in the head in an apparent drug dispute. He walked out of jail Friday, and the mistake was not noticed until Tuesday.

"He could be anywhere. He could be in Arizona, Mexico, South America," Prince William Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert (D) said.

Jail officials and prosecutors said Broady was released in a period of confusion after murder charges against him had been dropped in Prince William Circuit Court but were pending in General District Court.

"I think the breakdown was in the overall process," Jail Superintendent Charles "Skip" Land said. "I think we took the steps to protect the public and verify it and, unfortunately, the jail released him when the courts wanted him held."

Broady is charged with killing Bernard S. Matthews, 22, on Feb. 1. Matthews was shot and left lying near Bruckner Road in the Georgetown South community of Prince William. The slaying made headlines because another man robbed Matthews before police could take him to the hospital. He died the next day.

A week later, authorities found Broady in Danville and charged him with murder in Matthews's slaying and possession of a firearm in the commission of a felony. He told his girlfriend's father that the shooting was over drugs, according to court testimony by the father, James Holmes.

The path to Broady's release began when Holmes did not show up to testify at an Aug. 21 hearing in Circuit Court. That prompted authorities to drop the charges in that court. But simultaneously, prosecutors charged Broady in General District Court. He should have been held pending a preliminary hearing in that court.

Prosecutors also mistakenly sought a second indictment against Broady. When that indictment was returned Sept. 5, prosecutors later dropped it because the case was pending in the lower court.

That's when jail officials saw the paperwork saying Broady should be released. Land said officials called court clerks to check that the charges were dismissed and were told they were.

Broady was allowed to walk out at 11:16 a.m. Friday.

The jail had been facing scrutiny after officials held a Manassas man in custody two months after he should have been released. Court and jail officials blamed a combination of human error and cultural differences on the incident, but the problem also came down to a miscommunication between two branches of the criminal justice system. The courts had listed him as Fernando Antonio Antonio Cruz and the jail had him as Fernando Antonio Cruz.

Cruz was supposed to be released Dec. 12 but wasn't let out until Feb. 15.

"I think of course this is again an unfortunate case," Land said. "We are crowded, but I feel we run a safe agency, and I think the community is safe. I apologize for this happening.

"I just hope we can get Mr. Broady back without incident," he said. "The quicker the better."

Police have launched a nationwide search for Broady. They have interviewed Broady's family, friends and associates and said they have no leads. They are asking anyone with information to call 703-330-0330 and are offering a $1,000 reward if it leads to his arrest.

Ebert called the incident "very unfortunate" and said his office made a mistake by indicting Broady a second time. He said he takes responsibility for what happened.

"Occasionally a mistake happens, and this is one of those times," Ebert said. "They should have never released him. We should have never indicted him. It was just combination of things that happened that will probably never happen again."

Anthony Kostelecky, Broady's court-appointed attorney, said he got a call Tuesday from police telling him his client was released. "I was dumbfounded," he said. "I can see how a mistake might be made, but at the same time it's a big mistake."

4th Animal-welfare Activist Sent To Prison (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) _ A fourth animal rights activist who helped incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals was sentenced Wednesday to prison.

Joshua Harper, a West Coast coordinator for Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, was sentenced to three years in prison and was ordered to help pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people he helped terrorize.

On Tuesday, three other members of the group were sentenced to prison for terms ranging from four to six years. Two other members of the group still await sentencing: Andrew Stepanian, SHAC's New York coordinator, and Darius Fullmer, an organizer who researched the group's targets. They were scheduled to be sentenced Tuesday.

Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a Britain-based company that tests drugs and household products on animals.

The government charged that the group waged a five-year campaign against the company, posting the names, addresses and phone numbers of Huntingdon employees and those who do business with the company, and personal information such as where they go to church and where their children attend school.

Many of those people saw their homes vandalized and received threatening e-mails, faxes and phone calls.

The group, based in Philadelphia, maintained its actions were protected under the First Amendment.

The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism.

Trenton: Activist Sentenced (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

An animal rights activist who was part of a group convicted of helping to incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals was sentenced to prison yesterday in Federal District Court. The activist, Joshua Harper, a West Coast coordinator for Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, was sentenced to three years and ordered to help pay $1 million in restitution. On Tuesday, three other members of the group were sentenced to terms ranging from four to six years. In March, they were convicted of using a Web site to incite harassment against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a British company with a lab in East Millstone that tests products on animals.

Matheson Concurs With Reid On The Thorny Issue (SLT)

By Thomas Burr, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - At least one Utah congressman says the federal government should be more involved in prosecuting polygamy crimes, while others say the matter is largely a concern of state and local law enforcement.

"Crimes against children cannot be tolerated," Rep. Jim Matheson said in a statement Wednesday. "I would support additional federal assistance to help prosecute these crimes."

The state's lone Democrat in Congress was responding to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's call a day earlier for a federal task force to investigate polygamist activity in the West.

The Justice Department said Wednesday it is reviewing a letter from Reid to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to appoint a team to probe, and prosecute, if necessary, accusations of "systemic child abuse" in "this modern day polygamy movement."

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom," wrote Nevada's Reid, who is LDS. "But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated. Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice."

Matheson's district includes the polygamist enclave of Hildale, which, along with Colorado City, Ariz., is the base for the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, led by Warren Jeffs. Jeffs was captured late last month after being among the FBI's most wanted list on charges of being an accomplice to rape in arranging marriages of young girls to adult members of the church.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said polygamy "is against the law," and prosecuting it is largely the job of local and state law enforcement.

"But the federal government should definitely back them up, especially when these activities cross state lines," Hatch said in a statement, adding, "As for an investigation, any attention to this issue is helpful, that's for sure."

GOP Rep. Chris Cannon's spokesman Charles Isom said his boss has "full faith in" the states' abilities to prosecute polygamy.

"Congressman Cannon has every confidence that the attorney generals in the Western states, working with law enforcement, are well-qualified to take on this issue," Isom said.

The offices of Rep. Rob Bishop and Sen. Bob Bennett did not answer a request Wednesday for comment on Reid's letter.

The anti-polygamy group Tapestry Against Polygamy praised Reid's call for an investigation, saying "it's about time this has happened."

These "civil rights violations have gone on for over 50 years and finally an outsider is coming in and has to do our housecleaning for us," said Vicki Prunty, executive director of the group. "That should be an embarrassment to the state of Utah and Arizona, but we need this to happen and if we couldn't do it ourselves, let someone else take the initiative to get the job done."

Prunty, a former polygamist wife, added that polygamy is not just a Utah problem and the federal government and states are going to have to work together to address the problems.

"Some of that's already happening," Utah's chief deputy attorney general, Kirk Torgensen, said of Reid's call for more federal assistance.

"We have had several meetings with our federal counterparts on several issues. I hate it to sound like this is some new idea and we haven't been working collectively on things, because we really have."

Torgensen, though, says he welcomes more federal involvement, especially if the Internal Revenue Service could provide help in investigating purported tax fraud in polygamist havens.

"It's ripe for someone to give a serious look," he said.

Polygamy Proposal Called 'witch Hunt' (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 14, 2006

Polygamous groups are upset over a Nevada senator's call for a Justice Department probe into their lives and activities.

"It is disconcerting to have a senator take a real strong position on that," said one Utah polygamist, who asked the Deseret Morning News not to use his name. He said all of his wives are consenting adults. "It appears to be a reaction to (Warren) Jeffs and the FLDS culture."

In a letter sent Tuesday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Senate Minority leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., reacted to the capture of Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs and suggested creating a federal task force to look into polygamous communities in Western states.

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom. But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated," Reid wrote. "Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice."

Members of the polygamous community of Centennial Park, Ariz., called Reid's request a "modern-day witch hunt."

"Polygamy is not a federal offense but is to be regulated under the prerogative of state's rights," said Joyce Steed of the Centennial Park Action Committee. "Therefore, one could question what his justification is for asking the federal government to target their efforts on an unpopular minority. We can be sure polygamy does not represent a personal moral issue for the senator, coming out of the state that has legalized prostitution."

Reid's letter tries to distance the fundamentalist sects from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, of which he is a member.

But the pro-polygamy group Principle Voices feared a task force could be too invasive.

"I would like to know why he feels that's necessary," said Anne Wilde. "I thought the attorney generals in Utah and Arizona both were doing a good job separating the crime from the culture."

Tapestry Against Polygamy, a Utah-based group that opposes polygamy, hailed Reid's call for a task force, saying abuses in polygamy are prevalent throughout the West.

"This is no longer a Utah problem. It will take federal intervention," said Tapestry director Vicky Prunty.

But some in the Utah Attorney General's Office said a task force was unnecessary.

"We have been working for several years with our federal partners," Chief Deputy Attorney General Kirk Torgensen said Wednesday. "They have been fantastic."

The FBI has been investigating Jeffs and had put him on its Ten Most Wanted list. Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas. He is currently being held in Hurricane's Purgatory Jail without bail pending a Sept. 27 court appearance.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against him, but would not say if it was conducting its own investigations.

Jeffs, 50, is facing rape as an accomplice charges in 5th District Court in St. George. He is accused of forcing a teenage girl into a polygamous marriage with an older man. In Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is charged with sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor.

In his letter, Reid asked the Justice Department to assist prosecutors in Utah and Arizona in their cases, including filing federal charges should Jeffs be acquitted.

Mohave County Attorney Matt Smith indicated he would be willing to take the help.

"If there could be a charge of moving these minors across state lines for sexual purposes, that would be a great assistance to what we are trying to do," he said, "which is to stop these underage, so-called marriages and to stop the men up there from having sex with girls before they reach their 18th birthday."

Texas Court To Reconsider DeLay Charge (AP-Y)

By April Castro

AP, September 13, 2006

Texas' highest criminal appeals court agreed Wednesday to consider reinstating a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a move that could delay his trial until next year.

DeLay is facing felony money laundering and conspiracy counts that stem from Republican fundraising in the 2002 legislative races. He stepped down as majority leader after the charges were filed and announced his resignation from Congress a few months later.

"It's just another bump in the road," DeLay attorney Dick DeGuerin said.

A state district judge threw out one of two conspiracy charges in December and let the money laundering charge stand. Prosecutors asked the appeals court to reinstate the dropped conspiracy charge, a move that has postponed trial proceedings on the other charges.

DeGuerin argues that the dropped charge accuses DeLay of conspiring to violate the election code as it stood in 2003, and that the transaction was legal at the time it was made. The second conspiracy charge accuses DeLay of conspiring to launder money.

Early on, DeLay had hoped to have the case resolved quickly so he could regain his leadership position in Congress. But with his resignation behind him, he is working on a book that he says will address how his career "furthered the conservative cause" and helped change the culture of Washington.

"The time crush is not there anymore," DeGuerin said. "Of course he'd like to get it over with as quickly as possible, but he's gone on in his life and has got other things to do."

DeLay and other Texas Republicans have accused prosecutor Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, of conducting a political vendetta. Earle's office did not comment Wednesday.

Prosecutors accuse Delay and two political consultants of funneling $190,000 in illegal corporate money to the Republican National Committee, which then donated the same amount to Texas candidates. Under Texas law, corporate money can't be directly used for political campaigns.

DeLay and the consultants, Jim Ellis and John Colyandro, say the transaction was legal.

3 Bilked Medicaid Of Millions Using Fake Billings, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-Peña

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

Two brothers, a doctor in Brooklyn and an owner of pharmacies in Brooklyn and Queens, led a conspiracy that defrauded Medicaid of millions of dollars by billing the program for H.I.V. drugs and other medicines that were never given to patients, federal prosecutors say.

The United States attorney's office announced the arrest yesterday of the brothers, Dr. Muhammad Ejaz Ahmad and Muhammad Nawaz Ahmad, and a third man, Mohammad Tanveer, a pharmacy employee, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government, punishable by up to five years in prison. The complaint against them points to a larger conspiracy, involving "others known and unknown."

Two law enforcement officers posing as H.I.V. patients took secret audio and video recordings at the doctor's office and the pharmacies, according to a statement filed with United States District Court in Manhattan by an F.B.I. agent, Shawn R. Mullen. He said that the undercover officers, like real patients, were given some drugs, but that the conspirators billed Medicaid for many more prescriptions than were ever dispensed.

The defendants paid the patients $40 for each trip to the doctor's office or pharmacy, the agent said — which prosecutors noted is more than the $30 Medicaid paid the doctor for the visit. They described those payments as illegal kickbacks to the patients, suggesting that at least some patients were aware of the scheme.

The United States Attorney's Office would not put an overall dollar amount on the cost of the fraud against Medicaid, the joint federal and state health plan for the poor. But the complaint states that for just three antiviral drugs — among many medicines used to treat H.I.V. infection and its side effects — the three pharmacies billed Medicaid for $2.5 million for drugs that they never received from their distributors.

"My guy says he's absolutely innocent of anything, that he's a legitimate businessman," said Patrick Bruno, the lawyer for Mr. Ahmad, the pharmacy owner. The other defendants have not yet hired lawyers, he said.

Dr. Ahmad, 49, practiced internal medicine at an office at 1121 Coney Island Avenue, in central Brooklyn, and lives in Albertson, in Nassau County.

Doctors are supposed to make information about themselves available to the public — things like medical education, malpractice judgments and hospital affiliations — through a State Department of Health Web site. Dr. Ahmad does not appear on that Web site.

The complaint says that Dr. Ahmad's wife and his brother, who is 38, were co-owners of the three pharmacies involved in the Medicaid scheme. The wife is not named, and is not charged with a crime. Mr. Bruno said the younger Mr. Ahmad, who lives in Floral Park, in Nassau County, also has a medical degree but has never practiced medicine.

Mr. Tanveer, 49, also lives in Floral Park.

All three men are from Pakistan but are longtime United States residents, according to federal officials and Mr. Bruno. They said the Ahmad brothers are citizens, but Mr. Tanveer is not.

At an arraignment late yesterday, bail was set at $300,000 for each of the Ahmad brothers, Mr. Bruno said, and "we hope to make bail within a day." Both he and a spokeswoman for the prosecutors said they did not know the bail set for Mr. Tanveer.

The allegations in the complaint cover about two and a half years, but federal officials say they are looking at earlier years as well, to determine how far back the fraud goes.

The complaint says that patients with H.I.V. who visited Dr. Ahmad were steered to the pharmacies owned by his brother and wife: Stay Slim Pharmacy, less than a block away from Dr. Ahmad's office, at 1166 Coney Island Avenue; Script Depot, at 99-06 63rd Road in Rego Park, Queens; and Nash Pharmacy, at 47-07 Francis Lewis Boulevard in Bayside, Queens, where Mr. Tanveer works. In other cases, the doctor got the drugs from the pharmacies, and patients picked them up from him.

One undercover officer got three months' worth of drugs, but Nash Pharmacy billed Medicaid for eight months' worth, and tried to bill for more, the complaint says. Though Nash lies in another borough, prescriptions from Dr. Ahmad accounted for three-fourths of the pharmacy's Medicaid billing last year.

The complaint also says that a real patient of Dr. Ahmad's received H.I.V. drugs, but Medicaid records for that patient also show that over 22 months, the doctor prescribed $58,000 worth of other medications that the patient says he never took.

One of the stranger elements of the case is the complaint's description of what it calls kickbacks to the patients. It says that each time an undercover officer met any of the three defendants, the other man would hand him $40, without being asked for money, and without any explanation of what it was for.

CIVIL LAW:

Outed CIA Spy Sues Former State Department Official Over Leak, No Conspiracy Accusation (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-One-time covert CIA officer Valerie Plame sued the former No. 2 official at the State Department on Wednesday for violating her privacy rights.

The suit does not accuse Richard Armitage, who was deputy secretary of state in the Bush administration, of participating in an administration conspiracy to blow her cover.

Plame added Armitage's name to a civil suit in U.S. District Court against Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff I. Lewis Libby and White House adviser Karl Rove.

Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, say the White House leaked Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticisms of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Armitage admitted last week that he told two reporters in 2003 that Plame worked for the CIA, but he said the disclosure was inadvertent. Armitage said he knew of no plan to leak Plame's identity; some people said the admission disproved the conspiracy theory.

By adding Armitage's name to the suit, Plame's lawyers set up a different scenario. They contend a White House conspiracy existed, but that Armitage's leak was independent of it.

Armitage is accused of violating Plame's privacy rights. He is not accused of violating the Wilsons' constitutional rights to equal protection and freedom of speech, but those allegations remain against the White House officials.

Wilson discounted reports that then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from Niger to make a nuclear weapon. Such a claim wound up in President George W. Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has investigated the leak for years and has not charged anyone with intentionally leaking Plame's identity. Libby is under indictment for lying to authorities about his conversations with reporters.

Novak Accuses Plame Source Of Distortion (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Columnist Robert D. Novak, who first revealed Valerie Plame's employment by the CIA and touched off a lengthy federal leak investigation, is accusing his primary source of misrepresenting their conversation to make the source's role in the disclosure seem more casual than it was.

In an unusual column that appears today, Novak says his initial source, former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage, was more sure of Plame's ties to the CIA than the source has indicated. Novak adds that Armitage linked her directly to her husband's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger and suggested the disclosure would be a good item for Novak's column.

This differs from Armitage's assertions last week that his disclosure was made in an offhand manner and that he did not know why Plame's husband was sent to Niger.

Armitage, in an interview yesterday, said he stood by his account and disputed Novak's.

The disagreement between Novak and Armitage now covers even the length of their conversation in Armitage's office at the State Department on July 8, 2003. The fallout from that meeting eventually became a consuming political topic in Washington and led to Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's indictment last October of Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of lying to investigators.

The leak of Plame's name touched off a major political controversy because of media reports at the time that the White House was attempting to discredit Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson was sent by the CIA to Niger in 2002 to investigate whether Iraq was trying to buy nuclear weapons material there, and on July 6, 2003, he wrote a column accusing the White House of deliberately twisting intelligence about the Iraqi program to justify the U.S. invasion.

Wilson's accusations infuriated the White House, and Fitzgerald has said in court documents that some administration officials wanted to undermine Wilson by suggesting that his assignment resulted from nepotism.

Plame sued Armitage yesterday, accusing him of violating her privacy rights.

Fitzgerald has not declared his probe of the leak finished, 2 1/2 years after it began, although he told Armitage in a Feb. 24 letter that "absent unexpected developments, I do not anticipate seeking any criminal charges against you."

In his initial July 14, 2003, column, Novak wrote that Wilson "never worked for the CIA, but his wife, Valerie Plame, is an agency operative on weapons of mass destruction." Novak also wrote that "two senior administration officials told me his wife suggested sending Wilson to Niger to investigate."

Novak did not identify his sources, but Armitage admitted publicly for the first time last week that he was one. White House political adviser Karl Rove earlier confirmed he was the other.

In confirming his role, Armitage said his disclosure to Novak was done in an offhand way. At the end of their conversation, "Novak asked me, 'Hey, why did the CIA send Mr. Wilson to Niger?' I said, 'I don't know, but I think his wife worked out there,' " Armitage said.

Novak criticized Armitage for not revealing his involvement before now. Armitage said he remained silent because Fitzgerald warned him it might jeopardize the investigation. He said he cooperated fully with Fitzgerald's investigation since realizing on Oct. 1, 2003, that he was a source for that Novak column.

But Novak says in today's column that Armitage's statements "obscured what he really did" and that "Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he 'thought' might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson."

Novak said further that "Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat. . . . He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column." In an interview, Novak said that Armitage effectively described it as stock, Washington-insider information of the sort that often appeared in the column.

Armitage, in reply, said his disclosure to Novak was inadvertent and noted that Novak himself described it as "offhand" in an Oct. 1, 2003, column. Armitage said he could not recall whether he identified the CIA division where Wilson's wife worked. He added that he rejects any suggestion he was deliberately trying to plant the information, explaining that "I had no reason to wish him [Wilson] any ill" and that Wilson "was simply verifying what had already been reported [about Iraq] through State channels."

Lobbyist Ken Duberstein, a friend of Armitage who helped arrange Novak's meeting with him, said yesterday that Armitage's account precisely matches what Armitage told him in October 2003.

Armitage's Leak (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

When Richard Armitage finally acknowledged last week that he was my source three years ago in revealing Valerie Plame Wilson as a CIA employee, the former deputy secretary of state's interviews obscured what he really did. I want to set the record straight based on firsthand knowledge.

First, Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he "thought" might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Second, Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column.

An accurate depiction of what Armitage actually said deepens the irony of his being my source. He was a foremost internal skeptic of the administration's war policy, and I had long opposed military intervention in Iraq. Zealous foes of George W. Bush transformed me, improbably, into the president's lapdog. But they cannot fit Armitage into the left-wing fantasy of a well-crafted White House conspiracy to destroy Joe and Valerie Wilson. The news that he, and not Karl Rove, was the leaker was devastating for the left.

A peculiar convergence had joined Armitage and me on the same historic path. During his quarter of a century in Washington, I had had no contact with Armitage before our fateful interview. I tried to see him in the first 2 1/2 years of the Bush administration, but he rebuffed me -- summarily and with disdain, I thought.

Then, without explanation, in June 2003, Armitage's office said the deputy secretary would see me. This was two weeks before Joe Wilson outed himself as author of a 2002 report for the CIA debunking Iraqi interest in buying uranium in Africa.

I sat down with Armitage in his State Department office the afternoon of July 8 with tacit rather than explicit ground rules: deep background with nothing said attributed to Armitage or even to an anonymous State Department official. Consequently, I refused to identify Armitage as my leaker until his admission was forced by "Hubris," a new book by reporters Michael Isikoff and David Corn that absolutely identified him.

Late in my hour-long interview with Armitage, I asked why the CIA had sent Wilson -- who lacked intelligence experience, nuclear policy expertise or recent contact with Niger -- on the African mission. He told The Post last week that his answer was: "I don't know, but I think his wife worked out there."

Neither of us took notes, and nobody else was present. But I recalled our conversation that week in writing a column, while Armitage reconstructed it months later for federal prosecutors. He had told me unequivocally that Mrs. Wilson worked in the CIA's Counterproliferation Division and that she had suggested her husband's mission. As for his current implication that he never expected this to be published, he noted that the story of Mrs. Wilson's role fit the style of the old Evans-Novak column -- implying to me that it continued reporting Washington inside information.

Valerie Plame Wilson's name appeared in my column July 14, 2003, but it was not until Oct. 1 that I was contacted about it by Armitage, indirectly. Washington lobbyist Kenneth Duberstein, Armitage's close friend and political adviser, called me to say that the deputy secretary feared he had "inadvertently" (the word Armitage used in last week's interviews) disclosed Mrs. Wilson's identity to me in July and was considering resignation. (Duberstein's phone call was disclosed in the Isikoff-Corn book, which used Duberstein as a source. They reported that Duberstein was responsible for arranging my unexpected interview with Armitage.)

Duberstein told me Armitage wanted to know whether he was my source. I did not reply because I was sure that Armitage knew he was the source. I believed he contacted me Oct. 1 because of news the weekend of Sept. 27-28 that the Justice Department was investigating the leak. I cannot credit Armitage's current claim that he realized he was the source only when my Oct. 1 column revealed that the official who gave me the information was "no partisan gunslinger."

Armitage's silence for the next 2 1/2 years caused intense pain for his colleagues in government and enabled partisan Democrats in Congress to falsely accuse Rove of being my primary source. When Armitage now says he was mute because of special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's request, that does not explain his silent three months between his claimed first realization that he was the source and Fitzgerald's appointment on Dec. 30, 2003. Armitage's tardy self-disclosure is tainted because it is deceptive.

Anthrax Victim's Widow Says Government May Know Who Killed Husband (PALMBEACHP)

By Eliot Kleinberg, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 14, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Maureen Stevens says the federal government probably knows who killed her husband.

She believes they're not telling because that might reveal things the government doesn't want revealed.

Nearly five years after Bob Stevens' death, the first in the anthrax attacks that terrified a nation, "I want to know what happened," his widow, who's sued the government, said Wednesday from her lawyer's office. "I want to go into court and find out what happened. What information's obviously there. The truth is there."

Bob Stevens of Lantana, a photo editor for Boca Raton-based tabloid The Sun, died in October 2001, after he apparently opened mail laced with the deadly substance.

The government said in February of 2002 that it had a "short list" of 18 to 20 people who had the knowledge, equipment, access, and motive to obtain and "weaponize" anthrax. Richard Schuler, Stevens' attorney, said Wednesday it might be fewer than a dozen.

Stevens filed suit in December 2003, alleging security lapses at the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases in Fort Detrick, Md., led to her husband's death. A federal judge refused to dismiss the case and it has been in front of a federal appeals court for nearly a year. The government has argued proceeding with the suit would jeopardize the ongoing search for the killer.

In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said he could not comment because the suit is still active.

Stevens said she's had only two contacts with the FBI since shortly after her husband's death. Agents talked with her in West Palm Beach in July 2003.

And she and families of the other four people confirmed killed by anthrax met with the agency in Washington in November of last year.

Stevens said the agents told the families they were getting close to solving the case and that she felt positive after that meeting. But, she said Wednesday, "it was just lip service. I don't want to say things like this, but I do feel that."

And Schuler said, "To only get with families once in five years, and to give what's only window dressing, I believe is a disgrace."

Stevens said she still believes the case will be solved.

"I have to be patient," Stevens said.

But, she said of her suit, "What else do I have?" she said. "Do I stand on a street corner and ask everybody to ask the government for answers? It's not going to happen."

Federal Judge Questions Data Used By Smokers To Define Class (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 14, 2006

A federal judge Wednesday expressed skepticism over a proposed class action lawsuit that would seek as much as $200 billion in damages against the tobacco industry for its allegedly deceptive marketing of light cigarettes.

In a daylong hearing, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein wondered how the plaintiffs could define a viable class -- and accurately assess damages -- when the tens of millions of people who have smoked light cigarettes might have chosen to do so for any number of reasons.

While the plaintiffs in part rely on a study that shows 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers were attracted by perceived health benefits that experts now claim do not exist, Weinstein said consumers could have relied on those perceived benefits to varying degrees, or even known that those health benefits were illusory.

"How many people deep down knew they were getting something dangerous, but were willing to pay for the illusion it wasn't?" Weinstein said.

He added: "You can't get away from the contention of the defendants that every smoker is somewhat different."

Michael D. Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington, D.C., a firm for the plaintiffs, said the tobacco industry's marketing had the goal of shifting its buyers to light cigarettes, beginning in 1971, because of growing health concerns about smoking. If they had not, he said, smokers would have "quit in droves" -- a comment that was greeted with chuckles from the audience.

"The tobacco industry foisted a huge deception on the consuming public," Hausfeld said. A Brooklyn jury, he said, would have no trouble understanding what it means to be "cheated."

Hausfeld said light-cigarette smokers had essentially overpaid -- by as much as 50 percent to 80 percent per pack of cigarettes -- for a product that promised something it could not deliver. He said the plaintiffs were eligible for treble damages, which could amount to $600 billion.

Theodore M. Grossman of Jones Day in Cleveland, which represents defendant R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, called the 90 percent figure a "nonsense statistic" and said the plaintiffs had "no clue what the numbers are" in terms of how many people relied on the word "light" when choosing their brand of cigarettes.

Grossman said the plaintiffs arrived at the 90 percent figure by asking smokers what they would do if presented with the opportunity to buy one of two cigarettes, both with the same taste but one with fewer health risks.

"[It's] a question that only a suicidal person could answer in the negative," Grossman said.

He said that an expert for the plaintiffs had also found that 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers liked the taste of their cigarettes, and would continue to smoke them if they were told that they had the same health risks as other cigarettes.

Murray R. Garnick of Arnold & Porter in Washington, D.C., which represents defendant Philip Morris USA Inc., said that for the plaintiffs to succeed on a civil claim under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, they would have to establish a reasonable reliance on an alleged misrepresentation.

"The bottom line is the plaintiffs have to figure out what percentage of class members believed light cigarettes were safer," Garnick said.

Grossman said, "We have a class of virtually no one."

Weinstein pointed out that tobacco companies sold light and regular cigarettes at the same price, further complicating how the plaintiffs could identify damages to the class.

"You just can't allow a jury to grab a number out of thin air," the judge said. "There has to be some basis in reality."

The defendants asked the court to grant their motion for summary judgment. Weinstein reserved decision.

The case, McLaughlin v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 04-CV-1945, was filed in 2004 and rivals, in terms of lawyers and paperwork, some of the largest cases Weinstein, 84, has handled in his career, including mass torts involving firearms, asbestos and Agent Orange.

About 40 attorneys took seats in the well and jury box Wednesday, and the judge's bench was piled high with boxes and bound documents (the judge sat at a table closer to the parties).

Another voluminous document -- a 1,742-page opinion by Judge Gladys Kessler of U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia -- may also play a role in the case.

Last month, Kessler, ruling in a racketeering suit brought by the U.S. Justice Department, said the tobacco industry had defrauded consumers through false marketing and promotion of light cigarettes as less harmful than regular cigarettes.

The day after the ruling was released, Weinstein asked both parties in his case to brief the issue of collateral estoppel. The tobacco companies have claimed that Kessler's ruling should not prevent them from relitigating issues that she decided in her case.

Judge Weighs New Trial Against Tobacco Companies (NYT)

By Melanie Warner And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

A federal judge is considering whether tobacco companies should be tried on the question of whether they deceived smokers for years about the safety of light cigarettes.

After hearing a day of arguments yesterday, Judge Jack B. Weinstein, of Federal District Court in downtown Brooklyn, did not indicate whether he would grant class-action status to the closely watched case. But he did ask lawyers for the plaintiffs how they were determining the number of smokers potentially affected and possible damages.

In the case, known as Schwab after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab, lawyers asserted that cigarette makers had deceived smokers into thinking that light cigarettes, representing 45 percent of the market, were safer or less addicting.

Lawyers are seeking a national class action of tens of millions of smokers and are proposing that tobacco companies pay damages of $20 billion to $200 billion. The case was filed under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act, which entitles plaintiffs to triple damages.

Judge Weinstein is expected to decide within several weeks whether to grant class-action status.

The case, filed in 2004, is part of the latest legal assault against tobacco companies. After successfully warding off litigation by people claiming to have been injured by smoking, plaintiffs' lawyers have turned their attention to attacking cigarette companies for defrauding consumers by selling light cigarettes.

While many of these so-called light cases have been unsuccessful, the Schwab case follows an opinion last month by a federal judge in the District of Columbia, who found that cigarette companies engaged in decades of fraud and racketeering, including misleading smokers and concealing information about the health risks of light cigarettes.

That ruling, by Judge Gladys Kessler in a case brought by the Justice Department, was a victory for tobacco companies in the sense that they did not have to pay a possible $10 billion in damages. But the 1,600-page opinion was a searing indictment of conduct by tobacco companies over the last 40 years.

Plaintiffs' lawyers in the Schwab case want to rely on those findings. "The tobacco industry has foisted a huge deception on the public and the public health community," Michael D. Hausfeld, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll, said at yesterday's hearing. "They understood they were selling death but they had to disguise it."

Attorneys for tobacco companies argued that the Schwab case should not be certified as a class action because differences in the way people smoked cigarettes could affect the amount of tar and nicotine taken in. They also argued that people smoked cigarettes for a variety of reasons and that many people smoked light cigarettes because they liked the taste, not for health reasons or as part of an attempt to quit smoking.

"This is a tiny class of people," said Theodore Grossman, an attorney for R. J. Reynolds, the country's second-largest tobacco company. He also said the plaintiffs had failed to show which people were relying on light cigarettes for health reasons.

Tobacco analysts on Wall Street have been expecting Judge Weinstein, who is 84 and has earned a reputation as a champion of consumer rights, to certify the case as a class action.

In a research note last year, Robert Campagnino, a tobacco analyst for Prudential Financial, called Judge Weinstein a "thorn in the side of the tobacco industry."

But at the conclusion of the hearing yesterday, Judge Weinstein asked pointed questions to the plaintiffs' attorneys to explain how they would determine how many people might have been defrauded by the marketing of light cigarettes and how they would calculate damages.

Workforce Central Florida Settles $3.5M Justice Department Claim (ORLANDOBIZ)

Orlando Business Journal, September 14, 2006

Workforce Central Florida and the Workforce Central Florida Foundation Inc. have paid nearly $3.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. Department of Justice that they defrauded the government by misusing federal grant funds to improve their privately owned offices and One-Stop Center in Lake Mary.

However, no individuals involved in the case have been either charged with a crime or dismissed from their job because it was considered an unintentional violation of federal rules concerning allowable charges, one described by Workforce officials as an "accounting dispute."

Still, it is believed to be the largest settlement ever levied against one of Florida's 24 nonprofit workforce agencies, which are locally chartered organizations designed to provide services such as job placement and training. The organizations are overseen by the state Agency for Workforce Innovation.

"We analyzed every aspect of this transaction and voted at the end (in public session) to do it this way," WCF board member and past Chairman Atlee Mercer says. "Later, in hindsight, the government decided we should have done it differently. We don't agree. We thought we followed the letter of the law."

The settlement has been paid by the foundation through a refinancing of the building that houses Workforce Central Florida, which handles One-Stop centers for Orange, Lake, Osceola, Seminole and Sumter counties. It will not have any impact on the services WCF currently offers, its officials emphasize.

The Workforce Central Florida Foundation is a separate organization set up several years ago to find alternative funding sources to the $26 million in federal funds WCF currently receives annually.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Putting Off Sentencing Is Urged (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino (CA) Sun, September 14, 2006

Members of Congress seek probe of agents' convictions

Sentencing should be delayed for two Border Patrol agents facing 20 years apiece in prison for shooting a drug smuggler and violating his civil rights, 22 congressmen told the Department of Justice on Wednesday.

In a letter, the congressmen asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to postpone sentencing and review the case against Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean.

"Due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding the prosecution of agents Ramos and Compean, the House Judiciary Committee has already recognized the need for a thorough review of this case by calling for congressional hearings and an investigation of the Department of Homeland Security, Office of the Inspector General, U.S. Customs and Border Patrol and the U.S. Attorney's Office," the letter stated.

In a separate letter to the Justice Department, Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas, echoed his colleagues' concerns.

"If the facts I have laid out are accurate, then this prosecution puts the rights of illegal alien drug smugglers ahead of our homeland security and undermines the critical mission of better enforcing current immigration laws," Gohmert wrote.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department had received the letters and is planning a response to the request. She said any comment specifically about the agents' case had to come from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Texas that prosecuted the agents.

Ramos and Compean are facing prison for their roles in the nonfatal shooting of Mexican national Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who ran away from the agents after entering the United States from Mexico with a van filled with nearly 800 pounds of marijuana. Ramos shot at the smuggler, who he believed pointed a gun at him during a foot chase along the Rio Grande.

The agents were convicted earlier this year by an El Paso jury.

Aldrete-Davila is suing the Border Patrol for $5 million for civil-rights violations.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton defended the successful prosecution of the agents by Assistant U.S. Attorney Deborah Kanof.

"These agents shot an unarmed suspect as he was running away," Sutton said in a news release Wednesday. "If they honestly believed the shootings were justified, then they had no reason to lie about it and destroy the evidence.

"Mr. Compean and Mr. Ramos both told their stories at trial, as did the victim and numerous other witnesses. Texas juries are very well aware of the tough job Border Patrol agents have in this state and give them the benefit of the doubt. In this case, after hearing all the evidence from both sides, the jury didn't buy the defendants' stories."

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., who helped draft the congressional letter, said that after reviewing the agents' case, he and his colleagues noted a number of serious problems with the prosecution.

At a news conference last week, House members, along with Sheriff Terry Crawford of Uvalde County, Texas; TJ Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a union for agents; and Andy Ramirez, chairman of Chino-based Friends of the Border Patrol, discussed evidence they believe needs further review by the Justice Department.

The contingent said they were concerned that past assaults and violence against Border Patrol agents was not admissible in the court and questioned the Border Patrol's official "no pursuit" policy, which prevents agents from pursuing fleeing suspects unless authorized by a supervisor.

Kanof told The Sun's sister paper, the Ontario-based Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, last month that the agents violated their own pursuit policy and should never have attempted to apprehend Aldrete-Davila in the first place.

Ramos broke an 18-month silence about his altercation with Aldrete-Davila in an exclusive interview published in The Sun and Daily Bulletin on Aug. 6. Compean has been asked by his attorney not to speak to the media while the men's Oct. 18 sentencing hearing is pending.

Group Will Demonstrate In Waters Off Cuba During Summit (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

MIAMI - Cuban exile protesters plan to hold a symbolic, pro-democracy demonstration on a boat in international waters off the communist nation this weekend during a Nonaligned Movement summit, an exile leader said Wednesday.

Ramon Saul Sanchez of the Miami-based exile group Democracy Movement said the "maritime demonstration" is scheduled to take place Saturday. The weeklong summit began Monday.

Current plans call for about 20 demonstrators to leave a Key West marina onboard the 39-foot Democracia after midnight Friday and arrive in international waters off Cuba early Saturday, Sanchez said.

The group will carry symbolic electoral ballots printed with the choice of "dictatorship" or "democracy," fly a large white flag, display posters of Cuba's political prisoners and drop white roses on the water, Sanchez said.

They are demanding free elections and the release of all political prisoners among other things, Sanchez said. The group also hopes to fly a blimp from the ship with the word "Democracia" on it and mirrors that will reflect light and be seen on the island.

Sanchez said he met with representatives of the community relations board of the U.S. Justice Department Wednesday night to discuss plans for the demonstration. The department had no immediate comment.

Coast Guard officials have been notified of the group's plan, Sanchez said.

"They have a right to go out there. Unless they violate territorial waters there's nothing we can do. We can stop the voyage if it's unsafe, but there is no indication of that," Coast Guard Petty Officer Jennifer Johnson said. She confirmed the office had been notified of the group's plans.

The Nonaligned Movement, which includes about two-thirds of the world's nations, was developed during the Cold War as a Third World alternative to the United States and Soviet Union.

The summit in Cuba comes almost two months after President Fidel Castro, 80, announced he was stepping down from power - for the first time in 47 years - to recover from intestinal surgery. He has made no public appearances since. Castro's younger brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro, is Cuba's acting president.

Election Glitches 'could Get Ugly' (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062860

WASHINGTON — Eight weeks before elections that will decide control of Congress, a rush by state and local governments to prepare new voting machines and train poll workers is raising the possibility of trouble reminiscent of the 2000 presidential election standoff.

Problems range from delayed delivery of new equipment to an insufficient supply of trained technicians to fix anticipated problems, voting experts say.

Already this year, glitches have occurred in Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and West Virginia. Maryland became the latest on Tuesday, when technical problems, human errors and staff shortages led officials to keep some polls open an extra hour.

The fall elections shape up as the most technologically perilous since 2000, election officials say, because 30% of the nation's voting jurisdictions will be using new equipment. They include large parts of Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Virginia, scenes of key Senate races. "If you're ever going to have a problem, it's going to be that first election," says Kimball Brace, president of Election Data Services.

Since 2000, nearly half of U.S. counties have switched from punch cards, lever machines and paper ballots to electronic voting or optical-scan ballots read by a computer. They continue to rely on poll workers who are on average 72 years old and lack computer experience.

Since 2002, the federal government has given states $3 billion to upgrade registration and voting systems. Some states, however, still don't have statewide voter registration databases or equipment that people with disabilities can use independently.

Among the other concerns:

•Demand for new equipment, produced largely by four manufacturers, has delayed deliveries.

•States, counties and manufacturers don't have enough technical support staff. Spokesmen for Diebold and Election Systems & Software, two major vendors, say they're continuously seeking people. States such as Maryland, Mississippi and Pennsylvania have advertised for help on the jobs website Monster.com.

"The vendors have done a much better job of selling the machines than they have of servicing them," says Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, which monitors voting changes.

•Touch-screen machines with a paper backup for recounts have caused problems in primaries. Twenty-seven states require a paper trail, up from one in 2004.

"There are so many potential failure points this year that some of it could get ugly," says R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center, which represents state and local election officials.

Balloting Breakdown (WP)

Statewide problems in voting demand bipartisan attention.

IN BALTIMORE, many people who tried to vote early Tuesday found polling places shut because election judges hadn't shown up for work. In Prince George's County, the Board of Elections inexplicably went home early yesterday morning without counting all the primary ballots. And Montgomery County endured not only the morning fiasco with inoperable machines but also chaos at night as election officials ran out of paper ballots for extended voting.

Clearly, there is something wrong with the way elections are run in Maryland, and there are plenty of people to share the blame. Let's start at the top with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who bears ultimate responsibility since it is largely his nominees on local boards who run elections county by county. Then there is Linda H. Lamone, chairman of the State Board of Elections and an appointee of Mr. Ehrlich's Democratic predecessor, whose office is charged with the administration of elections across Maryland but who maddeningly said that "there's nothing we can do" about ineptitude on the local level. It is regrettable that these two officials have spent so much time fighting with each other rather than working to guarantee smooth elections.

Partisan bickering over the election process -- on issues ranging from which machines to purchase to whether there should be early voting -- can't have helped the local boards as they prepared for the primary. We are sympathetic to the complaints of hardworking officials about having to deal with new technology and last-minute changes to the ballot. But that cannot be an excuse for the incompetence that led to the breakdowns in Tuesday's voting. As more than one politician has observed, boards of elections do one thing -- run elections -- and they are given plenty of time to get ready.

Disarray on Election Day does more than inconvenience voters. In Baltimore, it has led to conspiracy theories about Republican judges in cahoots. In Prince George's, it has left people wondering why a close county executive race was left undecided for many hours. And in Montgomery, the outcomes of several races were affected.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) is right to call for the removal from office of Board of Elections President Nancy H. Dacek and Election Director Margaret Jurgensen as the first step in restoring integrity to the voting process. It is encouraging that a spokesman said Mr. Ehrlich, in a departure from the stance he took Tuesday, will work with both parties as well as the state board to ensure a better job is done in November. After all, with his name on the ballot, he too has a stake in the outcome.

Calif. Judge Slashes $61 Million FedEx Verdict (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 14, 2006

Calling an initial $61 million verdict "excessive," last week Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stephen Dombrink whittled down a jury award against national shipping company Federal Express and one of its managers to a modest $12.4 million.

In his written decision, Dombrink stated concern that the evidence failed to support the initial verdict in an employment discrimination case.

"The harassment was mostly just offensive name-calling," Dombrink noted in his Sept. 5 ruling.

In June, the jury handed the $61 million award to two Lebanese-American FedEx drivers who accused a manager of racial discrimination and harassment. The verdict was thought to be the largest single civil rights judgment under California's Fair Employment and Housing Act and the fourth-largest verdict of any kind in Alameda County history.

Plaintiffs attorney Christopher Dolan said last week that he was still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided whether to seek a new trial. Though clearly disappointed by the outcome, Dolan said Dombrink's handling of the issue was "deliberate and thoughtful. I think Judge Dombrink has exercised what he thought to be in the best interest of justice."

Whatever happens on appeal, Dolan said he hopes the initial award continues to send a message to the business community that Arab-Americans will not tolerate harassment in the workplace.

"While this verdict was reduced to $12 million, the next one may not [be]. We hope the clear message isn't diluted by the reduction, and I don't think it should be," he said.

Darin Snyder, head of O'Melveny & Myers' San Francisco office, returned a call for FedEx attorney Debra Belaga and said the firm is proud of its attorneys. Seyfarth Shaw also represented FedEx at trial.

In addition to reducing the award against the shipping company, Dombrink slashed the damages against FedEx manager Stacy Shoun from $1 million to $400,000.

"We look forward to having it reduced even further by the Court of Appeal," said Howard, Rice, Nemerovski, Canady, Falk & Rabkin attorney Bobbie Wilson.

Why Race-based 'Survivor' Makes Us Squirm (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Millions of Americans tonight will watch different races fight for supremacy over a patch of land. No, this is not the latest installment of an Adolf Eichmann production. It is this season's CBS Survivor: Cook Islands.

With a ratings fall from a high of 29.8 million in 2001 to 16.6 million last year, the show's producers are clearly looking for something to captivate more viewers. To do so, they decided to try a TV version of divide and conquer: Fuel the racial identification of viewers, pit them against other races and reap the benefits of racial pride — or racial animus.

Not surprisingly, this year's reality-show theme produced an orgy of condemnations — and, for the producers, a steady stream of free publicity. Of course, denouncing TV producers as craven, ratings-seeking deviates is hardly news. Most executives would make the Rape of Nanking into a reality program if they could avoid Federal Communications Commission fines, throw in bikinis, and capture an additional share of the critical 25-54 demographic age group.

The problem is that this is a reality program that is far too real for our sensibilities. Despite decades of affirmative action, we remain a highly race-conscious society with highly segregated neighborhoods, schools, prisons and — yes — entertainment. More important, the 6-year-old show reflects a growing return to segregationist policies across the country.

Survivor's producers insist that the use of racially segregated teams is designed to boost minority participation and possible success in the show. Moreover, Mark Burnett, executive producer of the show, has said, "I've learned that the social time you spend is predominantly in your own ethnic group."

That rationale is being used in public schools. Arguing that segregation helps minorities perform, states have introduced schools segregated by race, gender and even sexual orientation.

Survivor is embracing a "separate but equal" policy that was the scourge of the civil rights movement, ultimately rejected by the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education. It is now the solution to everything from low school scores to low self-esteem — and apparently low ratings.

Just as producers feel comfortable with segregation, so do legislators. Congress effectively embraced the doctrine in a 2004 law that allows gender-segregated schools to receive federal funds so long as equal opportunities are made available at other schools. The Nebraska Legislature created three school districts in Omaha designed along racial lines with whites, Hispanics and blacks receiving their own districts.

Other states are experimenting with micro-segregation on the individual school or class levels. Recently, Chicago created the Urban Prep Charter Academy for Young Men, a school described as an "all-boys high school to primarily serve black youths."

In addition to racially segregated schools, there are also more than 200 single-sex educational programs, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. New York has five all-girl and three all-boy public schools. Many states, such as Wisconsin, will soon offer not only a segregated high school for girls but also segregated classes in co-ed schools.

The new segregation extends beyond matters of race and gender. New York created the Harvey Milk High School for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students. The courts prevented the city from creating a special school for the Jewish Hasidic community after parents said the children, who were also disabled, experienced "panic, fear and trauma" in public schools because of their different appearance and beliefs.

These schools are sometimes defended as purely voluntary and open to all students — though their purpose and de facto segregation is undeniable. The fact is that these schools affect relatively few students, but they offer appealing images for systems that have failed to address low scores, homophobia and crime.

There is no evidence such segregation leads to significantly higher scores. Any benefit is more likely because of increased money and smaller classes afforded to the students — not some comfort zone created through racial or gender segregation. The research used to support these programs has been challenged as stereotypes dressed up as science. Segregation at the Young Women's Leadership Charter School in Chicago was defended on the basis that it fosters "sisterhood" and that girls can "roll out of bed without worrying about makeup (and) hair," among other benefits.

Given these growing programs, the segregation of Cook Islands is hardly a surprise. We are voting gay students, girls and other groups "off the island" to leave the appearance of tranquility and progress.

Yet, our schools are often the last opportunity for society to monitor and shape future citizens. They were once viewed as ideal forums to reinforce our values of pluralism and tolerance — a managed microcosm of society where students learn to interact with the other races and gender.

Integration themes, however, are not drawing much of a crowd on TV or in society. ABC recently scrapped the reality show Welcome to the Neighborhood, in which various minority groups competed for a house in a conservative white neighborhood.

Ironically, while shows such as The Simple Life appear tediously manufactured, CBS found a theme that resonates with our most base, racist tendencies. The fact is that Cook Islands is repellant not because it looks too little, but too much, like our society. It is a reality that many are likely to watch, but few want to recognize.

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Chief Takes Hands-off Approach To Apple (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The Justice Department's antitrust chief on Wednesday made a case for taking a hands-off approach to Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iTunes music service and iPod music device, which are dominant in the online music business.

He also offered an implicit criticism of European governments that want the iPod player and iTunes music to be compatible with rival products. In June, French lawmakers approved government-backed legislation aimed at forcing Apple to make its online music and its iPod "interoperable" with other products. Regulators in Norway and Sweden have threatened to impose fines if interoperability isn't made possible.

"Apple provides a useful illustration of how an attack on intellectual-property rights can threaten dynamic innovation," Thomas O. Barnett, who heads the Justice Department's antitrust division, said in the text of a speech in which he also noted that he's not investigating Apple's activities.

The music industry has in recent years been hit hard by the illegal downloading of music from the Internet, but the success of Apple's iTunes has boosted the sale of legal downloads and led to forecasts from the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, a trade body, that recorded-music sales will grow in 2006. The concern across Europe is that Apple's products have too much dominance.

"While it is true that Apple's digital-rights-management software ensures that the first recording of a song downloaded from iTunes can only play on an Apple device, consumers can re-record an iTunes song in an MP3 format and play it on other devices; in sum, it is hardly clear that they are locked in," Barnett said.

His remarks came as European regulators traveled to the U.S. to address audiences here, providing U.S. politicians with an opportunity to push back. Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., who co-chairs an intellectual property caucus, in prepared remarks cited "grave concern" about European regulatory tactics, and he complained that forcing Apple to "hand over" its intellectual property would damp future innovation.

Barnett rejected complaints that Apple harmed consumers by selling expensive iPods that lock them in to buying the same costly devices in the future.

"This type of business model has been criticized in the past because the cheap product was the one that was sold first - think cheap razors and expensive replacement blades or cheap printers and expensive replacement ink," Barnett said. "Apple's model is the opposite: consumers buy the expensive iPod device first, then have the option - not the obligation - to use the free iTunes software and buy the cheap iTunes songs."

He also batted down criticisms that Apple is hurting competitors. "Antitrust law protects competition, not competitors," Barnett said. "There are real costs to using antitrust law to protect competitors rather than competition. There is the problem of deterring innovation by the target of the 'dominance' attack: if a firm knows it will have to share its intellectual property or be managed by a committee of government regulators, it may not innovate in the first instance."

Barnett's remarks come as the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission hold a series of hearings dealing with control of the markets by individual firms. He has said that while individual firms with monopoly power can harm consumers, "mere size" doesn't demonstrate harm.

Barnett was confirmed earlier this year after serving as acting head of the antitrust division since June 2005. His confirmation had reportedly been blocked for months by two Republican senators concerned that he would be too tough on mergers.

Airlines Disclose Settlements In Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — United Airlines and American Airlines disclosed settlements Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit stemming from an investigation into alleged price collusion among carriers in the air cargo industry.

Unlike Lufthansa AG, which said Monday it would pay $85 million to settle pending lawsuits in the case, both U.S. carriers said they are not required to make any payments.

The settlements could close the books on their obligations in the case barring further findings. Officials at both American and United, the largest two U.S. airlines, said that if the Justice Department later brings charges against them as a result of its investigation, the settlements would be off.

More than a dozen airlines have been the subject of an investigation initiated by U.S. and European Union officials into suspected price-fixing in the air cargo industry on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance.

Investigators were quoted earlier this year as saying the surcharges apparently originated among European carriers, with U.S. companies then setting their own charges in line with competitors. For carriers to be hit with criminal charges, prosecutors would have to show they were actively conspiring, not just following others' price increases.

A Justice Department spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Tim Smith, a spokesman for Fort Worth, Texas-based American, a unit of AMR Corp., said the carrier had been swept into an investigation that appeared centered on European airlines.

"We do have a settlement with some of the plaintiffs, subject to court approval," he said. "It requires no payment at all by American, and we have been told we are not a target of the investigation."

American would not be forced to change its cargo-pricing policies, Smith said.

Neither American nor United, a unit of UAL Corp., disclosed details of the settlements.

"We are pleased to have reached an agreement with a majority of plaintiffs that will see us dismissed from the civil litigation, pending court approval," said spokesman Brandon Borrman of Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based United, the No. 2 U.S. carrier.

The Financial Times reported Wednesday that Virgin Atlantic Airways also had reached a settlement in the case. The London-based carrier did not respond to a telephone message.

The overall settlement could cost the involved airlines more than $1 billion, according to the newspaper, citing attorneys for the plaintiffs.

House Panel Deals Wright Bill A Setback (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy And Emily Ramshaw, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2006

Committee removes antitrust safeguards; backers discuss ways to protect measure from court disputes

Following a setback in a House committee, North Texas lawmakers were plotting Wednesday evening to reinstate language to protect their Wright amendment legislation from potentially crippling court challenges.

The House Judiciary Committee dealt the latest challenge to the effort to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, removing a phrase that would have immunized the agreement from antitrust claims.

Supporters of the deal remained hopeful they could recover through legislative maneuvers in coming weeks. But given a short legislative calendar and sustained Senate opposition, the outcome remains uncertain.

"I don't think it's a death knell for it," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell. "It's certainly going to make for a lot of discussion between Dallas and Fort Worth and the other parties. Now they're going to have to decide what's really important and what they can live with."

Proponents of the legislation characterized Wednesday's actions as progress even though they opposed the change.

"The process is moving forward," said Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American Airlines. "There are still several steps to determine which version of the bill ultimately gets voted on."

The Wright legislation can now proceed down other avenues after sitting under the control of the Judiciary Committee since late July.

The panel's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and its top Democrat, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, pushed through an amendment removing language that would have effectively exempted the measure from antitrust challenges in court.

Several lawmakers had objected to the language, saying it skirted century-old laws protecting consumers from anticompetitive practices.

Mr. Sensenbrenner said the deal "raises serious competitive concerns" by reducing the number of available gates at Love Field and discouraging Southwest Airlines from using Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

He said the antitrust issues should be litigated in court rather than be sidestepped by Congress in a private agreement.

The amendment, which passed by a voice vote, drew objections from a handful of lawmakers who warned that the amendment would effectively kill the bill.

"As a practical matter, it's the Wright amendment that's anti-consumer and anti-competition," said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. "If we adopt this amendment, we will litigate this thing for the next 10 or 15 years."

The legislation would implement a June agreement by Dallas and Fort Worth, D/FW Airport, American and Southwest to repeal the 27-year-old Wright law in 2014. It would immediately allow one-stop flights anywhere in the U.S. as long as they stopped in the nine-state Wright perimeter.

The agreement also would cut the number of gates available at Love from 32 to 20, a move intended to compensate for an expected increase in traffic, noise and pollution at the inner-city airport. Nineteen gates are now operational.

How the debate started

The antitrust debate – stemming in part from the gate reduction – was sparked by lobbyists representing Love Terminal Partners L.P., owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal. The six-gate facility, which has been largely unused for six years, would be demolished under the agreement.

The group has already sued the parties in federal court under antitrust laws, saying it lost out on a $100 million deal for its terminal because of the agreement.

It remains to be seen whether the five parties to the North Texas compromise would be willing to accept legislation without some kind of antitrust protection.

The groups agreed last week to remove the explicit exemption from competition laws – the words that the judiciary committee removed Wednesday – if other protective language could be added. But no other protections were placed in the legislation. In fact, the committee's change Wednesday said nothing in the legislation "shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws."

What's next for bill

Fort Worth Mayor Mike Moncrief said the setback, while anticipated, is frustrating after working so long and hard to "delicately forge the agreement."

He's waiting to hear from the other North Texas parties before he decides how to proceed. "I think we can still get this ball over the goal line," he said.

The legislation next needs to clear a rules committee that decides how amendments can be introduced on the House floor.

The change by the House Judiciary Committee also puts the House version at odds with the Senate version, which has slowed due to concerns from leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Lawmakers ultimately could focus on a Senate version of the bill that has passed its originating committee there but hasn't been amended further. The goal would be to secure passage in the full Senate, allowing the bill to then move to the full House.

Legislation that passes the House and Senate separately with different language generally goes through a joint conference committee to reconcile changes. The step can be time-consuming for legislation that isn't a top priority by the leaders of each chamber.

On Capitol Hill late Wednesday, lawmakers and other proponents of the agreement discussed whether the House bill would need the original antitrust protection reinstated or new language, or whether it could be accepted with the judiciary committee's changes.

D/FW chief operating officer Kevin Cox said the original language would protect the parties from "any and all frivolous claims thinly veiled under the guise of an antitrust claim."

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said the five North Texas parties have "checked in with each other" at every step along the way to make sure they're comfortable with the language of the agreement.

"Right now, we're still fine," she said. "But if we get to a point where anyone says 'We can't live with that,' then there's no agreement."

She said she's confident that won't happen because the North Texas delegation is so aligned.

Southwest spokeswoman Beth Harbin said Wednesday's action was "good news for consumers" because the judiciary committee approved repealing Wright without altering key provisions of the local agreement.

"Those who feel the local solution is anticompetitive should consider the alternative, which is continuing to live under the Wright amendment where no one benefits," she said.

The Wright agreement faces a tight legislative window, complicating passage by the Dec. 31 deadline outlined in the compromise.

House members plan to return home by early next month to campaign for the November elections. The measure could resurface during a lame-duck session after the election, but then it would face more procedural hurdles. Sens. John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison met Wednesday evening with the ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., to address concerns about the antitrust issue.

House Strips Antitrust Immunity From Wright Agreement (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A U.S. House panel stripped antitrust protections before moving forward Wednesday with legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights from Dallas Love Field after eight years.

The House Judiciary Committee, after brief debate, pushed through a bill modeled after an agreement that would eventually repeal the Wright Amendment and eliminate some gates at Dallas Love Field.

The agreement was forged by Love-based Southwest Airlines, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Dallas Fort Worth International Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. American, based in Fort Worth, has a major hub at DFW.

The bill endorsed Wednesday no longer includes wording that stated the agreement complies with anti-competition laws and gave the Department of Transportation sole authority to decide claims against the arrangement.

Those provisions were opposed by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. He said the claims should be decided by the courts.

"The antitrust laws are there for a purpose," Sensenbrenner said. "They are working, and there should not be legislative determination about what is or is not anticompetitive. The standard antitrust standards that have been applied to commercial arrangements for over 100 years should be applied to this one as well."

An unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division and made public last month said the bill would violate antitrust laws, although the department has not taken an official position.

The agreement calls for shrinking the number of gates at Love Field from 32 to 20, which some argue could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. Only 19 of the 32 gates are currently being used.

Last month, another House committee approved the agreement with the antitrust immunity provision included. House leaders and the Rules Committee will decide which version goes to the floor and whether to allow amendments.

California Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., surprised Democratic colleagues in opposing Sensenbrenner's amendment because of her pro-consumer record. Lofgren said the existing arrangement is worse on consumers. Under the Wright Amendment, Southwest can only fly from Love Field to eight nearby states.

If it isn't passed into law, the agreement expires at the end of the year. It was reached after Southwest Airlines launched a fierce lobbying effort to repeal the 1979 Wright Amendment, named for its author former House Speaker Jim Wright.

The issue split Texas Republicans in the House, although most now support the agreement.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, has taken the lead in trying to pass the legislation. She is sponsoring the bill in the Senate, where the agreement also has raised concerns over whether it violates anticompetition laws.

She had anticipated the House action Tuesday and said she would continue to try to move her bill in the Senate. She also has attached the bill to the transportation spending bill.

Love Field Agreement May Lose Antitrust Protection (BLOOM)

By John Hughesand Mary Schlangenstein, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, September 14, 2006

An agreement between South-west Airlines Co. and American Airlines on service at Love Field in Dallas may face antitrust challenges, possibly scuttling the deal, under a bill approved on Wednesday by a House committee.

The House Judiciary Committee proposal would eliminate antitrust immunity for the carriers under the agreement and let the Justice Department bring any actions it deems necessary.

The committee, which met in Washington, approved the bill after striking the immunity. American is the world's largest airline, while Southwest is the biggest U.S. discount carrier.

The agreement may be ineffective without the immunity, said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. "We will litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years," he told colleagues on the panel. "It will be tied up in court."

Southwest, based in Dallas, has 96 percent of passengers at Love Field. A 1979 federal law known as the Wright Amendment limits nonstop flights from the airport to Texas and eight nearby states.

AMR Corp.'s American and Southwest reached the agreement in June to remove that restriction in eight years and let Southwest immediately connect passengers from Love Field to airports throughout the U.S.

The House committee's proposal "doesn't appear to be a deal breaker," Ed Stewart, a Southwest spokesman, said in an interview. "The important thing is that this is another step toward what we were wanting in the first place, giving customers more choice."

Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American, declined to comment on whether the version approved by the House committee would sink the agreement. The airline is based in Fort Worth, Texas.

"There are more steps to go before we know what's ultimately going to happen," Wagner said. Differences in versions approved by the House Judiciary Committee and the House transportation panel will have to be ironed out, he said.

Rivals, including JetBlue Airways Corp. and Northwest Airlines Corp., raised concerns about the agreement, which cuts the number of available gates at Love Field to 20 from 32.

House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., citing the competitive concerns, asserted his committee's right to review the legislation after it cleared the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee on July 19. Sensenbrenner was one of the sponsors of the proposal to strike the antitrust immunity. That change was approved by a voice vote of his committee.

"Antitrust principles are necessary to preserve competition," said Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., who co-sponsored the change. Northwest has a major flight hub at Detroit Metro Airport, near Conyers' district.

The Consumer Federation of America and the Consumers Union said in a letter to the House Judiciary Committee that the carriers' agreement is "designed to protect market share for Ameri-can and Southwest Airlines."

The Love Field agreement came after a two-year battle in Congress between Southwest, seeking to scrap the Wright Amendment, and American, trying to preserve it. The compromise was crafted by the two carriers, the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, and Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport, where American has its main flight base.

The Wright Amendment was intended to protect the Dallas-Fort Worth airport as the major airfield in northern Texas, while allowing Southwest to remain at Love Field.

Before the bill could become law, it would need to pass in the full House and Senate, then be reconciled in a House-Senate conference committee and sent to the president for his signature.

Wright Bill Advances (DALBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 14, 2006

A U.S. House panel on Wednesday moved forward a bill modeled after the local Wright compromise, but not before stripping the document of antitrust protections, The Associated Press reported.

The House Judiciary Committee removed wording that protected the bill from antitrust legal challenges, The AP said.

The bill is based on an agreement forged by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines (NYSE: AMR), Southwest Airlines (NYSE: LUV) and the Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport that calls for a repeal of Wright Amendment restrictions in eight years.

In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there from 32 to 20. Fort Worth-based American and Dallas-based Southwest both accepted that compromise, which is being debated in Congress.

The Wright Amendment is a 1979 federal law that limits trips from Dallas Love Field to short-haul flights to a few surrounding or nearby states.

An unsigned memo purportedly from the Justice Department's antitrust division began circulating shortly after the bill was introduced. The letter expressed concerns that the bill violates antitrust laws and should not be approved by Congress.

Last month a group of antitrust professors from law schools in Texas and elsewhere said in a letter to congressional leaders that the Dallas-Fort Worth deal to end Wright Amendment flight restrictions will result in higher fares and reduced service for Dallas-Fort Worth fliers.

Tuesday, D/FW Airport put out a letter written by antitrust law experts that refuted the professors' statements by saying an outright repeal of the Wright Amendment has never happened and would face too many challenges.

House Strips Antitrust Immunity From Wright Agreement (FWST)

By Maria Recio

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Judiciary Committee quickly and decisively removed antitrust protections from the Wright Amendment legislation on a voice vote this morning.

Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., joined by the ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., proposed an amendment that removes the antitrust immunity in the bill and inserts additional language reinforcing that nothing in the law governing Dallas Love Field "shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws."

"What this amendment does is state that the antitrust aspects will be litigated," Sensenbrenner said. "What we're saying is that the antitrust laws are there for a purpose."

Conyers, joining the chairman in an unusual show of bipartisanship, said, "I'm not here to say the agreement is pro-competitive or anti-competitive."

Rather, he said, he was also supporting the antitrust laws as the protector of consumers. "For more than a century, the antitrust laws have been the cornerstone of preserving our free-market economy."

Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala., warned that if the amendment remained in the bill, "We'll litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years."

Bachus, who said he sympathized philosophically with the chairman, said he thought Congress ought to support the local agreement reached by Fort Worth, Dallas, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport. "This amendment is going to put it in the courts and do away with an agreement that I didn't think could ever be made," he said.

But Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., countered that the agreement in force during litigation would be the one reached by the cities – allowing immediate through-ticketing, reducing the gates to 20 from 32 and eliminating the restrictions in eight years – giving consumers benefits of lower airfares.

An unexpected supporter of the Wright Amendment agreement was Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., who said Congress refusing to support the deal as written "may fail opening the market at all."

The vote is a victory for Love Terminal Partners, which has waged a campaign against the antitrust language after filing a $100 million suit for the loss of gates at Love Field.

But the fight for the Wright Amendment is far from over. It will now shift to the House leadership and the House Rules Committee, which will have to mediate between the bill approved by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee and the one modified by the House Judiciary Committee.

Wright Amendment supporters are in key spots: Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas, is a member of the rules committee; House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, R-Arlington, is influential with the leadership and Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, is close to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Hedge Fund Gets Antitrust OK For McDonald's Investment (FWST)

WASHINGTON - An activist hedge fund has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for a previously announced plan to buy nearly $794 million of McDonald's Corp. stock.

In a Sept. 1 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Oak Brook, Ill., fast-food chain said New York-based Pershing Square Capital Management LP had informed the company of plans to acquire more than $793.8 million of McDonald's stock, through three investment funds.

The FTC said Wednesday that it granted early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law.

The purchase would amount to less than a 2 percent stake but would still make Pershing one of McDonald's top institutional shareholders.

Last year, Pershing controlled 4.9 percent of McDonald's shares. It publicly pressured the company to spin off about 65 percent of its company-owned restaurants as part of an effort to boost its stock price. McDonald's met with William Ackman, Pershing's manager partner, but resisted.

Pershing Square sold all of its remaining McDonald's shares in the second quarter.

Shares of McDonald's closed Wednesday down 36 cents, or 0.9 percent, at $37.84 on the New York Stock Exchange.

EU Fines 14 Companies For Price Fixing Road Bitumen (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 14, 2006

BRUSSELS (MarketWatch) -- The European Commission Wednesday fined 14 companies EUR266.717 million for fixing prices of bitumen, a tar used in road construction.

Regulators found that eight suppliers and six purchasers participated in a cartel in the Netherlands from 1994 to 2002.

The commission granted BP PLC (BP) full immunity for cooperating in the investigation. In contrast, it doubled Royal Dutch Shell NV's (RDSA) fine to EUR108 million as a repeat offender.

"We should not have attended these meetings and we regret our involvement in this case," President-Director Rein Willems of Shell Nederland BV said in a statement.

The cartel fines represent the seventh largest ever levied by EU regulators and underline their determination to fight cartels. Companies are liable to up to 10% of their worldwide turnover if they participate, but they can appeal all decisions to the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg.

In 2001, the commission imposed fines of EUR790 million on a vitamin cartel. Last year, it imposed fines of EUR388 million on a hydrogen peroxide cartel and EUR344 million on an acrylic glass cartel.

"The result of the cartel was the price of bitumen was higher than it otherwise would have been," said E.U. antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd. Although bitumen is a "small market" Todd said the "fine is very high comparatively, because "very large companies were involved, the cartel lasted for a time and that it was a very serious infringement." In addition, some companies were "repeat offenders" and some "obstructed our investigation."

He said similar probes were ongoing in both the Belgian and Spanish bitumen markets.

BP was granted full immunity from a fine, which would otherwise have been EUR30.78 million, while Kuwait Petroleum Corp. had its fine reduced by 30% to EUR16.6 million. Shell, Total SA (TOT) and Nynas, also claimed a reduction of the fine, but failed to qualify. Shell's fine was upped by 50% because it had participated in other similar cartels, the commission said. Total was fined EUR20.25 million and Nynas EUR13.5 million.

None of the construction companies applied for leniency. Ballast Nedam, which was fined EUR4.65 million, first joined the cartel in 1996, when it became a major road builder in the Netherlands. Wintershall AG, fined EUR11.6 million, sold its bitumen business to BP at the end of 1999.

Others bitumen suppliers fined were Esha, EUR11.5 million and Kockner & Co. AG (KCO.XE), EUR10 million. Bitumen buyers fined include Ballast Nedam NV (33654.AE), EUR4.65 million, Dura Vermeer NV, EUR5.4 million, Heijmans NV (34193.AE), EUR17.1 million, Holladsche Beton Groep NV, EUR7.2 million, Koninklijke Groep BAM NV (33731.AE), EUR13.5 million and Koninklijke Volker Wessels Stevin NV, EUR27.36 million.

In its statement, the commission said Volker Wessels Stevin had obstructed its probe, refusing commission investigators access to its facilities.

Europe had a long history of tolerating price-fixing, dating back to medieval guilds, analysts say. In the Netherlands, cartels were legal until 1996.

But that tolerance is fast disappearing. The EU's antitrust commissioner Neelie Kroes has vowed to be a "whistle blower" and to show "zero tolerance" toward cartels.

Ironically, though, she served on the supervisory board of Ballast Nedam during the period in which the offense took place. In a statement, she said she had recused herself from the investigation and that the company's supervisory board learned about the investigation only in 2004, shortly before she left to become competition commissioner. She refrained from voting on the fines at Wednesday's commission meeting.

Bitumen, a by-product of fuel production, is mainly used to make asphalt, binding other road surfacing materials together. This cartel covered all bitumen used for road construction in the Netherlands, a market valued around EUR62 million in 2002.

In June 2002, BP applied to the commission for immunity from fines. In October 2002, the commission carried out inspections of various bitumen suppliers and road constructors. It sent statements of objections in October 2004. A hearing was held in June 2005.

The evidence showed that from at least 1994 to 2002, a delegation of the bitumen suppliers met with the six biggest road construction companies in the Netherlands in a series of meetings, called the "bitumen consultation" or "bitumenoverleg," the commission said. These meetings were usually preceded by preparatory meetings of the suppliers and separate preparatory meetings of the six biggest road construction companies.

In the joint meetings, participants fixed the gross price of road bitumen to be invoiced to the asphalt production plants and two rebates for the construction companies that own these asphalt production plants. A uniform minimum rebate for the road construction companies that were part of the cartel and a lower maximum rebate for other road construction companies that weren't part of the cartel. The latter therefore had to pay higher prices.

The construction companies participating in the cartel appeared not to be particularly concerned about the absolute level of the price of bitumen, as long as they received larger discounts than their smaller competitors, the commission said. This caused the price level of bitumen in the Netherlands, even after the discounts granted to the large road builders, to gradually rise above that in neighboring countries, the commission added.

ImClone Goes Up Against Patent Dispute (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, September 14, 2006

More bad news could be looming for ImClone Systems, the biotech maker at the heart of the Martha Stewart stock scandal.

A federal judge is expected to rule, possibly within weeks, on a bitter patent dispute affecting ImClone's sole product, cancer drug Erbitux.

One Wall Street biotech analyst, Citigroup's Yaron Werber, has predicted defendants ImClone and Aventis Pharmaceuticals will lose the dispute. That could cost ImClone tens of millions of dollars a year, delivering an 8% to 24% hit to net income.

The patent dispute — argued over a 10-day trial that ended in July in an often-packed Manhattan courtroom — pits former colleagues, friends and two giants of science against each other: Michael Sela, 82, a co-developer of multiple sclerosis drug Copaxone, and Joseph Schlessinger, 61, who testified he had been nominated for a Nobel Prize and that, for the last decade, he's been among the top 20 most-cited scientists in the world.

The patent dispute goes back 20 years and centers on who invented the idea of using a certain antibody, such as Erbitux, in combination with a chemotherapy drug to slow the growth of cancer tumors: Schlessinger and his colleagues or Sela and his colleagues.

Aventis owns the patent, which lists Schlessinger as its first named inventor. ImClone licensed the exclusive rights to the patent in 1994 even before it was approved.

The plaintiff, Israel's Yeda Research and Development, alleges that three scientists, including Sela, from Israel's famed Weizmann Institute of Science are the true inventors. Yeda, which commercializes inventions of Weizmann scientists, alleges Schlessinger — during a chance conversation with one of Sela's colleagues — volunteered to supply them with an ingredient to do the experiments.

ImClone and Aventis say Schlessinger and his colleagues had already conceived of the patent claims before that conversation and that he simply asked the Sela colleague to test the idea in routine experiments.

After the experiments, Yeda says, Schlessinger submitted a paper about them to a corporate predecessor of Aventis, where he worked while on sabbatical from Weizmann. The company started to pursue the patent. Schlessinger was listed as one of six paper authors; Sela was the primary.

“I was in a state of shock,” Sela testified, when he first saw the patent in 2002. Sela said he had thought of Schlessinger as a friend and protégé until “the bad moment,” according to a transcript of the trial. In an interview, Sela described Schlessinger as an excellent scientist but added, “I have trouble with his ethics.”

Schlessinger testified that he would never have asked the Weizmann scientists to do the experiments had he suspected they would seek co-inventorship.

“This is a clear example of greed,” Schlessinger said in an interview. “They woke up after many years when they realized all the money involved.”

Schlessinger, chair of the department of pharmacology at the Yale University School of Medicine, says he receives no payment for the so-called 866 patent (the name comes from the last three numbers of the seven-numeral patent number). He described the work around the patent as “Stone Age” vs. what he's doing now.

ImClone, in a court filing, said that three of the seven authors on the 866 patent should be deleted because they had nothing to do with its claims. Yeda says the other four, including Schlessinger, should be deleted, too.

“This is a case about a mistake,” plaintiff's attorney Nicholas Groombridge of Weil Gotshal & Manges said in court. “The question before the court is not whether the inventorship is wrong, but how wrong is the inventorship.”

Like Schlessinger, ImClone and Aventis claim Yeda is challenging the patent now because Erbitux is hitting big money. It is one of the few cancer therapies that attack cancer cells but not healthy cells as does chemotherapy.

The Food and Drug Administration approved Erbitux in 2004 to treat colorectal cancers and later for head and neck cancer.

If Yeda gets partial or sole patent ownership, it could demand a “king's ransom” from ImClone, the defendants said in a post-trial brief.

Citigroup analyst Werber estimates ImClone pays Aventis royalties of 2% to 3%, based on Erbitux sales, for the patent license.

Werber says the most likely outcome is that Yeda emerges as a co-owner of the patent and ImClone pays an extra 1% to 2% royalty. If Erbitux's sales were $1.3 billion in 2008, Werber says, that would cut ImClone's net income by $10 million to $20 million, or 8% to 16%.

It is less likely that Yeda will win the patent outright, Werber says. If so, the defendants say it could try to forbid ImClone from marketing Erbitux in combination with a chemotherapy drug, which is most often the case for colorectal cancer.

Whatever the outcome, ImClone says, shipments of Erbitux won't be affected. Any decision by the U.S. District Court judge is likely to be tied up in appeals for years, says ImClone spokesman David Pitts.

What's more, it's in the financial interests of Yeda, if named to the patent, to keep Erbitux sales growing, says Werber.

The Weizmann scientists say money isn't the issue — honor is. "I'm not keen on a patent unless it is stolen from me," Sela said.

Schlessinger says he is offended by such accusations.

Yeda alleges the Weizmann scientists didn't learn that a patent application may have been filed until 2000 when Sela received a request from ImClone for notebooks related to the work. The patent was issued in 2001. When Yeda and Sela sought more information, they say, ImClone cut off communication. In her ruling dismissing ImClone's request for summary judgment, Judge Naomi Buchwald characterized ImClone as stonewalling Yeda.

The case marks ImClone's second high-drama courtroom appearance. In 2003, its founder, Sam Waksal, was sentenced to prison in a scandal in which he was accused of trying to sell ImClone shares knowing the FDA was about to reject ImClone's Erbitux application.

By the time Erbitux received FDA approval, Waksal was in jail and Stewart was soon to be sentenced.

The patent case isn't the only cloud over ImClone. In August, it said it would remain independent after failing to find a suitable buyer.

In a report after that announcement, WR Hambrecht biotech analyst Patrick Flanigan said the lack of compelling bids for the company suggests ImClone's fundamentals are deteriorating.

Among other things, he forecast declining Erbitux sales growth in the USA throughout 2007, in part because of new competition expected from rival Amgen.

Flanigan advised investors to "remain on the sidelines."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Assails Agency For Ethics Slide (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — The Interior Department's chief official responsible for investigating abuses and overseeing operations accused the top officials at the agency on Wednesday of tolerating widespread ethical failures, from cronyism to cover-ups of incompetence.

"Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," charged Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, at a hearing of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy.

"I have observed one instance after another when the good work of my office has been disregarded by the department," he continued. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials — taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias — have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.' "

The blistering attack was part of Mr. Devaney's report on what he called the Interior Department's "bureaucratic bungling" of oil and gas leases signed in the late 1990's, mistakes that are now expected to cost the government billions of dollars but were covered up for six years.

While these leases were the specific focus of the hearing, Mr. Devaney directed most of his criticism at what he called a broader organizational culture at the Interior Department of denial and "defending the indefensible."

He expressed particular fury at the willingness to dismiss two dozen potential ethical lapses by J. Steven Griles, a former industry lobbyist who served as deputy secretary of the interior during President Bush's first term.

Mr. Griles resigned after allegations surfaced that he pushed policy decisions that favored some of his former oil and gas industry clients and that he tried to steer a $2 million contract to a technology firm that had also been one of his clients.

In a 145-page report in 2004, the inspector general described Mr. Griles as a "train wreck waiting to happen." But on Wednesday, Mr. Devaney said he was appalled that the Interior Department's office of ethics dismissed 23 out of 25 potential ethical breaches against Mr. Griles and that Gale A. Norton, then secretary of the interior, decided not to act on the two remaining allegations.

Mr. Griles is once again a lobbyist in Washington. Efforts to reach Mr. Griles on Wednesday evening at his lobbying firm, Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles, were unsuccessful.

Mr. Devaney said that case was typical of a much broader "culture of managerial irresponsibility and lack of accountability" in the top reaches of the Interior Department.

"I have unfortunately watched a number of high-level Interior officials leave the department under the cloud of O.I.G. investigations," Mr. Devaney said, referring to the Office of Inspector General.

"Absent criminal charges, however, they are sent off in the usual fashion, with a party paying tribute to their good service and the secretary wishing them well, to spend more time with their family or seek new opportunities."

That was almost exactly what happened to Mr. Griles, who was never charged with any wrongdoing, though he admitted to using bad judgment in some cases.

Dirk Kempthorne, who succeeded Ms. Norton as interior secretary earlier this year, said Wednesday that he took the inspector general's allegations "very seriously" and had sent a letter to all employees on his first day at the department on the need to follow ethical guidelines.

Mr. Kempthorne declined to say what additional actions he might take until he saw Mr. Devaney's final report.

Mr. Devaney, a burly man who began his career as a police officer in Massachusetts, is no stranger to combative investigations or confrontations with top officials.

He spent more than 20 years as a special agent in the Secret Service, specializing in white-collar crime, eventually being put in charge of the service's fraud division. In the 1990's, he became director of criminal enforcement at the Environmental Protection Agency.

He was named inspector general at the Interior Department in 1999, just as whistle-blowers outside the government were pressing huge lawsuits alleging that oil companies were fraudulently underpaying royalties.

Three years ago, Mr. Devaney scathingly criticized the Interior Department's auditing program for oil and gas royalties.

Beyond finding that investigators had missed millions of dollars in underpayments, his office uncovered evidence that agency auditors had lost key files, then tried to fool investigators by forging and backdating the missing documents. In an acid rebuke of the agency, Mr. Devaney noted that the agency gave a bonus to the official who came up with the false papers.

Mr. Devaney's broadside against the Interior Department's culture dovetailed with his tentative conclusions in his most recent investigation, into how the department had managed to sign 1,100 leases for offshore drilling that inadvertently let energy companies escape billions of dollars in royalties on gas and oil produced in the Gulf of Mexico.

The leases, signed in 1998 and 1999 during the Clinton administration, allow companies to escape normal federal royalties — usually 12.5 percent of sales — on the tens of millions of barrels of oil on each lease.

The royalty break was intended as an incentive for deepwater drilling, but it was also supposed to end if oil prices climbed above a "threshold" level of about $34 a barrel. The leases at issue omitted that restriction, and department officials kept quiet about their mistake for six years after they discovered it.

The problem was first disclosed by The New York Times in March. Government officials now estimate that the mistake could cost the Treasury as much as $10 billion over the next decade.

"The Interior Department holds our natural resources in trust for the American people,'' said Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California and chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy and resources. "It squandered billions instead."

Mr. Devaney said the error, a result of compartmentalized thinking within the department, might have remained buried if senior officials had had their way.

"We do not have a 'smoking gun,' '' Mr. Devaney said. "We do, however, have a very costly mistake which might never have been aired publicly absent The New York Times, the interest of this committee, the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and several other interested members of Congress."

River's Renewal A Step Closer (FRESNOB)

By Michael Doyle And Mark Grossi, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, September 14, 2006

Deal to be filed today would begin restoration around '09.

WASHINGTON — More water should start flowing down the San Joaquin River by around 2009 under a long-awaited settlement scheduled to be filed in Sacramento today.

By around 2013, salmon should be reintroduced to the river, which once teemed with them. Hundreds of millions of dollars would be spent on channel improvements and more, and a new "San Joaquin River restoration" administrator would oversee the complicated work.

The river restoration details, and myriad others that will change life in the San Joaquin Valley, have been worked out by farmers and environmentalists during months of negotiations. They are to be presented to a federal judge this morning in hopes of settling an 18-year-old lawsuit.

"To be able to come up with an agreement that parties on both sides can agree to is a monumental step to a healthy river," said Grant Davis, executive director of the San Francisco-based Bay Institute, one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. "Failure would not only harm the river, it would harm the San Joaquin Valley."

Davis declined to offer details of the settlement, which was described by others who had been briefed about the pending deal. The Justice Department only signed off on the agreement Monday night, participants said, and details were changing up until the last moment.

But even as environmental groups and their negotiating partners embrace the new deal, it's attracting flak on Capitol Hill and among some water users. Part of the agreement includes an apparent deadline for Congress to approve San Joaquin River restoration legislation: Dec. 31.

If the legislation substantively differs from what negotiators agreed to, at least one lawmaker said, the whole deal could fall apart.

"It's the other branches of government telling Congress, 'You're going to do this or else,'" said Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Visalia. "It's putting a gun to our head."

Nunes represents many of the farmers on the east side of the San Joaquin Valley who are served by water stored behind Friant Dam.

Farmers downstream on the west side of the Valley did not get enough protection in the settlement, said Steve Chedester, executive director of the San Joaquin River Exchange Contractors Water Authority. The authority represents farmers downstream of Firebaugh, near Los Banos.

Chedester said the restoration may put water down the old channel where valuable crops now grow. He said the route should be further studied, and a lot of funding will be needed if the old river is the preferred route.

"Our area will be the most expensive reach to restore," Chedester said.

Construction of Friant Dam in the 1940s helped fuel the Valley's agricultural growth but also dried up portions of the San Joaquin River in western Merced and Fresno counties.

Environmentalists filed suit in 1988 when Friant contracts came up for renewal. The case quickly turned to restoration of the salmon run in the early 1990s. The case swung toward environmentalists, and the two sides attempted — unsuccessfully — to negotiate a settlement.

With the long-running lawsuit unresolved, Rep. George Radanovich, R-Mariposa, and Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein last year began urging farmers and environmentalists led by the Natural Resources Defense Council and Bay Institute to strike a deal. Feinstein has agreed to introduce the legislation — dubbed by some the San Joaquin River Restoration Settlement Act — to authorize the various river fixes.

A draft of the proposed legislation authorizes the federal government to buy land from "willing sellers." All environmental laws must be complied with — a blow to some water agencies that were hoping for exemptions. Outside parties — such as the Merced Irrigation District — would not be allowed to sue if they're unhappy with how the settlement works.

The proposed legislation establishes a "San Joaquin River Restoration Fund," which would include California state bond money and federal funds. Friant water users would not pay any more than they already do, but a portion of payments they make under existing water contracts would be devoted to the new restoration fund.

As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Feinstein could attempt to attach the river bill to another, must-pass funding bill.

Radanovich, next week, plans to hold a hearing on the settlement, which would set a foundation for a House bill.

"I think if all the water districts in Friant support it, then so do I," Radanovich said.

The agreement would not automatically dissolve if the legislation misses the Dec. 31 deadline, said Friant Water Users Authority lawyer Dan Dooley. The Friant authority negotiates for 15,000 farmers who get water from Millerton Lake.

"It's more of a poison pill that offers the parties in the litigation the opportunity to void the agreement if the deadline is missed," Dooley said. "But both sides are aware that there is not a lot of time left this year." Michael Doyle reports from The Bee's Washington Bureau. Accord Reached On Diverting Water From Farms To Restore San Joaquin River (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 13 — For most of the last 60 years, much of the San Joaquin River has not really been a river. Dammed and drained for agricultural purposes in the arid Central Valley, the San Joaquin is dry for mile after mile, a symbol of the cost of progress and the miracles of modern irrigation.

It has also been the subject of extensive litigation.

On Wednesday, a coalition of environmental and fishing groups announced the settlement of an 18-year-old suit against the Interior Department and a group of California water users, ending one of the longest-running environmental skirmishes.

The proposal, which Congress will vote on, would create a multimillion-dollar project to restore more than 150 miles of the San Joaquin to the lush riverbed it once was.

Under the plan, announced in Sacramento, billions of gallons of water would eventually be released from Friant Dam, just north of Fresno, spilling into the historic river channels. The new flow, environmentalists and fishermen hope, will create a healthy environment for Chinook salmon, which once spawned — and thrived — in the San Joaquin.

In exchange for losing 15 percent to 20 percent of their yearly water, depending on rainfall, farmers and other long-term water users would be assured of a supply.

“For the next 20 years, we know what the water commitment is going to be, and that was important to us,” said Ron Jacobsma, consulting general manager of the Friant Water Users Authority, which represents 22 water districts that span five counties.

Fed by downstream tributaries, the San Joaquin, the second-longest river in California, flows as it meets the Sacramento River east of San Francisco, forming an enormous delta that provides water to 22 million Californians. Since the 1940’s, the upper reaches of the river, from Friant Dam to its convergence with the Merced River, have been siphoned off to water a million acres of crops through a vast irrigation project that has helped turn the Central Valley into one of the most prosperous agricultural regions.

The proposed restoration would carry a hefty price, with estimates from $250 million to $800 million, a cost that the federal government and state would probably share.

Some support seems to have been mustered. Mike Chrisman, secretary for state resources, signed off on the accord on Wednesday, as did Senator Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, and Representative George P. Radanovich, a Republican. Mr. Radanovich, who represents the Fresno region, said he would hold a hearing on the plan on Sept. 21.

After years of machinations and stalled negotiations, legal pressure on the government intensified in 2004, when a federal district judge in Sacramento, Lawrence K. Karlton, ruled in the environmentalists' favor, saying the California Fish and Game Code, which guarantees water to fisheries, could be applied to the federally owned Friant Dam.

Judge Karlton had set a trial date for earlier this year to consider remedies. But as that date approached, the two sides returned to the table to find a more nuanced middle ground.

"The judge had made statements along the lines of all he had was a meat cleaver," Mr. Jacobsma of the water users' authority said. "And what we needed was a scalpel."

Kirk Rodgers, a regional director for the Federal Bureau of Reclamation, said the project would "probably be unprecedented in terms of its magnitude and challenges."

"In some cases,'' Mr. Rodgers said, "you're going to have to define a channel through mechanical means. In some cases, you're going to have to build structures to put the water that's being diverted back in the channel. It's a very complicated and very ambitious project." Some water spilled into the riverbed would also be recirculated to farmers, he said.

A tentative timetable calls for water to be diverted to the river by 2009 or 2010. Fish would be introduced two or three years later, with most construction and physical restoration finished by 2016. The project, if approved, would run through 2026.

Decline In Winter Arctic Ice Linked To Greenhouse Gases (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The amount of ice being formed in the Arctic winter has declined sharply in the past two years, a finding that NASA climate researchers say significantly increases their confidence that greenhouse gases created by autos and industry are warming the Arctic and the globe.

For years, scientists have reported a steady decrease in summertime Arctic ice, but they had never before found a similar reduction in the amount of ice being created during the frigid and dark Arctic winter. This lack of effect on the Arctic winter was one flaw in the scientific models of global warming, which predicted a steady decrease in ice formation.

But a new paper by Josefino Comiso, a senior research scientist at NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, found precisely the reduction in wintertime ice over the past two years that the model had predicted. The past two winters each produced 6 percent less ice than the average amount measured for almost three decades.

"This amount of Arctic sea ice reduction the past two consecutive winters has not taken place before during the 27 years satellite data has been available," Comiso said. "In the past, sea ice reduction in winter was significantly lower per decade compared to summer sea ice retreat. What's remarkable is that we've witnessed sea ice reduction at 6 percent per year over just the last two winters, most likely a result of warming due to greenhouse gases."

Comiso yesterday called the new data from satellite imaging of ice formation and temperatures "the strongest evidence of global warming in the Arctic so far."

The drop in wintertime ice tracks a similar drop in sea ice detected in the warmer months. According to Mark Serreze, senior research analyst with the National Snow and Ice Data Center, the amount of ice in the Arctic at the end of the 2005 summer was the smallest seen in 27 years of satellite imaging, and probably the smallest in 100 years. He said this year's summer ice cover started out even smaller but is not another record.

Serreze, in a teleconference with Comiso yesterday, said the new information on wintertime ice increases his confidence that greenhouse gases, and not other variables of weather and climate, are causing the warming.

"There a growing consistency here, with our observations in line with what our models project," said Serreze, whose group is part of the University of Colorado and does contract work for NASA.

Comiso said that researchers had been puzzled that wintertime ice creation remained robust in the Arctic while summertime melt was increasing, since the greenhouse effect would have potentially greater impact on wintertime ice.

In a paper that will appear in the journal Geophysical Research Letters, Comiso describes a "remarkable turn of events, with the observation of record low ice extent and area during the winters of 2005 and 2006." He adds: "The abnormally low winter ice maximum extent and area and enhanced surface temperatures in 2005 and 2006 . . . may just be the beginning of these trends which have been more apparent in other seasons."

Comiso said the wintertime polar warming may be caused by increases and changes in long-wave radiation from the sun, which is associated with the greenhouse effect. He also said the fact that there is so much less ice visible during the summer suggests that the ice cover is not getting as thick in the winter as it used to.

NASA also announced yesterday a study of the effects of shrinking Arctic ice formation on polar bears. The paper, to be published in the journal Arctic, found a marked decrease in the time that polar bears can spend on sea ice, their preferred platform for hunting seals and other sea mammals. As the coastal ice melts, said Claire Parkinson, a senior scientist at the Goddard facility, the animals have been forced to spend more time on land -- resulting in more encounters with people and a decline in the bears' average body weight.

The paper reports that the average weight of adult female polar bears in western Hudson Bay was 650 pounds in 1980. Their average weight in 2004 was 507 pounds -- a 143-pound drop.

"A key result of our research is its strong suggestion that climate warming is having a significant and negative effect on a primary species reliant on the sea ice cover for survival," Parkinson said.

She said that while the Antarctic experienced a sharp decline in ice cover during the 1970s but then recovered, there were no signs that the Arctic will now recover its ice in the same way.

House Rejects Attempt To Curb Indian Gaming (USAT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett New Service

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Indian tribes hoping to establish casinos away from tribal lands dodged a potential setback Wednesday when the House rejected a bill barring off-reservation gambling.

California Rep. Richard Pombo, head of the House Committee on Resources, said "reservation shopping" by tribes has "perverted" the intent of the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, which opened the door for tribes to establish casinos.

But Pombo, who introduced the bill, was unable to secure the two-thirds vote needed for it to pass, under special House rules barring amendments. The vote was 247-171 for the bill, with 278 votes needed for approval.

All of Louisiana's House members, except Reps. William Jefferson, R-New Orleans, and Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, voted for Pombo's bill.

As Indian gaming revenues have grown — they reached nearly $22.7 billion in 2005 — so has opposition in Congress to the industry's expansion.

Only four tribes have off-reservation casinos. But at least 44 others, many landless and newly recognized by the federal government, like the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians, have applications pending at the Interior Department.

Pombo's bill would have prohibited the Jena Band and other tribes from establishing casinos off tribal land or land not contiguous to their reservations. It also would have required tribes to compensate local communities for a new casino's impact on roads, water and sewer systems and other services, including law enforcement.

The National Indian Gaming Association, which represents more than 180 tribes, strongly opposed the bill, saying it would violate tribal sovereignty.

"Before they could use their lands, these tribes would have to jump through many new hoops," an NIGA statement said. "Indian tribes are recognized as sovereign in the Constitution and under existing law. Sovereign tribes negotiate with sovereign states, not town councils."

The defeat of Pombo's bill is expected to end the congressional debate over Indian gaming this year.

In the Senate, lawmakers from two opposing camps have stalled a less restrictive bill sponsored by John McCain, R-Ariz.

Some senators, including Sen. David Vitter, R-Metarie, have blocked McCain's bill because they say it's not tough enough. Others oppose it because they say it attempts to curb Indian gaming violate tribal sovereignty.

Agents Say Oregon Schoolmates Developed Drug Ring Over 3 Decades (AP)

By Joseph B. Frazier, Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. – The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday it has shattered a drug operation that started among high school buddies in Roseburg, Ore., 30 years ago and grew over the years to become an international operation that took in more than $20 million.

Eleven of the 12 people named in a federal indictment are in custody after arrests Wednesday in Oregon, Washington, Colorado and Idaho. Most are from Oregon.

U.S. Attorney Tom Moss of Boise, Idaho, said the arrests followed a classic strategy of "follow the money."

The 194-page indictment, handed up in Boise in June but kept sealed until Wednesday's arrests, said the operation began by growing and selling marijuana. But, the indictment said, the operation expanded to smuggling of drugs from Mexico and South America, growing large quantities of marijuana indoors and on public lands, and manufacturing methamphetamines.

The government seeks forfeiture of more than $24 million in assets including boats, planes, business interests and real estate in five states.

U.S. attorney spokeswoman Jean McNeil said more arrests could follow, and those in custody likely would be sent to Idaho after court appearances where they were arrested.

The case is handled in Idaho because it stemmed from the case of a convicted Clearwater, Idaho, drug trafficker, Leland Lang, who was allegedly supplied with large amounts of drugs by the operation.

In addition to drug distribution and money-laundering charges, six of the defendants are charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which carries a mandatory minimum 20-year sentence.

"Lee Lang was a major distributor, and he was getting his drugs from somewhere," Moss said. "We wanted to find out where, and now, thanks to the hard work and dedication of more than a dozen law enforcement agencies, I think we have."

Police Count 54 Drug Dealers In Arrest Sweep (MANUL)

By Pat Grossmith, Union Leader Staff

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, September 14, 2006

Manchester – An eight-month undercover drug investigation in the state's largest city has resulted in 54 drug dealers being arrested and the confiscation of more than 10 pounds of drugs with a street value of $450,000, authorities said yesterday.

The arrests began on April 1, but since Monday, police have arrested 28 people on charges they sold crack, cocaine or heroin to undercover officers or possessed drugs.

Manchester Police Chief John Jaskolka, at a news conference yesterday afternoon, said he "fully expects more arrests as the operation continues over the next few days and weeks."

Manchester Mayor Frank Guinta commended all the agencies involved -- Manchester police, state police, Hillsborough County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Marshal's Office, ATF, state Probation and Parole Department, and the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force.

He said the arrests show there is a "renewed commitment to eradicate the criminal element in our city."

The undercover drug investigation so far as involved the execution of 13 search warrants and the seizure or purchase of 7.9 pounds of cocaine, 2.4 pounds of crack cocaine, and 2.5 ounces of heroin by agents. Police also removed nine firearms -- eight handguns and one shotgun -- from city streets and seized $130,979 in cash.

The probe was funded with a federal grant under the Operation Streetsweeper program and involved seven different state, local, county and federal agencies.

U.S. Attorney Thomas Colantuono said nine of those arrested will be prosecuted on federal charges in U.S. District Court in Concord.

Those charged in federal court include Joseph Anderson, 36, of 326 Amherst St., Apt. 9; Lucien Arsenault, 37, 8 Ruby Way, Merrimack; Cotisha Blake, 37, of 22 Concord St., Apt. 13; Andrew Eaton, 38, 3951 Brown Ave.; Anthony Frith, 32, 3951 Brown

Ave.; Kim Paul, 41, 478 Beech St., Apt. 6; Kyshawn Ross, 28, 509 Beech St.; Michelle Sarazin, 34, currently being detained at the Valley Street jail; Eugene Williams, 45, 281 Auburn St., Apt. 2.

Anderson was in Manchester District Court yesterday on state charges of possessing marijuana and resisting detention. His bail was set at $5,000 cash or surety, with a trial set for Nov. 13.

Those arrested are mostly street-level dealers, selling drugs in Manchester and the surrounding area, although there were a few mid- to high-level drug traffickers among them, according to police.

Two alleged mid-level crack cocaine dealers arrested Monday night were Jerrel T. Cryer, 25, of 9 Wheelock St., and Christopher Hoggard, 19, of 501 Somerville St., first-floor. Cryer is charged with three counts of selling crack cocaine and one count possessing cocaine with the intent to sell it. Hoggard is charged with four counts of selling crack cocaine.

Each is being held on $40,000 cash or surety bail, with probable cause hearings in Manchester District Court set for Sept. 25.

Brothers Nathaniel Kitchen, 19, of 100 Lincoln St., and Isaiah Kitchen, 21, of 283 Bridge St., were also arrested Monday night. Nathaniel Kitchen was arrested on an electronic bench warrant for operating a motor vehicle after his license was suspended.

When he arrived yesterday morning in District Court for his arraignment, police promptly arrested him on a drug charge. He was handcuffed and taken to the police station for processing.

He is to be arraigned this morning on both the motor vehicle complaint and the drug charge.

His brother, Isaiah, pleaded innocent yesterday to possessing marijuana. He is free on $1,000 personal recognizance bail with a trial slated for Nov. 9.

Also arraigned yesterday were:

Kasha Carmody, 20, of 86 Batchelder Ave., one count of selling cocaine. Bail is $5,000 cash/surety. Jason Coelho, 26, 285 Concord St., Apt. 5, three counts of selling cocaine. Bail is $10,000 cash/surety.

Edward Davender, 32, 455 Pine St., Apt. 220, three counts of selling crack cocaine. Bail is $30,000 cash/surety.

Their probable cause hearings are Sept. 25.

Irvin Donlagic, 20, 373 Beech St., first floor, was charged with three counts of selling cocaine. His bail is $30,000 cash/surety, although police prosecuting officer Kristen Taylor wanted it set at $50,000 because, she told the judge, he was a flight risk.

Donlagic said he planned to leave for an out-of-country vacation on Sunday. Should he make bail, however, he is not to travel outside of New Hampshire.

"I guess that will cancel any vacation plans you have," Judge Norman Champagne told him. He is to return to court Sept. 25 for a probable cause hearing.

Also arraigned yesterday were Scott Gauthier, 37, 22 Concord St., Apt. 13, one count sale of crack cocaine. Bail is $5,000 cash/surety, and a probable cause hearing, Sept. 26.

Katon Lang, 21, 211 Pine St., third floor, was arraigned on four counts of selling cocaine and three charges of selling heroin.

His bail is $30,000 cash/surety with a probable cause hearing, Sept. 25.

Fritz Lemite, 28, 22 Beech Hill Ave., was arraigned on three counts of sale of cocaine. His bail is $20,000 cash/ surety with a probable cause hearing, Sept. 26.

Norman Moore, 32, last known address of 6 Hold St., Concord, was charged with one count of selling the drug cyclobenzaprine, a muscle relaxer. Bail is $10,000 cash/surety with a trial Sept. 26.

Topsham Crack Dealer Sentenced (BTR)

Brunswick Times Record, September 14, 2006

PORTLAND - A New Haven, Conn., man was sentenced Tuesday in U.S. District Court to more than 15 years in prison in connection with his role in trafficking crack cocaine.

Phillip Whitworth, 33, pleaded guilty in May to charges of possessing with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. The joint investigation between the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Topsham Police Department began in Topsham and lasted 13 months, said Detective Mark Gilliam of the Topsham Police Department.

Whitworth was arrested in March 2006 in the Topsham Fair Mall area after attempting to sell the drugs to an undercover informant working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. Whitworth went to the New York state-Connecticut area to purchase crack cocaine at a lower cost, then distributed it in central Maine and the Mid-coast region, Gilliam said. "This was a career criminal and that's why his punishment was so bad," he said.

Whitworth had lived in Topsham and Brunswick while he was selling drugs in Maine. He also maintained a residence in Connecticut, where he was on probation. Previously, he had been convicted on drug and weapons charges, Gilliam said.

While living in Maine, Whitworth drove a sport utility vehicle and had a house with a large plasma television, which Gilliam believes were bought through profits from drug sales. At the time of his arrest, Whitworth had arranged to have approximately $10,000 worth of electronic equipment installed in his SUV, Gilliam said.

Gilliam said it is becoming common for people to move to rural areas to sell drugs. A new area means less competition, allowing drug dealers to sell at higher prices, he said.

U.S. Attorney Paula D. Silsby praised the DEA and the Topsham Police Department for their work in the investigation. Gilliam also praised the DEA for the agency's help with the investigation. Top of Story

Spain, US Boost Joint Efforts To Combat Drug Trafficking (AFP)

AFP, September 14, 2006

Spain and the United States announced they were increasing cooperation to stop drug trafficking, following talks between Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba and visiting US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) administrator Karen Tandy.

Both announced the strengthening of "common instruments to combat the laundering of money proceeding from drug trafficking".

The interior ministry said in a statement that Rubalcaba and Tandy had underlined the need for a "joint and coordinated" effort to stem drug-related crime, via the creation of specialized anti-narcotics teams from both countries

Also present at the meeting were Spanish Secretary of State for Security Antonio Camacho, who held talks with US counterparts in Washington in July, and US ambassador Eduardo Aguirre.

Spain is at the frontline of the anti-narcotics fight in Europe since it is the main European port of entry for Latin American cocaine.

Last year, seizures of cocaine in Spain reached a record 46.6 tonnes.

Spain will in April, under the co-chairmanship of Tandy, host the 25th International Drug Enforcement Conference (IDEC) in Madrid.

The IDEC was established in 1983 for law enforcement officials in the Western hemisphere to share information related to drug crime and draw up a coordinated approach to combat trafficking.

Drug-trade Violence Grips Acapulco (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

ACAPULCO, MEXICO

He took office as a charismatic, ballad-singing maverick who promised to contain crime in this coastal resort town.

But during his term, Acapulco, once known as the "Pearl of the Pacific," has seen its reputation - and its mayor, Félix Salgado - battered by the worst drug violence in the town's history. Mr. Salgado has lost 33 pounds in nine months and, when asked what his major accomplishment has been so far, answers deprecatingly: "that I'm alive."

"I've been dealt a very complicated situation, very hard," says Salgado, turning serious. In July he mourned the death of his city's security chief found suffocated in the back of a car.

Salgado's survival during a siege of violence mirrors the impact on Acapulco and beyond, as the drug war between two cartels has spread from the northern ganglands along the US-Mexican border toward the south - both startling, and horrifying, the nation.

Some 1,500 have been killed in drug violence this year, double the number in previous years. But it's the recent, and growing, viciousness of the acts that has been most unsettling. Acapulco has seen grenade attacks and decapitations haunt its front pages. Bodies have been wrapped in garbage bags, heads hung on the fence outside government offices.

Salgado and other city officials say that a national plan of stepped-up police enforcement has helped stem the violence. But just last week, in the neighboring state of Michoacan, five heads were hurled onto a dance floor while the disco was in full swing, showing how volatile the situation is becoming. It will be one of the most vexing problems for incoming president Felipe Calderón.

"I never expected this war would last so long, and it is bad news for Mexican society," says Jorge Chabat, a criminal justice expert in Mexico City. "One of the challenges Calderón has to face is he has to reach an agreement with other parties to make long-term reform." Long ties to drug trade

Acapulco has old ties to drugs, with coves along the Pacific Coast where speedboats have long picked up cocaine from South America. But growing domestic consumption and the battle for key entry points into the US has fueled unprecedented violence, with over 65 execution-style killings this year alone.

"In the last 50 years, we have never seen anything like this," says Jorge Valdez Reycen, a spokesperson for the local police. "This is a police force not trained for war, it is trained for tourism."

The escalating violence is believed to be the fallout between the Sinaloa cartel, which had dominated Acapulco, and the Gulf cartel, which has been moving into its territory. "It has gotten really personal too, which is why it is spiraling out of control," says Laurie Freeman, who authored a report this summer on Mexico's drug trade for the Washington Office on Latin America think tank. "The trafficking is nothing new, the level of violence is."

In the past six years, President Vicente Fox has made the war on drugs a top priority, making high-profile arrests. The arrest last month by US officials of suspected drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was lauded a major cross-border success.

The top-level arrests have created opportunities for smaller players to vie for control of principal traffic routes. The result: Battles once contained in border towns have spread to tourist hot spots.

"In some sense, as the country is more democratic, so is the drug trade," says Bruce Bagley, a drug-trade expert at the University of Miami. "There are a lot more players in it, and crime has risen because Mexican authorities don't have the personnel [to tackle it]."

In Acapulco, the results have been devastating. The bay town was once a playground of Hollywood stars. On a recent day, as Mr. Valdez Reycen from the police department went through photos chronicling events over the last few months, it seemed more like the backdrop to a horror film.

In January, a daytime shootout a mile from the beach left four suspected traffickers dead. Three months later, two heads were hung outside the state Finance and Administration headquarters, where the shootout had been, with a note: "So that you learn to respect." Image problem

Teresa de Jesús Rivas, the city's tourism director, says that vacationers have not been scared away in recent years. The number of visitors increased from 5.3 million in 2004 to 5.7 million in 2005, and she expects this year to keep pace with, or exceed, the last.

Still, drug violence does image damage. "When people are looking for a destination for vacation and they see there are heads in Acapulco, it's not going to be as attractive," she says outside her office, next to a huge photo of the bay when foreign tourism dominated the market. These days, only about 15 percent of tourists hail from other countries.

These are among the challenges for Salgado, who says security is his top priority. He led a peace march in July. And he says that random street patrols, which include 400 federal, state, and local police have started to tranquilize the town. "The people were afraid, terrorized, horrified, but it's improved," Salgado says.

Fernando Tenopala, the president of a local business group, agrees that the situation is better. "When the extreme violence began [this year], suddenly we felt very alone ... and protested for peace," he says. Since then the police have received training in using arms, as well as 250 additional HK-36 rifles. "Things have improved, though we have to continue fighting."

President-elect Calderón has already outlined plans to create a national crime database and sweep the police of corruption.

Local residents remain doubtful. Mari Acosta, a cook in a local eatery, says she is tired of the line that the drug wars are between enemies - especially since she says no one knows who the enemy is. "It's hurting the rest of us too, but the government does nothing about it, probably because they are involved, otherwise they wouldn't get killed," she says in a low voice so customers don't hear.

Just last month she saw in the newspaper that a regular customer was gunned down outside town. She didn't know his name but recognized his face. Says Ms. Acosta: "I don't know what's going to happen with us here in Acapulco."

Witness Held In Wales Slaying Pleads Not Guilty To Gun Charge (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, September 14, 2006

SEATTLE -- A Bellevue gun collector who was arrested as a material witness in the 2001 assassination of a federal prosecutor pleaded not guilty Wednesday to an unrelated charge of machine-gun possession.

Albert K. Kwan was arrested Friday on one count of possessing an M-14 machine gun in January 2005. His attorneys said they found the charge curious, because Kwan owns more than 100 machine guns legally, and the one that resulted in his indictment required serious modification by federal agents before it could be fired automatically.

Kwan was arrested in early 2005 and held for 23 days as a material witness in the October 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, an 18-year federal prosecutor and president of a Washington gun-control organization. Wales was shot through a window as he worked in the basement of his home on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill. The FBI has designated his assasssination a "major case" and is offering $1 million for information that helps solve it.

Kwan, who has not been identified as a suspect, was held because federal investigators believed he had purchased two replacement barrels for a Makarov pistol, and ballistics evidence indicated the bullets that killed Wales had traveled through such a barrel. The investigators wanted to know if Kwan had the barrels or if he had provided them to someone else.

Kwan, who has testified four or five times before a grand jury investigating Wales' death, gave authorities one barrel which did not match the bullets, said his lawyers, Joseph Conte and Eric Stahlfeld.

"He told them he believes he never had a second barrel," Stahlfeld said after the hearing Wednesday.

The grand jury "has asked him about everything. He knows nothing," Conte added.

Conte, of Washington, D.C., and Stahlfeld, of Seattle, also said Kwan does not know a Bellevue airline pilot who is the only publicly identified suspect in the Wales killing. That pilot had feuded with Wales in court. Through his attorney, he has declined several interview requests.

"From everything we know, he's never had anything even close to contact" with the pilot, Stahlfeld said of Kwan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey argued Wednesday that Kwan should be detained because he posed a danger to the community and was not forthcoming with the court regarding his assets. He also failed to disclose a passport that had been issued to him in Hong Kong.

Kwan once imported 50 firearms from Canada without proper documentation, Redkey said, and in 1996 he was caught trying to cross the border with two guns wrapped in bubblewrap under the hood of his car.

Customs agents also seized a van from Kwan in 2002 when they discovered it had a hidden compartment. Kwan unsuccessfully sued for damages. He also sued in 2003 when the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to refused to renew his four federal firearms licenses. The agency said it based its decision partly on his refusal to cooperate with agents seeking to inspect his home, the licensed premises. Kwan lost that case and has filed an appeal.

Conte said the lengths to which Kwan went to ensure that his other machine guns were legally owned and properly documented, and that the M-14 at issue could not readily be fired automatically, indicate that he did not intend to do anything illegal.

"It didn't operate as a machine gun when the government seized it," he told U.S. Magistrate Judge Monica Benton.

Conte also questioned why Kwan was only arrested last week, when agents seized the gun during a January 2005 search of his home. Redkey said he had only recently received information about the case from the ATF.

Benton said she would likely release Kwan pending trial, possibly on home detention, as long as all weapons were removed from the home. The detention hearing was put off until Friday to give Kwan's lawyers time to find storage for his collection of firearms.

London Firearms Crackdown Includes Raids In NJ (WABC)

WABC-TV, New York City, September 13, 2006

British police seized hundreds of firearms in a dawn raid overseas

(New Jersey-WABC, Sept. 13, 2006) - British police seized hundreds of firearms, including automatic weapons and shotguns, in a dawn raid involving gun-smuggling between New Jersey and London.

Eyewitness News has learned a 55-year-old man, who answered the door wearing his boxer shorts, was arrested at a home in Dartford, England Hundreds of guns, including shotguns, semiautomatic guns and automatic weapons, were found at his house.

Officials say an accomplice of that man was taken into custody in New Jersey this morning, questioned and released. The raids were a joint operation between U.S. and U.K. authorities.

The ATF, the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms agency was the lead agency on the U.S. Side of the case, called "Operation Trident" and which British officials say has been in operation for six years.

"For eight months, the ATF has worked with the UK in this case, and we are conducting follow up work in the United States today," said Richard Marianos, an ATF official.

Marianos stressed that British authorities are the lead agencies in the case and they will make any extensive comments. There have been no US arrests in the case so far.

"This is the biggest firearms haul we have ever had. The premises raided were used to store hundreds and hundreds of weapons, Det. Chief Superintendent Kevin Davis said.

"I've never seen anything like it. Guns are mounted on every available wall space in the property and live ammunition was found lying on the floor. There are guns everywhere."

"It will take us at least three days to log it all and bag up the evidence.

The international arms operation has been in progress for more than eight months, and one of the persons arrested in the UK today -- a 55-year-old man -- is believed to be a "major player" in the arms case.

Michigan Fugitive Caught In Tennessee After 30 Years (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- A convicted murderer who escaped from a Michigan psychiatric facility in 1976 was arrested Wednesday in Nashville, where he assumed a new identity and got married.

Thomas Ball, 76, was arrested at his Nashville home Wednesday morning by U.S. marshals, WSMV-TV reported.

Ball was convicted in 1964 of second-degree murder and was sent to what is now called the Southern Michigan Correction Facility in Jackson, Mich.

He escaped from the Center for Forensic Psychiatry in Ypsilanti, Mich., after being transferred there for treatment in 1976.

Ball was living under the name of Thomas Fry and had remarried during him time in Tennessee, although his wife died in the past year.

Justice Department officials said they believe Ball came to Tennessee shortly after his escape.

U.S. marshals in Nashville tracked down Ball while acting on a tip from their counterparts in Michigan.

Ball and his wife ran a storage facility in Franklin, south of Nashville, for several years, the television station reported.

Ball was being held in the Metro Jail pending extradition.

IMMIGRATION:

Son Of Ex-Liberian President To Plead Guilty To Passport Charge (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, September 14, 2006

MIAMI - Charles McArthur Emmanuel, the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor, told a federal judge Wednesday that he will plead guilty to charges of lying about his father's true identity on a passport used to enter the United States.

Emmanuel, who is also known as "Chuckie" Taylor, said "Yes sir, judge" when asked by U.S. District Judge Donald Graham whether he was ready to change his plea to guilty. A second hearing was scheduled for Friday for Emmanuel to formally enter the plea.

Emmanuel, who headed an elite paramilitary unit for his father in Liberia, was arrested March 30 at Miami International Airport shortly after arriving on a flight from Trinidad. His arrest came the day after his father was apprehended in Africa on United Nations charges of alleged atrocities during neighboring Sierra Leone's civil war.

On his application for a U.S. passport, Emmanuel identified his father as "Steven Daniel Smith" rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. The passport fraud charge carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison.

Emmanuel's court-appointed attorney, Miguel Caridad, declined comment after Wednesday's hearing. Karen Rochlin, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, also declined comment.

Left unresolved by the planned guilty plea on the passport charge is whether Emmanuel might yet face war crimes and torture charges based on his role in Taylor's regime.

Emmanuel headed the Anti-Terrorist Unit in Liberia during his father's tenure, which has been described by Human Rights Watch as a force created by Taylor after he became president in 1997 that was involved in murders, extortion, abuse of civilians, recruitment of child soldiers, torture and looting.

Some human rights activists and Liberians have called for U.S. prosecutors to charge Emmanuel under laws making it a crime for U.S. citizens to commit torture or war crimes overseas. Emmanuel, 29, was born in Boston in 1977 while Taylor was an economics student at Bentley College.

Elise Keppler, counsel for Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program, said the guilty plea should have no direct bearing on whether Emmanuel might face more serious charges. But, she said, once a passport fraud sentence is imposed "the clock is ticking" for the Justice Department to make a decision.

"This is not at all the end of the story when it comes to Chuckie Taylor," Keppler said.

Emmanuel also has been placed on a U.N. restricted travel list and a U.S. Treasury Department list prohibiting him from doing business with U.S. citizens and whose assets in the United States could be frozen by the government.

House Republicans Will Push For 700 Miles Of Fencing On Mexico Border (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — House Republicans announced Wednesday that they would move swiftly to pass legislation requiring the Bush administration to build 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border to help stem the flow of illegal immigrants and drugs into the United States.

The legislation, which is expected to go to the House floor for a vote on Thursday, would require construction of two layers of reinforced fencing along stretches of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas that are considered among the most porous parts of the border.

It would also require officials of the Department of Homeland Security to establish “operational control” over all American land and sea borders by using Border Patrol agents, fencing, satellites, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles.

The bill is the first in a series of border security measures House Republicans have promised to pass before the midterm elections in November.

The House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, hailed the legislation as "a critical step towards shutting down the flow of illegal immigration into the United States."

Democrats promptly criticized the plan as political grandstanding intended to energize conservative voters before the elections.

The House passed a nearly identical fencing provision as part of a border security bill in December. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, has publicly raised doubt about the effectiveness of border fencing, particularly in remote desert areas.

While the Senate easily approved 370 miles of border fencing in its own immigration bill in May, it is unclear whether the two chambers will be able to reach agreement on the issue before Congress recesses this month. House leaders have said they will not support the Senate bill, which would create a guest worker plan and put millions of illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship in addition to toughening border security.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, dismissed the fence bill as partisan politicking. "Republicans have a record of failure on border security,'' Ms. Pelosi said, "and this is their attempt to cover up that record.''

House Republicans countered that immigration hearings held across the nation in August showed that Americans expected Congress to toughen border security, particularly while the country remained under threat of terrorist attacks.

Congressional staff members predicted that some House Democrats, especially those from border states, would support the fencing bill.

The barriers, which are to be accompanied by additional lighting, cameras and ground sensors, would be built near Tecate and Calexico on the California border; Columbus, N.M.; and El Paso, Del Rio, Eagle Pass, Laredo and Brownsville in Texas.

House Republicans have also proposed counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work, measures that would require the deportation of immigrants linked to Central American gangs and an increase in the number of Border Patrol agents as part of their border security agenda.

"The first priority of the American people is secure borders,'' said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who is the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

House Republicans said they were encouraged by what they called the success of a 14-mile fence at San Diego that was mandated by Congress in 1996. Crime rates have dropped by 47 percent since the fence was constructed, they said, and the number of illegal immigrants captured dropped to about 9,000 in 2005 from about 200,000 in 1992.

Amy Call, a spokeswoman for the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, said Senate Republicans would consider the legislation.

"The leader believes very strongly that we need to secure the border,'' Ms. Call said. "We'll look at all options to do that.''

Senator Jeff Sessions, the Alabama Republican who championed the fencing provision in the Senate, praised House Republicans for pushing ahead with the legislation. Mr. Sessions said he was concerned that the Senate proposal, which had been attached to the military appropriations bill, might not receive adequate financing.

"They've put forth a strong barrier bill,'' Mr. Sessions said of House Republicans. "It's time for us to complete the job.''

Republicans Resurrect Plan For Fences Along U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Republicans are renewing their push to construct nearly 700 miles of two-layered reinforced fences along the U.S.-Mexico border as the first installment in a series of border security initiatives they hope to send to President Bush in the closing weeks of Congress.

The fence proposal is identical to one that was included in an immigration enforcement bill passed by the House of Representatives in December 2005. But with that measure sidelined in a stalemate with the Senate, House leaders plan to resurrect the $2.2 billion barrier in a single-shot bill that House members are expected to pass on Thursday.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., said the Secure Fence Act represents the opening salvo in an end-of-session flurry of initiatives designed to stem the flow of illegal immigration along the Southwest border.

House leaders have refused to consider a more comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would create a foreign guest-worker program and put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship. Leading supporters of the Senate plan acknowledge that it appears dead for the year.

But President Bush isn't giving up on his push for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws and wants the House and Senate to "work together to come up with comprehensive reform," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Wednesday.

Asked if the White House supports the proposed fence, Snow responded, "What the administration wants is comprehensive reform."

The other House proposals will be announced on Thursday, Boehner and King said, and are expected to include more Border Patrol agents and the expanded use of unmanned aerial vehicles, sensors and other high-tech hardware along the border.

House members approved the five-section fence as an amendment to its immigration bill by a vote of 260-159.

The largest sections include a 361-mile stretch from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz., and 176 miles in Texas, from Laredo to Brownsville.

Two other sections of fencing also would be built in Texas - 51 miles from Del Rio to Eagle Pass, and 88 miles from El Paso to Columbus, New Mexico. A 22-mile section would be built near a port entry in Tecate, Calif., in eastern San Diego County.

House leaders moved forward with the border security package after a series of summertime field hearings that reinforced their opposition to the Senate-passed immigration bill. Democrats have denounced the initiatives as political posturing by Republicans to appease voters demanding congressional action on illegal immigration.

With less than two weeks left before Congress quits work to campaign for the Nov. 7 election, the outlook for Senate passage of the border security package is uncertain at best. But two leading architects of the Senate bill, Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Mel Martinez of Florida, said they would be willing to consider the initiatives.

Senators included 370 miles of fencing in their bill.

House Set To OK Border-fence Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The House is expected to approve nearly 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border today as part of a final effort by House Republicans to place major border-security legislation on President Bush's desk before the November elections.

The Secure Fence Act, which is nearly identical to an amendment the House easily approved last year, would deploy cameras, ground sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles to monitor the border.

In addition, it would change current policy to give Border Patrol agents the authority to forcibly disable fleeing vehicles along the border.

"House Republicans believe we must address the immediate need to secure our borders," said Rep. Peter T. King, the New York Republican who chairs the Homeland Security Committee and will introduce the bill today.

"The field hearings held by House Republicans over August demonstrated that the first priority of the American people is secure borders, whether it is providing additional fencing and infrastructure or more state-of-the-art technology and surveillance to strengthen border security."

House Democrats dismissed the legislation as election-year politics.

DOJ_NMG_0062887

"The Republicans are covering up for their failed record on border security," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi.

"They're passing legislation that has already passed the House and has an uncertain future in the Senate."

Indeed, the Senate has steadfastly opposed such border-security legislation unless it is twinned with provisions to grant a path to citizenship rights to some 10 million illegal aliens already in the country and a guest-worker program to admit more foreign laborers.

Two Senate Republicans yesterday wrote Majority Leader Bill Frist and urged him to abandon the wide-ranging Senate legislation. Sens. Jeff Sessions of Alabama and Wayne Allard of Colorado advised Mr. Frist to instead take up the border -ecurity measures proposed by the House "that a clear majority in both houses favor."

Asked if administration officials would work to pass the House's new border-fence bill, White House press secretary Tony Snow said they are still fighting for a broad bill.

"We are urging the House of Representatives and the United States Senate to work together to come up with comprehensive reform," said Mr. Snow, referring to the guest-worker plan and citizenship rights that Mr. Bush supports.

Asked if Mr. Bush held out hope for an immigration bill, Mr. Snow said, "You know, we've got a very limited amount of time. You draw your own conclusions."

House Republicans also plan to announce a slate of additional border-security proposals they plan to introduce in the coming days.

"Tomorrow's vote represents the first step in that process, and a critical step towards shutting down the flow of illegal immigration into the United States," Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said yesterday.

On Eve Of A Vote, GOP On Both Sides Of Fence (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans on Wednesday launched a renewed bid to stiffen border security and rally voters, unveiling a bill that would mandate construction of 700 miles of fencing in highly populated areas along the U.S. border with Mexico.

The House is to vote today on the "Secure Fence Act," which requires the Department of Homeland Security to prevent "all unlawful entries" into the United States, pushes for border agents to use greater force, and calls for more border surveillance using cameras, ground sensors and satellites.

The new bill is the first of several tightly focused border-security measures House leaders say they will introduce in coming weeks. It represents the latest effort by House Republicans to build momentum for an enforcement-only approach, which they say — despite objections from the Senate and President Bush — is the best way to repair the nation's immigration policies.

"House Republicans believe we must address the immediate need to secure our borders," said Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee and author of the new bill.

The bill would require at least two layers of reinforced fencing, along with vehicle barriers, roads, lighting, cameras and sensors, around the California towns of Tecate and Calexico and in border areas of Texas, Arizona and New Mexico. Surveillance cameras in those areas would have to be in place by May 31, 2007; fence construction would have to be completed a year later.

The bill also calls for a study on constructing a state-of-the-art barrier system along the northern border with Canada.

The House is expected to approve the legislation. When it goes to the Senate, though, it will present a challenge for the bipartisan group that backs the chamber's broader approach to immigration.

Senate legislation approved in May calls for allowing illegal immigrants to gain legal status and creating a guest worker program in addition to increasing enforcement, in part by building a 370-mile fence along the border.

Senators will have to decide whether to support the new House bill and risk losing any leverage they have to get the House to support other measures, such as the guest worker program. If they vote against the House bill, they risk being tarred as weak on security in an election year.

Some conservative Republicans have long supported the get-tough approach. One of them, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), responded to the new House measure by calling on Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to embrace the House approach and declare the Senate bill dead.

Referring to the congressional deadlock over immigration, Sessions wrote to Frist on Wednesday, declaring: "We are not close to … a consensus now. The best solution is to go forward with strong immigration enforcement."

Democrats noted that House Republicans were introducing their bill at a time when the GOP, vulnerable in several election campaigns, needed an issue to rally voters.

"It's so transparent," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), adding that he hoped Latino voters would see through the Republican gambit and help the Democrats on election day.

"We believe in comprehensive immigration reform," Reid said. "We believe there should be a program to bring 12 million people out of the shadows."

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who met with Reid on Wednesday, said he too was disappointed in the House proposal. "I think a bill that only addresses security and does in the punitive way that the House does is absolutely unacceptable," he said, adding: "It's un-American."

Most provisions in the new bill — including the fencing and camera requirements — were taken from the get-tough immigration legislation the House passed in December. That bill bolstered enforcement at the border, in the workplace and inside the country. It also made it a felony to be in the country illegally or to help someone who is — provisions that helped trigger massive demonstrations in the spring.

The new bill "is just a rehashing of legislation that's already been passed," said Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. In the next few weeks, he said, he expects House Republicans to offer anti-gang legislation as part of the border security package.

The one new section would give Customs and Border Protection agents working on the ground and in the air division greater authority to stop smugglers' cars when they enter the U.S. illegally or attempt to flee authorities. Now, the most agents can do is lay down spike strips to puncture the tires of fleeing vehicles.

The new House bill would require Customs and Border Protection to consider other technologies, including rubber bullets, to stop smugglers who are trying to escape or who pose a threat to the community, a Republican aide said.

Drafting several smaller measures allows the House to advertise multiple achievements to voters in November, but it will also allow them to discreetly omit the felony provisions, which many in the Senate vehemently opposed.

House leaders say the new fence bill and the measures that will follow are products of the immigration field hearings they held across the country this summer. Though the hearings were described as an effort to find out what the public thought about immigration and border security, they did not allow for public participation, and the witness lists leaned heavily toward experts who supported the enforcement-only view.

Hispanic Lawmakers Question Absence Of Immigration In New Dem Agenda (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 14, 2006

House Democratic leaders passed around to colleagues Tuesday a plan they would focus on if their party wins control of the lower chamber on Election Day, but although the document was drafted to achieve consensus, it has already angered Democratic Hispanic leaders.

The cause of the consternation is not something the Democrats included in the agenda. Instead, it's something lacking: any mention of immigration. While Republican candidates around the country are trying to make immigration one of the biggest issues of this fall's elections, Democrats appear to be tiptoeing around it.

Some Democrats fear that the issue will hurt them in conservative-leaning districts such as in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky that they must win in order to capture majority control this November.

At a closed-door meeting of the Democratic Steering & Policy Committee on Tuesday, New York Rep. José Serrano, the panel's vice chairman, challenged Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) over the lack of any mention of immigration reform in the caucus's new 25-page agenda document for 2007. The confrontation created a tense moment in the room, said one participant.

Other Democrats agree with Serrano that their party should make known its position on an issue important to Hispanic voters, whom many political strategists believe will be a crucial voting bloc in the future because of their surging numbers.

"I think immigration is a big issue," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. "It's a big issue to the Hispanic community. They deserve some sort of answer on where the Democrats are on immigration."

"Mr. Serrano believes the book reflects a plan for the Democrats of the future," said Sanchez, referring to the agenda document "A New Direction for America," which leaders distributed at Tuesday's meeting. The document resembles the Contract with America that Republicans used to define their priorities before going on to win the House in 1994.

"[Serrano] wanted a plan about immigration in there, [or] maybe just a note that immigrants are important to the country," she added.

Sanchez, a member of the steering and policy committee said she missed the meeting but heard about it from other members.

Serrano said that while many of the immigrants who would benefit from reform cannot vote, Hispanic citizens who do vote perceive attacks on immigrants as attacks on their heritage. Serrano said it is important that Democrats show they care about immigrants.

"We have to let people like me who are citizens know that we're not ignoring the others," he said, adding that any token of recognition would be important.

The new Democratic agenda addresses border security — which House Republicans made the focus of their controversial immigration reform bill — but it makes no mention of immigration policy.

Instead, space is devoted to other issues such as homeland security, energy independence, a "GI Bill of Rights," global warming, biofuels, broadband access for all Americans and lobbying reform. While homeland security has been a hot topic this election season, broadband access has not received much attention on the campaign trail.

"I'm very sad and disappointed that comprehensive immigration reform is not a key and pivotal point for the Democrats," said Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), who heads the Hispanic caucus's immigration reform task force.

Rep. Grace Napolitano (D-Calif.), the Hispanic caucus chairwoman, said she was not familiar with the new agenda document but that she would follow up on the concern expressed by Gutierrez and others. She said that the Hispanic caucus was "100 percent" unified behind the view that there needs to be comprehensive immigration reform.

"I can't give you a reason for why they have not been inclusive," said Napolitano of Democratic leaders' elevation of other issues. "I think they know it's a big issue. It will continue to be a big issue."

Several Democratic members of the steering and policy panel said that immigration was not included in the agenda because it was intended to be a "consensus document."

"What's in that document are things that there is absolute agreement on," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), another member of the Hispanic caucus.

But the agenda includes a statement on the Iraq war, an issue that has divided Democrats since Congress voted to authorize the use of force in 2002.

Cardoza countered that Democrats all agree on the statement in the agenda, which promises that Democrats will "ensure 2006 is a year of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty, with the Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country and with the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a top lieutenant to Pelosi who serves as the policy co-chairman of the steering and policy committee, said there are important issues that were not included in the agenda. But Miller acknowledged that he could not quickly think of one that rises to the same level as immigration.

Jen Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman, noted that there will be a large summit of Hispanic leaders in Washington later this month and that Democrats would unveil an agenda for it entitled, "A New Direction for Hispanic Families."

"A New Direction for America is where the Democrats will begin next Congress," said Crider, who described the agenda as a starting point, not an exhaustive list of what they will tackle.

Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, a political advocacy organization that has spent millions on drawing Hispanic voters into the Democratic Party fold, defended the Democratic record on immigration. Still, he chided leaders for their omission.

"Given how much energy and time Democrats have put into trying to pass comprehensive immigration reform, it's unfortunate that immigration hasn't made it into the document, because the party has made it a priority," said Rosenberg.

Rosenberg urged Democrats not to run away from the issue of immigration, vowing that it's a debate they will win over Republicans, many of whom are focusing exclusively on a tough law-and-order approach to illegal immigration.

Rosenberg predicted that some Democrats would spend a lot of money highlighting immigration this fall.

"We're going to see a lot of back-and-forth in paid media on immigration," he said. "We have nothing to fear. We have a plan to solve the problem and [the Republicans] don't."

Immigrants Prepare For Next Step (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Advocates working on behalf of illegal immigrants said they learned a lesson from the immigrant rights marches that fizzled over the Labor Day holiday: It's time to start driving.

During the recently concluded National Latino Congreso in Los Angeles, organizers decided to focus on voter registration drives for documented immigrants and citizenship drives for immigrants who qualify.

Antonio GonzÃ¡lez, president of the Los Angeles-based Southwest Voter Registration Project, said 50 voter registration drives will be launched in California, Texas, New Mexico and Colorado, states with large Latino populations. In addition, 100 voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives will kick off in October, he said.

"The message from the community was to switch gears," GonzÃ¡lez said. "Now is not the time for mass mobilization of immigrants who don't have the right to vote. There has been a massive amount of intimidation, and immigrants aren't stupid. They're trying to protect themselves as best they can. It's time to get the vote out."

But opponents of illegal immigration said voter and citizenship registration drives will not reignite a movement that has stalled.

Labor Day week demonstrations that were supposed to draw hundreds of thousands of marchers in six cities drew fewer than 25,000 total. The number paled in comparison with the millions of illegal immigrants and supporters who came out in the spring for huge protests in Los Angeles, Dallas, Chicago, Phoenix and Washington.

With little political follow-up in the months after the big marches, immigrant organizers could only watch as legislation stalled in Congress to give illegal immigrants a chance to work legally and start on a path to citizenship. Meanwhile, state and city governments enacted laws targeting illegal immigrants.

Organizations working to stop illegal immigration said the big marches succeeded only in reminding U.S. citizens that the situation is out of control.

"The momentum is on the enforcement side," said Rosemary Jenks, director of government relations for NumbersUSA, a group that wants to decrease immigration. "I don't think the marches generated the spirit they were meant to generate. I think they scared Americans. It was an in-your-face reminder that we have a problem with illegal immigration. In my view, the marches were great."

At the Latino Congreso, or congress, GonzÃ¡lez and other leaders said the marches touched off the largest Latin movement in decades. In May, applications for citizenship were up by 42 percent from that time last year, and approvals rose by 21 percent, according to the Web site of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

But the leaders acknowledged that they failed to dissuade Congress from pushing forward with proposals that would make life harder for illegal immigrants. They also said the Labor Day marches fared poorly because potential marchers felt intimidated because of a government and law enforcement backlash against illegal immigrants.

The timing of the marches -- several of which happened in the middle of the week at a time when families were returning from vacation, children were back at school and the nation was remembering the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- was poor, several organizers acknowledged.

"The plan of action is to play strong defense and adamantly oppose with a variety of tactics the proposals that are coming out of Congress through November," Gonzalez said. "We will take our chances with a new Congress."

GonzÃ¡lez said activists hope to increase the number of registered Latino voters from about 8 million to 10 million.

Baldemar Velasquez, founder and president of the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, who once worked beside farmworker organizer Cesar Chavez, said Latino representatives in Washington are failing to tell Americans the story of why there are so many undocumented Mexican immigrants.

"The North American Free Trade Agreement opened up the market and put 1.3 million Mexican corn farmers out of work," he said. "Where do you think those corn farmers are now? Some of them are in Mexican slums, but a lot of them are in the United States."

The president of the Migration Policy Institute, an organization that studies immigration patterns, disagreed.

"The first part of the statement is true: Mexican farmers have lost their farms," Demetrios Papademetriou said. "But to say that those people are releasing into the United States, I think it's a gigantic leap. I certainly would not make that suggestion."

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Type the words "offshore assets" into an Internet search engine and the electronic sales pitches of a growing mini-industry appear on the computer screen.

"At last, the kind of offshore asset protection previously available only to the extremely wealthy! Make one phone call and sleep better tonight," says website Asset Protection Plus (assetprotec tion.ws).

"I am going to show you how to protect your money and all you own so nobody not even the government can get at it," says U of Money.com (uofmoney.com).

"Once your assets have been transferred to an offshore entity … they are safe," says website Carib Offshore (carib-offshore.com). "You can't be taxed on them."

A network of brokers, accountants, attorneys and other providers is increasingly promoting offshore trusts and accounts as a way to avoid lawsuits, creditors and, in some cases, federal and local taxes in the USA. Riding the rapid expansion of the Internet, some parts of the mini-industry are making tax-avoidance techniques — once mainly offered to high-net-worth individuals in private conferences — available online to average Americans.

"This growing access to people who aren't wealthy and are willing to pay a $3,000 fee … to someone to help hide their assets offshore is getting to be a huge problem," says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking minority member of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which in August released the latest in a series of reports on potential offshore abuses. "Honest taxpayers get socked with the bill" as tax avoiders transfer assets offshore, Levin said.

That cost is high.

Although no precise estimates are possible, as much as $1.6 trillion in North American wealth is likely held in offshore accounts, according to a 2005 report by the Tax Justice Network, an international group opposed to tax avoidance.

Americans with assets offshore probably avoid about $50 billion in taxes annually, according to an estimate by Reuven Avi-Yonah, head of the International Tax Master of Law Program at the University of Michigan Law School.

Hundreds of companies and promoters now use the Internet to guide Americans and others who transfer assets to offshore banks or trusts, according to the Senate subcommittee report. Money moves from domestic accounts to offshore tax havens such as Belize or the Bahamas, at times without any meetings between promoter and client.

Although placing assets in international trusts and banks is not illegal, using such transfers to avoid federal, state and local taxes while retaining control of the assets is considered a possible tax violation, one that the IRS pursues.

"With the increased use of the Internet, these types of tax strategies are more easily spread," said Selva Ozelli, an international tax lawyer and accountant in New York. "It has trickled down to the middle-income level."

Among the Internet guides to offshore companies is Equity Development Group, a Dallas-based firm run by Samuel Congdon. His company has worked for about 900 clients since its founding in 1999, according to a review by the Senate subcommittee. That review, federal court records and interviews with government officials and tax experts provide an inside look at one small cog in the mini-industry.

The IRS recently completed a tax examination of Congdon and his companies and may launch a similar examination of his clients, IRS documents and federal court records in Texas show. Additionally, the Senate subcommittee subpoenaed Congdon's client list and plans to give it to federal investigators.

In a written report released in August, the subcommittee said its review of Congdon showed that he "willfully remained ignorant of his clients' motives for moving money offshore." That stance, the committee concluded, enabled him to operate "in apparent compliance with federal law while facilitating potentially illegal activity."

Congdon's attorney, A. James Lynn, described the conclusion as unfair innuendo about an honest businessman who has had no involvement with tax avoidance.

"There has been no showing that any of his clients have violated the law. And he has not violated the law," said Lynn. "He's being penalized because he's here in the United States, making a living in the United States, paying taxes in the United States, and there are some people who want to run him out of business."

Congdon founded Equity Development Group in 1999 after earning an undergraduate degree at Hillsdale College in Michigan and an MBA at Southern Methodist University. He sought a marketing edge by paying Internet search engine Google "for a top position on certain searches … to direct greater traffic to his site," the subcommittee said. Google would not comment but said many firms pay for the sponsored links that accompany search results.

"Why go offshore?" the Equity Development Group website asks. "Protection from lawsuits. Financial privacy. Regulatory advantages."

Warning that thousands of lawsuits are filed in the USA each week and citing disclosure laws, the website says, "Placing bank and brokerage accounts offshore will keep them off the asset collector's radar screen. Credit agencies and government agencies don't have access to foreign account records or transactions."

For $2,500, Equity Development Group offers a package that includes an offshore corporation formed in Belize, an offshore trust formed in the Bahamas, two offshore bank or brokerage accounts and mail forwarding for one year. Using several locations "weaves a network of anonymity which translates into rock-solid privacy and protection," the website says.

For additional security, the company also offers previously formed "shelf companies" — firms for those who want to show "that their offshore company has been in existence for several months or years" — for as much as $6,200.

In theory, use of a longstanding firm could avoid challenges that would arise if assets were shifted to a newly created offshore firm after a divorce or lawsuit notice.

Congdon told the subcommittee that most of Equity Development Group's clients come from the USA and Canada. Most contacts come via the website, which stated that the firm "has formed hundreds of offshore companies and trusts and opened hundreds of offshore bank and brokerage accounts worldwide representing millions of dollars."

That clientele enabled Congdon's firm to gross several hundred thousand dollars in 2003 and 2004 from markups on offshore packages and referrals from some international businesses, the subcommittee reported. Separately, a federal court record showed that another Congdon firm reported nearly $75,000 in taxable income for 2002.

Although Equity Development Group's website advertises that "there are no surprises or guesswork," some company details are not immediately apparent.

Although the firm identifies Congdon as its founder, the subcommittee said he is also its sole employee.

Although the firm lists offices in Dallas and the Bahamas, the subcommittee said Congdon conceded the second location is "a mailbox."

A federal court filing states that Congdon's firms neither provide nor advertise tax advice. But the Senate subcommittee found that during Congdon's first years in business, he used a presentation that said: "President Clinton vetoed the tax cut bill. Who cares? Offshore investors don't!"

The subcommittee also reported that an earlier version of the website featured an "offshore calculator" that contrasted the growth of an investment account in the USA with the higher gains that account would earn offshore. The calculator came with a disclaimer that warned, "You may be liable for taxes on foreign investments depending on your country of citizenship and/or residency."

The company's current website tells prospective clients that no matter what name is on offshore accounts formed through Equity Development Group, there's no question who controls the assets. "You do. The client is in complete and total control of all accounts at all times," the website states.

"Control is the key," said Ozelli, the tax lawyer. "If you control the assets, they're subject to taxation."

The Senate subcommittee concluded: "It is clear that Mr. Congdon knew that many of his clients moved their assets offshore to avoid U.S. taxation."

"I have no knowledge, none, that any of those clients were guilty of anything so much as a parking ticket," Lynn said.

Proving ownership and collecting taxes owed from those who have moved assets offshore isn't easy. In August testimony for the Senate subcommittee, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson wrote that the agency investigates alleged offshore tax abuses. But, wrote Everson, this "is an area where we still have a long way to go."

"The accounts are constructed in a way to make it almost impossible to prove who controls them," said James Kindler, chief assistant to Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, who has filed numerous offshore-abuse cases.

When the IRS issued summonses for the names and addresses of Congdon's clients, Lynn filed a federal court motion to quash the demand on grounds of harassment.

If the IRS could show any clients were involved "in a tax avoidance scheme or some other violation of law" or "were committing crimes," Congdon "would promptly provide the information," the motion said.

"However, there has been no such showing."

Federal Magistrate Judge Irma Carrillo Ramirez denied the motion in a May 3 ruling that said client data were relevant to the tax examinations of Congdon and his firms. Lynn gave USA TODAY copies of IRS letters that said the exams had been completed with no new taxes levied. The IRS would not comment. A federal court brief filed in April stated that the IRS was not examining Congdon's clients at that time. But the brief said "that if the IRS had the names of the clients participating in offshore trusts it may (or may not) in the future investigate the client's tax liability."

Levin said the Senate subcommittee hopes to facilitate such an investigation by giving the subpoenaed client list to the Justice Department. He added that he and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., the subcommittee chairman, may introduce a bill to make it easier for the IRS to pursue offshore abuses.

Current law requires the federal government to prove that U.S. citizens control assets in offshore accounts before filing tax charges. Levin said the legislation he plans would reverse the legal burden.

"The presumption is that all the income is yours, and you've got to prove otherwise," Levin said.

Tyco Owes IRS $50 Million In Federal Income Taxes (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Tyco International Ltd. still hasn't paid millions of dollars in federal income taxes from an allegedly false tax return filed by its chief tax adviser in 1999, the Internal Revenue Service said.

The potential $50 million tax bill potentially looming over the giant manufacturing-and-services conglomerate came to light this week as Tyco's former vice president in charge of taxation, Raymond Scott Stevenson, was charged with filing a false tax return that failed to report more than $170 million in capital gains on Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return. Mr. Stevenson pleaded not guilty to a felony fraud charge before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla.

According to the IRS, the capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill. Those taxes have not yet been paid by Tyco, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the agency's criminal division.

Ms. Michaud said that after Mr. Stevenson's expected criminal trial, the government may attempt to collect the taxes. Ms. Michaud declined to say whether the company is contesting the tax bill.

Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda and operated from West Windsor, N.J., is in the midst of executing a plan to split the sprawling conglomerate into three stand-alone companies by the first quarter of 2007.

According to the U.S. Attorney Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, who was Tyco's vice president in charge of taxation until 2003, directed a "series of transactions" designed to reduce Tyco's state liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in federal capital gains under federal tax code. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson left off the $170 million, said Ms. Michaud, adding that the investigation is continuing.

Tyco spokeswoman Stacey Lafond declined to say whether it has already taken a charge for the 1999 taxes, or plans to do so. Ms. Lafond said the company has been cooperating with an IRS audit since 2003.

Mr. Stevenson couldn't be reached for comment, and his lawyer in the criminal proceedings didn't return several phone calls.

Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., was hired under Tyco management led by former chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski, who left Tyco in June of 2002 and last year was convicted along with former finance chief Mark Swartz of looting more than $150 million from the giant company. Both men are in prison and have said they plan to appeal.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Seeks A Way To Keep Bolton At The U.N. (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

President Bush's nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations appears increasingly endangered in the Senate, prompting the administration to explore other ways to keep him in the job after his temporary appointment expires in January, officials said yesterday.

The situation represents a sharp turnaround from two weeks ago, when the White House was confident it could finally push through Bolton's long-stalled nomination. But last week's surprise move by Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) to delay a vote convinced Republicans on Capitol Hill that the nomination may be doomed, prompting a search for alternatives.

Administration officials said they have not given up. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Chafee yesterday to kick off a lobbying campaign that will continue today when he returns to Washington after his hard-fought Republican primary victory in Rhode Island on Tuesday.

Bush and national Republicans pulled out the stops to help Chafee win the primary, and they expect a payback. But with Chafee now preparing to face a strong Democratic challenger in a Democratic state in November, many Republicans said he has less incentive to support a firebrand figure such as Bolton.

"It's dead as far as the Senate is concerned," said one Republican official at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where Chafee holds the decisive vote. "Chafee made it a 9 to 9 vote, and that's not going to change." A Senate Republican leadership aide added: "Chafee holds Bolton's future in his hands, and people are very worried he's going to squeeze and never let go."

White House officials said that assessment is premature. "John Bolton's been a tireless advocate for the United States at the U.N.," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "We continue to be confident he'll get the up-or-down vote he deserves, and it remains our goal that the vote would happen before the recess."

Another failed nomination would be a stinging defeat for Bush, who defied Senate opposition last year and installed Bolton at the United Nations on an interim basis with a recess appointment. That appointment will end in January unless the Senate votes to confirm him before adjourning for the year.

The battle over Bolton has been a defining struggle that has put the Bush administration's often brash style of foreign policy to the test. Bolton, who served as undersecretary of state in Bush's first term, has been a lightning rod among diplomats, Democrats and some Republicans because of his outspoken, tough-minded approach to issues such as Iran, the Middle East and the United Nations itself.

But in the 13 months since he was sent to New York, Bolton has surprised some critics with a more consensus-building style than they expected. Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who played a central role in blocking the nomination last year, reversed course this summer, declaring himself impressed by Bolton's performance -- seemingly clearing the way to confirmation.

Chafee put a halt to that last week by saying he would not vote for Bolton until after the administration addresses questions on Middle East policy that he had sent in a letter to Rice. Taken aback, White House officials hoped that it was merely a tactic to put off a controversial vote until after the primary, while preparing contingencies in case it was not.

Even with a "no" vote from Chafee, the Foreign Relations Committee could send the nomination to the floor on a tie vote, but Republicans would probably face a Democratic filibuster.

Bush has the power to give Bolton a second recess appointment, but under the common interpretation of federal law, Bolton could not be paid. Even if Bolton were willing to serve as a volunteer ambassador, officials said, the move could run afoul of another federal law that bans full-time employees from working without compensation.

Another possible option might be an appointment as "acting" ambassador. When the confirmation of President Bill Clinton's nominee for civil rights chief at the Justice Department, Bill Lann Lee, was blocked, Clinton appointed him deputy assistant attorney general, a posting that does not require Senate approval, and then had Lee fill in as "acting assistant attorney general." Lee spent 2 1/2 years in the post that way, although current law limits acting tenures to 210 days.

Such a move could anger a Senate that zealously guards its prerogatives.

"I don't think John Bolton has too many options but to go home," said Paul C. Light, a governance scholar at the Brookings Institution. "At some point, he has to decide whether he has to go."

Chafee's office said he has not decided how to vote. But an adviser outlined the difficult choice: "Politically it's a no-win for the senator. He votes against it, and he hurts the Republicans who just helped him in a primary in a very, very tight race. . . . And he votes for it, he hurts himself with the Democrats that he needs in November."

Earmark Showdown Set To Hit The Floor (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

With Republican leaders and House appropriators deadlocked over the scope of earmark reform, the leadership is on course for a showdown with the spending panel as the resolution is scheduled for a potentially close floor vote today.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the Appropriations Committee, said that another meeting of the panel on Wednesday again failed to result in an agreement on how reforms are applied to spending, tax and authorizing bills.

In particular, appropriators do not believe that the current proposal fairly applies the leadership-backed reforms to bills generated from the Ways and Means Committee as it does to appropriations bills. “Our members are fairly unanimous,” Scofield said.

“Whatever we do should apply to all committees,” added Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), a former Appropriations chairman, noting that he did not object to the principal of disclosure for earmarks.

Even though the House is set to vote on the GOP leadership’s proposal today, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) is planning to hold a full-committee mark-up next week for the panel to institute its own set of internal committee rule changes that would similarly require the sponsors of earmarks to be disclosed in committee reports.

The mark-up announcement suggests that appropriators are prepared to vote against the rule — potentially endangering GOP leaders ability to pass the reforms.

At press time Wednesday, House Majority Leader John Boehner’s (R-Ohio) office had not wavered, and the resolution remained on the schedule for today.

DOJ_NMG_0062896

A spokeswoman for Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said there would be no formal whip effort on earmark reform. Similarly, a spokeswoman for Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Democrats would not formally whip against the rule.

However, a Democratic leadership aide suggested that they may put pressure on their members to vote against the measure if it becomes clear that Democratic votes are necessary to pass it.

"If they want to bring political bills to the floor, then we will vote politically," the aide said, noting that Democrats support earmark reform but argued that the GOP bill is only a fig leaf to appease the conservative base.

Appropriators have not objected to disclosing earmarks included in their spending bills, but believe that the panel has been unfairly targeted on the issue.

The panel sent a counterproposal to leadership that would, among other things, increase disclosure requirements for the Ways and Means Committee, which appropriators believe "got a pass" in the reform debate, according to an aide sympathetic with the committee.

However, a GOP aide familiar with the appropriators' counterproposal said several of the suggested reforms were impractical. For instance, one proposal would expand earmark reform to potentially affect trade agreements, creating a point of order the aide deemed "unworkable" and unlikely to muster any support among the tax-writing panel.

"There is just a fundamental disagreement on what an earmark is," the aide said, arguing that Lewis' decision to hold a mark-up next week contradicts his past commitment to reform. "It undermines their contention that it needs to be comprehensive if they are just going to change their internal rules," the aide said.

The impact of earmark reform would disproportionately affect the Appropriations Committee, but advocates of reform are quick to note that most earmarks are generated from spending bills.

Failure to pass the rule today would not only be an embarrassment for Boehner and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) — who committed the House to enacting this rules change in late July — but it would likely agitate fiscal conservatives in the Conference and outside reform advocates who have supported reining in the earmark process.

Despite Pledges, Congress Clings To Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — Nine months after Congressional leaders vowed to respond to several bribery scandals with comprehensive reforms, their pledges have come to next to nothing.

On Wednesday, leaders of the House prepared to take up a rule requiring individual lawmakers to sign their names to some of the pet projects they tuck into major tax and spending bills. As an internal House rule, the requirement would be in effect only until the end of the session, just a few weeks away.

While reform advocates denounced the proposal as nearly toothless, its bite was still too sharp for many in Congress. By Wednesday night the resolution appeared to be bogged down in a three-way squabble among Republicans, Democrats and the powerful members of the House Appropriations Committee.

"It has been a very pathetic showing," said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for the reform group Common Cause. Even with one congressman in jail, a well-known lobbyist on the way and several other members and staff members still under investigation, she said: "The response to this has been nothing. It has been silence."

The resolution was a chance for House Republican leaders to make good on at least some element of their pledges in January, when Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, declared his party's agenda at risk "because of a growing perception that Congress is for sale" and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois declared that "now is the time for action."

The Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff had recently pleaded guilty to paying bribes to members of Congress, including treating some to a lavish golf trip to Scotland. Former Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California, had pleaded guilty to accepting bribes from a military contractor. Both scandals involved lobbyists paying bribes for "earmarks" — the special interest projects inserted into major spending bills by individual lawmakers, often anonymously and with little scrutiny. House Republican attempts at new rules have been dismissed as paltry by both reform advocates and Democrats. Mr. Hastert initially called for a ban on all Congressional travel at private expense and tightening the limits on lobbyists' gifts to lawmakers and staff

(the current limit is $50, or $250 if the recipient is considered a friend). Others pushed for doubling the one-year waiting period before departing lawmakers and staff members can lobby their former colleagues.

But the lobbying reform bill that passed the House this year was scaled back to drop all these ideas. Instead, it focused on requiring lobbyists to disclose more of their dealings with members and staffs. The Senate passed a very different bill, and aides in both chambers say they are not expected to be reconciled into a final bill this year.

The final thrust of the House reform agenda was a measure to address earmarks — a favorite idea of Mr. Boehner. He initially called for substantive restrictions on their insertion in spending bills but eventually settled for a measure to at least illuminate the murky practice by requiring the public identification of the member who sought each earmark.

But the Republican leaders' draft resolution defined earmarks only as funds for organizations outside the federal government, like cities, universities, museums or nonprofit groups. It would not apply to earmarks directing money to the Defense Department or other federal agencies to execute projects, which account for the vast majority of the federal money spent on earmarks.

Some called the proposed rule almost pointless since members are often eager to boast of the earmarks they secure for constituents. "There is an element you can't legislate, and that is shame," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona and a frequent critic of earmarks. "You have got to have some embarrassment when you bring to the floor an earmark for the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame."

But the members of the House Appropriations Committee found even that too onerous. The appropriators, who have authority over all federal discretionary spending, objected from the start that the Republican leaders were unfairly singling out their favored projects without imposing the same level of scrutiny on the special interest provisions that other committees tuck into tax bills or other laws.

On Wednesday afternoon, Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, convened a meeting of the 64-member committee to consider a draft of the proposed rule. Although the Republican leaders had added some new requirements for disclosure by tax committees and others, the appropriators deemed them inadequate. (Mr. Lewis's ties to a lobbyist who procured earmarks are currently under scrutiny by federal investigators; he has said he did nothing wrong.)

After the meeting, the appropriators demanded changes and threatened to oppose the resolution, said John Scofield, a spokesman for the committee. "We delivered a message to the leaders that we are not there yet," Mr. Scofield said, adding that the committee plans to consider earmark disclosure requirements of its own next week.

House Democrats, meanwhile, submitted a proposed amendment to the Republican resolution that was so comprehensive it would upend much of the way Washington does business — and thus was all but certain to fail.

The Democratic proposal would block members of Congress from sponsoring earmarks that would benefit any former staff members or family members. Many Congressional staff members and lawmakers' relatives eventually work as lobbyists, and the proposal would limit their ability to make money for seeking earmarks for their clients.

Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for the Republican-controlled House rules committee, said the committee rejected the proposal as too broadly worded and "poorly thought out."

Although it is unlikely that such a far-reaching proposal could pass a vote of the Democratic caucus, its rejection by the Republicans could give the Democrats a pretext for opposing the Republicans' milder reform proposal as too weak.

"Transparency is not enough," said Representative Chris Van Hollen, Democrat of Maryland, who was a sponsor of the proposal. "You can't be pushing for earmarks that are a clear conflict of interest." Asked if he believed most Democrats would support his measure, Mr. Van Hollen challenged Republicans to put it to a vote.

If Democrats and the Republican appropriators are opposed to the resolution, it would stand little chance of passing.

Late Wednesday night, Ms. Maney of the Rules committee said the panel was meeting to work out technical changes.

But Fred Wertheimer, president of the reform advocacy group Democracy 21, called the dispute over the scaled-back earmark rule "absurd."

"They have had months to reach an agreement even among House Republicans about what this fig leaf should look like," he said, "and they still haven't been able to do it."

Lewis Balks At Earmark Legislation (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 14, 2006

House Republican appropriators remained unwilling yesterday to publicly endorse their leadership's resolution requiring disclosure of earmark sponsors, setting up a possible rebellion by committee members that could bring down the resolution.

Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) huddled with his panel yesterday afternoon but emerged with no firm panel-wide plan to oppose the earmark-reform resolution. Many GOP appropriators believe the resolution singles out their committee's product while applying a narrow definition of tax and authorizing earmarks.

"We are attempting to communicate with leadership that this committee feels very strongly that earmark reform is a priority, but it should apply to everybody," Lewis said after the meeting. "We feel very strongly that... the broad-based membership should be involved in it, not just the Appropriations Committee."

Lewis and other appropriators stressed that the panel would stay unified even as today's slated floor vote looms and the pressure mounts to give leadership a win heading into the midterm elections. Reps. John Sweeney (R-N.Y.) and Don Sherwood (R-Pa.), who are members of the panel, said appropriators were of one mind on the resolution.

"We're still having concerns that it doesn't apply to all committees," Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said. The pension bill that passed the House in July, he added, "had a number of very positive provisions in it for different companies" that would not be deemed an earmark according to the reform resolution, drafted by House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.)

That resolution would allow the Joint Committee on Taxation to determine tax earmarks because of scoring demands. A Rules Committee summary defines a tax earmark as "any revenue-losing provision that provides a Federal tax deduction, credit, exclusion, or preference to only one beneficiary."

Authorizing earmarks are defined similarly to appropriations earmarks in the summary, as provisions that "permit funds to be allocated outside of the normal formula-driven or competitive bidding process and to be targeted to a specific entity, State, or Congressional district."

Republican Appropriations staff distributed a paper last week explaining loopholes in the language that would allow members of the tax and authorizing committees to avoid the restrictions that would hamstring appropriators.

Particularly galling was a section that, they argue, allows tax writers ostensibly to define what is and what is not an earmark.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) dismissed that concern yesterday following a lunch with members of his committee.

To ease passage, Republican leaders have coupled the rule for the bill with the language of the resolution itself. This prevents opponents from bringing down the earmark changes on a procedural vote and, in essence, dares them to vote against legislation to stem government spending.

This showdown comes two months before the November election and puts GOP leaders in the awkward position of angering the Appropriations chairman as those same leaders roll out a series of measures to beef up security on the border that are supposed to be included in the annual spending bills.

The fight also endangers party unity on the brink of the midterms. As appropriators held their meeting, Republican Study Committee (RSC) leaders held a rally on the Cannon Terrace to tout the resolution as a first step toward more comprehensive reform.

RSC Chairman Mike Pence (R-Ind.) tied the resolution into the GOP's election message of fiscal responsibility: "The answer is not more big-spending liberals, the answer is more conservative Republicans."

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who has forced numerous floor votes to kill individual member earmarks, recalled the RSC's attention-grabbing "Operation Offset" plan to cut federal spending, which help push through last year's $47 billion budget-cutting reconciliation bill.

"You can do all that and have one Bridge to Nowhere that in the public mind trumps everything," Flake said, warning that "the public recognizes [earmarks] as a Congress out of control."

Republican appropriators have not universally supported the position of Lewis and committee staff.

DOJ_NMG_0062899

During a meeting last week, committee members, including Reps. John Carter (R-Texas) and Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.), recommended that their colleagues pass an internal committee rule to deal with the earmark issue, said one member present. That move might preempt leaders from bringing a broader bill to the floor.

At the same meeting, Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) told members they should support the leadership language, the same member said. Others stood with Lewis in objecting to the changes.

"It's not what they told us they were going to do," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who has been a vocal critic of the conservative members who are leading this fight. "[The leaders] told us all the committees would be treated the same," he added, referring to a deal struck with appropriators in May to secure their votes for a lobbying-reform package now stalled in conference.

LaHood doubted the rules change would have any resonance with voters this campaign season.

"I think the elections will be about the war in Iraq and the war on terror," LaHood said after emerging from the meeting. "I don't think we're going to rise or fall on this."

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), an appropriator who serves in the leadership, has been the chief negotiator between the committee and the House leaders during the last two weeks, members said.

At least one Republican legislator yesterday questioned the wisdom of Lewis waging a battle on earmark reform given the ongoing federal investigation on whether or not he used his influence illegally to insert earmarks on spending bills that would benefit the clients of his friends and/or former staff.

"I have never seen a member more unaware of his own personal situation," one Republican said yesterday.

Lewis has denied any wrongdoing and the Justice Department has not charged any members, staff or lobbyists with illegal activity on the issue.

Leadership may be hoping to peel off enough Democrats to compensate for the loss of appropriators' votes on the earmark-reform plan. One senior House Democratic aide, however, said little whipping is expected on the earmark resolution despite Republican assumptions that most members of the minority will oppose it.

The June vote on a line-item veto bill from RSC member Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) saw 35 Democrats voting with the GOP, including 16 members of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. Eight appropriators, including Lewis, were among the 15 Republicans voting against the line-item veto.

"This legislation is not what we would hope for," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "It doesn't save a single dollar, doesn't cut a single earmark, doesn't give full disclosure."

Congress Lifts Blinds On Its Spending (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Coming soon to a laptop near you: how government is spending your federal tax dollars - contracts, grants, and special projects sought by lawmakers.

From wartime contracts for Halliburton to earmarks for the Punxsutawney Weather Discovery Center (think "famous groundhog") in Pennsylvania, all will be listed on a searchable database.

It's the least controversial of all the reforms Congress has considered since last year's bribery and corruption scandals, and its passage will provide an effective new tool for anyone wanting to look over lawmakers' shoulders soon after they clear spending bills.

"This is an extraordinary step for Congress to take, because it will put government information into the hands of millions of citizens who use the Internet as a source of information," says Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a public-interest group that promotes transparency in government. "The notion of government information on the Internet in the 21st-century ought to be a no-brainer."

It took a mobilization of bloggers and citizen groups to break secret holds placed on the bill in the Senate, where the bill passed unanimously Sept. 7. It was expected to clear the House after press time Thursday with broad bipartisan support.

The bill, sponsored by Sens. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma and Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, requires the White House Office of Management & Budget to maintain a database on some $1 trillion in US spending. New entries will be logged within 30 days of funds being disbursed. Senate majority leader Bill Frist last week credited the "blogosphere" for saving the bill.

"This can be a very powerful tool in the hands of citizens," says Stephen Ellis, vice president of programs for Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan budget watchdog group in Washington. "It will be the gold standard of information for debates over whether this is worthwhile spending or not."

Since last March, when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) of California was convicted of taking bribes, Congress has struggled to find agreement on how to reform ethics and lobbying rules, without success. The big lobby-reform bills remain deadlocked between the House and Senate.

The next battle, expected in the House Thursday, is over how much members of Congress and the public will know about the earmarks tacked onto spending bills before they come up for a vote. Sensing rising public objection to earmarks, appropriators in the House and Senate have instituted their own procedural reforms for fiscal year 2007 spending bills.

For example, appropriators are limiting the number of projects members can propose, as well as making the projects more visible to the public earlier in the process. In the House, member requests for projects this year declined 37 percent, or about $7.5 billion, from last year. House appropriators are also often requiring a local spending match for some economic-development earmarks, a move they say will discourage frivolous projects.

"We were getting about 25 requests per member. Now it's an average of 10," says John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee. "It helps us to do better oversight and weed out the bad ones." In addition, House appropriators say they will avoid adding earmarks when House and Senate conferees reconcile two versions of a spending bill - a source of abuse in the past.

While Appropriations Committee members have borne much of the criticism for earmarking, the practice exists in other committees as well. Congress included 6,373 earmarks in the last highway bill, amounting to $24.2 billion. The recent Water Research Development Act included 250 earmarks at a cost of $11 billion. As of press time, the House version of earmark reform still applied mainly to the Appropriations Committee.

"There ought to be a blanket provision with respect to earmarks - whether on taxes, healthcare, defense, or appropriations," says Ms. Miller.

Still, reformers say the searchable database is a key first step. "We see this like the battle in the Pacific in World War II: You take one island at a time," says John Hart, spokesman for Senator Coburn.

Critics, though, note that even the Coburn transparency reform doesn't get to the root of the problem. "The information comes 30 days after the funds are spent. That's about 60 days too late," says Winslow Wheeler, director of the Straus Military Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information here. "We still lack an objective assessment of the spending." Spending accountability: a work in progress

A done deal

The Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act, already approved by the Senate, was expected to clear the House on Wednesday. It does the following:

• Creates a database that names recipients and dollar amounts of most federal grants, contracts, and loans. These will be searchable online and available to the public.

• Identifies so-called pork-barrel projects, or earmarks, in the searchable database. The database will not necessarily name lawmakers who added an earmark, but it will reveal the congressional district where the federal money will go.

• Gives the White House Office of Management & Budget the job of managing the online database.

On working

The House is wrangling over a rule change that would do the following:

• Identify lawmakers adding earmarks to bills - in advance of a vote on the bill. In dispute is whether the rule change applies just to Appropriations Committee members or to other committees.

FEMA Overhaul Debate Stalls Funds For Interoperable Radios (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0062901

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

House Republicans are blocking an attempt to spend $3.1 billion to help the nation's police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies as Congress debates a proposed overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

As both parties intensified the election-season rhetoric over national security, Democrats accused GOP leaders of shortchanging the well-documented need to improve communication among first responders. Republicans acknowledged that they do not want to spend billions prematurely, saying more planning and coordination are needed.

"It is just so unfair for the White House not to support the full funding of solving the interoperability problem," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), ranking Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff rebuffed calls for dedicated federal grants to upgrade equipment, coordinate plans, train emergency workers and adapt common technology standards. Instead, he said, state and local leaders must first agree on radio codes and protocols.

"This is not, frankly, a technology issue," Chertoff told the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs on Tuesday. "This is an issue of having community leaders come to an agreement."

The inability of police and firefighters to talk by radio was a critical factor after the 2001 World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks, according to the Sept. 11 commission.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors reports that 23 percent of the nation's 60,000 police and fire departments cannot communicate with each other over the radio, one-third cannot talk to county sheriffs, and most cannot talk to state or federal agencies. Governors and state homeland security advisers say the issue is their top priority, according to the National Governors Association.

At the end of this year, the federal government was supposed to make available to first responders a slice of the broadcast spectrum now held by television broadcasters. Congress has changed the deadline to June 2009 and set aside $1 billion for gear.

The Department of Homeland Security has provided $2.1 billion to states and localities since 2003. But congressional analysts say that annual grants are not enough and that "several billions" will be needed to upgrade the nation's $100 billion infrastructure for public safety communications.

The federal government has been slow to set gear and technology standards, which private companies also resist for proprietary reasons. Local governments often fail to plan or train together or to coordinate major equipment purchases.

For now, the Department of Homeland Security has provided equipment to the nation's 10 highest-threat cities that enables commanders to patch into each other's radio systems. The department is surveying the 50 states and the 75 largest urban areas before taking the next steps.

"I would hesitate to dedicate a huge amount of money upfront without the input of the localities themselves to make a determination of what they feel they need and how far they've come," Chertoff said.

Earlier this year, a bipartisan Senate bill to overhaul FEMA after Hurricane Katrina proposed $3.3 billion over five years in interoperable communications grants. The bill was approved in committee, but the money was dropped when GOP leaders decided to include the FEMA overhaul in a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill. Thompson said his efforts to revive the proposal have been rebuffed.

Yesterday, state emergency management officials and congressional aides said talks have bogged down over funding and jurisdictional fights, including whether to rename FEMA and whether to bring the nation's disaster laws in line with recommendations made in post-Katrina government reports.

Obama And Coburn Revive Effort To Stop No-bid FEMA Contracts (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062902

Having scored a high-profile victory on their bill to set up an online federal spending database, the unlikely freshman duo of Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) are hoping their fourth bid to crack down on no-bid contracting at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) will finally make it to the president's desk.

The Senate has passed four versions this year of Obama and Coburn's language requiring FEMA to accept competitive bids for hurricane reconstruction contracts valued above $500,000, but both chambers have yet to give their plan the force of law. As conferees near agreement on the defense authorization bill amid election-year pressures to appear tough on wasteful spending, the freshmen are pushing for their block on no-bids to emerge in the conference report.

"Everything we have seen about the Katrina rebuilding effort shows this is something that should have been initiated right away," Coburn spokesman John Hart said. "The closer you get to the election, the more members of Congress will want to demonstrate to the public that they are fiscally responsible."

Few senators have as much political capital on fiscal responsibility as Coburn, who riled some of his more seasoned colleagues by attempting to force votes on individual earmarks in the spring emergency supplemental. Perhaps unsurprisingly, an Obama and Coburn amendment enforcing competitive bidding at FEMA that passed the Senate unanimously was later left off of the conference report on that emergency supplemental.

But the landscape has shifted in recent weeks since Obama and Coburn's plan for an Internet listing of federal grants and contracts sparked an avalanche of blogger publicity and won public support from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). The House was poised to approve the Senate version of that bill yesterday, giving the senators new political capital at a crucial moment.

"Call it 'Groundhog Day' legislating if you want, but it's something that is very important to both of them," Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said, riffing on the popular film about living through the same day repeatedly. "If it's not [included in the conference report], we will be frustrated and we will offer it again."

Obama and Coburn wrote to FEMA director David Paulison last month after viewing reports that the four main no-bid contracts awarded for emergency housing of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina had bloated from $400 million to $3.4 billion. Paulison had echoed the senators' qualms about no-bid abuse during private meetings in December and May, but the four contracts — given to Bechtel Corp., Fluor, the Shaw Group and CH2M Hill — were not reopened for bidding despite the agency's initial promises to that effect.

"While FEMA cannot comment on pending legislation, FEMA director Paulison has reiterated in public and in front of the Senate Homeland Committee that he is 'no fan of no-bid contracts,'" FEMA national spokesman Aaron Walker said. "We would welcome any dialogue to increase the competitive nature of our contracting and procurement policies."

More momentum for Obama and Coburn's amendment could come from a report on Katrina no-bid contracts released by a team of House Democrats a to coincide with the one-year anniversary of the disaster last month. That investigation, led by Government Reform Committee ranking Democrat Henry Waxman (Calif.), found that 70 percent of FEMA's Katrina contracts affected by the Obama-Coburn amendment were awarded with incompletely open competition.

The four businesses receiving the largest Katrina no-bids recently won new contracts for Katrina housing that were competitively bid, and the FEMA amendment was not discussed publicly following the most recent defense authorization conference meeting. But Obama and Coburn, who are also continuing to push their proposal for a chief financial officer to monitor spending on the Gulf Coast, plan to keep leveraging their lack of seniority for more public attention on their cause.

"Sometimes freshmen can be more in touch with what people are thinking," Hart said. "There is plenty of evidence that the longer people are in Washington, the less responsive they become."

NIH Punishments Criticized (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Angry members of Congress took federal health officials to task yesterday for what they said was a pattern of being "soft" on government scientists found to have violated ethics rules.

One National Institutes of Health scientist is still on the job a year after the agency determined he had improperly accepted more than $700,000 in consulting fees -- and has taken recent trips to Switzerland and Hawaii on the government's tab -- lawmakers said at a hearing.

Another researcher is still at NIH after investigators found he had improperly accepted about $100,000 from more than 25 companies, members complained.

And although six NIH scientists deemed to have broken ethics rules left their jobs in the past year or so before disciplinary action could be taken, not one of the remaining 36 violators identified in an NIH-wide investigation was fired -- and most have endured punishment no more severe than a "letter of caution."

"I do recognize that NIH has taken needed steps to improve its ethics program," said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which for years has been dogging NIH over alleged ethics violations. "But more action is needed."

Agency officials denied that they have been less than rigorous in meting out punishment to those who broke the rules that once governed such arrangements. NIH banned all outside consulting with drug and biotech companies more than a year ago, when it became clear that a few dozen had not reported their arrangements as required.

NIH Deputy Director Raynard Kington said that at the conclusion of its investigation, NIH began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others to the Office of Inspector General for possible prosecution. That office decided to pursue only two -- Alzheimer's disease researcher Trey Sunderland and cancer researcher Thomas Walsh.

But while NIH officials long ago expressed a desire to fire those two, neither the inspector general nor NIH has the power to do so because both scientists are members of the Public Health Service's Commissioned Corps. The corps' disciplinary rules -- including the right to a formal corps hearing -- trump NIH's.

Sunderland's corps hearing has been delayed indefinitely at the request of the Justice Department, which is considering criminal charges, according to testimony yesterday by John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health. Walsh's hearing has been delayed because it was awaiting completion of Sunderland's. Last week the corps decided to bump Walsh's case ahead of Sunderland's and began to organize a hearing for him, Agwunobi said.

Meanwhile, both researchers have continued to work at NIH, with travel and other job restrictions imposed only recently in the wake of fresh congressional inquiries. So lax has oversight of Sunderland's activities been, legislators said, that NIH did not stop him from recently shipping -- at government expense -- personal belongings to a New York hospital where he had hoped to continue his research. Those belongings were returned to Bethesda after the lapse was detected, an NIH spokesman said, again at government expense.

Several members complained that the punishments doled out to violators were not tough enough. Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.) pointed to one case in which a researcher was found to have received nearly $475,000 without proper approval or disclosure and received a penalty of a 45-day suspension without pay.

"So where is the deterrent?" Stupak asked, calculating aloud to show that the scientist still came out ahead financially. "What does it take to get an NIH scientist terminated?"

NIH officials responded that in some cases, including that one, punishment was less than might seem appropriate because although the researcher did not report the income properly, the outside work was found to have posed no conflict of interest and would have been approved under the rules in place then.

Undaunted, Stupak asked why federal scientists cannot maintain the same ethical standards as members of Congress. Often, he said, legislators get letters in the mail with a dollar bill inside to encourage them to reply. "Do you know what would happen to any of us," Stupak asked, "if we kept that dollar?"

Panel Challenges NIH Handling Of Rules Violations (LAT)

By David Willman

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062904

WASHINGTON — A congressional subcommittee chairman and a top administrator of the National Institutes of Health agreed on at least one point Wednesday: Private financial deals between drug companies and NIH scientists that have come to light in recent years have posed the worst scandal in the agency's history.

"This is the largest scandal in all of the NIH's existence," said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on investigations. To which NIH Deputy Director Raynard S. Kington nodded and replied, "We certainly hope it will be the last."

Citing internal ethics investigations over the last three years, Kington said the agency had disciplined 34 NIH scientists who had violated conflict-of-interest rules. Six scientists were suspended or placed on probation and the others were admonished orally or by letter, according to NIH documents.

NIH officials also assured the panel that they had recommended the termination of two other senior scientists who accepted drug company money without obtaining required advance approval.

"When violations were found, NIH implemented sanctions ranging from oral admonishments to letters of reprimand to suspensions," Kington told the subcommittee. "In all cases where individual scientists failed to take [personal] leave to conduct outside activities, they were directed to pay back that leave to the government."

But Kington's assurances were challenged by Republicans and Democrats on the subcommittee. They noted that despite previous statements of concern and outrage from senior NIH officials, no employee had been fired, and they said most of the disciplinary actions had been tepid.

The session marked the sixth congressional hearing since January 2004 that centered on NIH conflicts of interest.

"This is really an ethical Potemkin village, where a hollow system appears to provide the illusion of integrity, but transgressors never leave," said Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Much of the contentious afternoon session focused on two researchers: Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III, a geriatric psychiatrist who has researched Alzheimer's disease, and Dr. Thomas J. Walsh, who has researched fungal diseases in cancer patients.

Their cases are pending before an administrator at the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a uniformed branch of the service. A resolution of Sunderland's case has been delayed because of a separate investigation by the U.S. Justice Department, Bush administration officials said.

Panel members pointed out that Sunderland had been allowed until last month to retain most of his NIH privileges and that he had taken several trips at the expense of the government, visiting Hawaii and Geneva.

At a congressional hearing in June, Sunderland's boss, Dr. Thomas R. Insel, director of the National Institute of Mental Health, said Sunderland's receipt of more than $600,000 in fees from Pfizer Inc. was unacceptable.

Yet Barton said Wednesday that several months earlier, Insel had "recommended a $15,000 retention bonus" for Sunderland.

Barton and other subcommittee members also said that Sunderland had shipped samples of spinal fluid drawn from patients at the NIH to a New York hospital, where he had intended to take a new position. Those samples were returned in recent months after the shipments came under fire from the congressional panel. Officials said the samples should not have been transferred out of NIH custody.

Barton chided Dr. John O. Agwunobi, the Bush administration's assistant secretary for health, for not demanding swift resolution of the Sunderland case. "You're sittin' on your bottom, and you're not doing anything about it," Barton said, adding that Sunderland had been allowed to flout rules with impunity. "It's a farce."

In Walsh's case, the researcher accepted about $100,000 in fees from drug companies without required advance permission. On Wednesday, Barton criticized the director of the National Cancer Institute, Dr. John Niederhuber, as doing little to address Walsh's conduct except to recommend termination by the Commissioned Corps.

Niederhuber confirmed that he had recommended in December that Walsh be fired. But Niederhuber also lauded Walsh as "probably the world's expert on antifungal agents."

Documents distributed at Wednesday's hearing suggested that Walsh was paid $12,000 by Pfizer to help prepare the company for an October 2001 meeting held by a Food and Drug Administration advisory committee. Walsh had collaborated with the company in leading a major study of its antifungal drug, Vfend.

The NIH recently opened a separate internal review of Walsh's appearances with pharmaceutical companies at public and private FDA meetings. Merck & Co. identified Walsh as a consultant when he appeared at a January 2001 FDA advisory committee meeting that focused on the company's new antifungal drug. Walsh vouched for the effectiveness of Merck's drug, and the committee voted unanimously to recommend its approval.

Kington told the subcommittee on Wednesday that the NIH was now "clarifying its policies regarding the presentation of scientific information" to FDA advisory committees.

U.S. conflict-of-interest law generally prohibits a federal employee from representing an outside party before a government agency. Walsh and his attorneys have said he did not make any appearance before the FDA as a representative of any company.

In addition to all of the internal reviews, Kington noted that a policy enacted last year prohibits all NIH employees from accepting consulting fees, stock or stock options from drug companies. The previous rules allowed agency scientists to accept unlimited sums of compensation from industry.

A July 2005 report by the U.S. Office of Government Ethics concluded that the NIH was infused with a "permissive culture." Kington said Wednesday that agency officials were confident that the problems were a thing of the past, "with new restrictions in place and a more efficient and rigorous ethics program underway."

The subcommittee members appeared unconvinced.

"I believe that the tentacles of the drug companies influence the research at NIH, much to the consternation of the American people," said Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.).

Head Of Broadcasts Board Survives Effort To Oust Him (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the embattled chairman of the federal board that oversees most government broadcasts to foreign countries, narrowly survived an effort to oust him on Wednesday.

After a recent report by the inspector general at the State Department that Mr. Tomlinson had used his office to run a horse-racing operation and that he had improperly put a friend on the payroll, the three Democratic members of the seven-member Broadcasting Board of Governors offered two resolutions.

One resolution called for his resignation as chairman during a continuing inquiry; the other sought to curtail his authority sharply. The Justice Department has declined to pursue a criminal investigation but is conducting a related civil inquiry.

Both resolutions failed 3 to 3 on party-line votes. Mr. Tomlinson did not participate in the votes, people involved in the closed-door session said.

Mr. Tomlinson has denied doing anything improper and had said the investigation “was inspired by partisan divisions inside the Broadcasting Board of Governors.” Mr. Tomlinson, whose term has expired, has been nominated for a second term and continues to have the support of the White House.

Republicans in the Senate said that in light of the continuing inquiry, they would not bring his nomination to the floor this year. Under federal law, board members may continue to serve past the expiration of their appointments until successors are named.

The board oversees a group of broadcasting operations to more than 100 million listeners abroad. The operations include Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and Radio Martí.

Last year, Mr. Tomlinson was ousted from the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting after a report by that agency’s inspector general. In that report, the inspector general said he had found evidence that Mr. Tomlinson violated rules intended to insulate public television and radio from political influence.

The three Democrats who voted Wednesday in favor of the resolutions — Joaquin F. Blaya, D. Jeffrey Hirschberg and Edward E. Kaufman — said in a statement that the “independent report of the inspector general,” rather than partisanship, had prompted the resolutions.

There was no statement from the three Republicans who supported Mr. Tomlinson. They are Karen P. Hughes, the under secretary of state for public diplomacy, who serves as the representative for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Steven J. Simmons; and Blanquita Walsh Cullum.

All of the governors were appointed by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

In a statement issued by a board spokesman, Mr. Tomlinson said, “Surely reasonable people should conclude that it is time to move on.”

Broadcast Board Refuses To Oust Bush Nominee (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Democratic members of the federal Broadcasting Board of Governors yesterday failed in a bid to remove Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, who has been accused of improperly using his office to benefit himself and a friend.

In two party-line votes, the BBG's three Republicans and three Democrats first split over forcing Mr. Tomlinson to resign and then over revoking his authority to run the agency that oversees Voice of America and other government broadcasting operations.

"This was clearly a partisan effort," said board member Blanquita Cullum, who supports Mr. Tomlinson, a conservative stalwart who was appointed to the post by President Bush. "The move was planned to usurp the authority of President Bush and the Senate."

Republicans said Democratic board member Jeffrey Hirschberg, who called for the votes, is engaging in a partisan attack, citing his financial ties to liberal figures such as former President Bill Clinton.

Since 1999, Mr. Hirschberg has given nearly $100,000 to Democratic candidates and organizations, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, according to public campaign-finance records.

Mr. Hirschberg's brother, Judd Blair Hirschberg, who was convicted of mail fraud in 1991, was one of 59 persons pardoned by Mr. Clinton in December 2000, shortly before he left office.

"It is incorrect for Ken Tomlinson to characterize his problems as caused by 'partisan divisions inside the BBG,' " read a statement released by Mr. Hirschberg and fellow board members Joaquin F. Blaya and Edward E. Kaufman.

"It is the independent report of the Inspector General, which is the cause of his problems."

A State Department inspector-general investigation, called for by Democratic legislators, accuses Mr. Tomlinson of running a "horse-racing operation" from his BBG office and said he "improperly put a friend on the payroll." Mr. Tomlinson runs a stable of thoroughbred racehorses on his private farm in Virginia.

The results of the investigation were turned over to the Justice Department, which has declined to press charges against Mr. Tomlinson. According to the IG report, Mr. Tomlinson spent fewer than three minutes and sent one e-mail per day on his horse-racing ventures.

Mr. Tomlinson was in BBG meetings yesterday and was not available for comment.

Neither Mr. Tomlinson nor members of the BBG received a copy of the IG's report, which has been leaked to the press, before yesterday's vote.

Mr. Tomlinson, who has close ties to White House adviser Karl Rove, was nominated by Mr. Bush in August 2002. His term expired in 2004, and he was re-nominated, but the Senate has refused to act on it. Mr. Tomlinson can remain as chairman until the Senate approves a new nominee.

The IG investigation was requested by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, and Reps. Howard L. Berman and Tom Lantos, California Democrats.

"Congressman Berman believes that surely the president will now send a new nominee to the Hill," with "an ethical cloud" still surrounding Mr. Tomlinson, said Berman spokeswoman Gene Smith.

Last year, Mr. Tomlinson resigned from the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which he had chaired. The CPB's inspector general had accused him of political favoritism in hiring employees.

Clyburn V. Rahm For Whip (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 14, 2006

With political pundits predicting that Democrats will recapture the House this fall, Democratic lawmakers are debating who would become the majority whip: Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), moving up one step from caucus chairman, or Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the campaign wizard who would have orchestrated the victory.

Although only Clyburn has declared his interest in the position, the escalating rivalry between the two was on display this week when news broke that the Democratic National Committee (DNC) would funnel $60,000 into each of 40 House districts, breaking a stalemate between the DNC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Several Democratic officials credited Clyburn with brokering the deal. He invited DNC chief Howard Dean to his hideaway office in the Capitol July 21 in the hopes of convincing him to dip into the DNC's coffers and fund turnout efforts for House Democrats.

Allies of Emanuel, however, dispute Clyburn's influence, arguing that the agreement was engineered solely between staff.

Clyburn and Emanuel themselves declined to answer questions about how this week's deal with the DNC came to be.

The differing accounts of a relatively minor issue underscore a growing tension in the Democratic caucus: Clyburn is angling to be whip if Democrats control the House, and many see Emanuel as his chief competition.

Although neither is openly campaigning for the post, Clyburn, the current caucus chair, is clearly interested.

"If the opportunity is there, I plan to run for whip," he said last week, "I'm hoping that the way I conduct myself as caucus chair would make me worthy of moving to the next level, should the opportunity present itself."

Clyburn called it premature to start campaigning for the job.

"Whatever happens, Rahm and I will sit down and talk as gentlemen. On the morning of Nov. 8, I suspect we'll have a discussion of where we are going forward," he said.

As an African-American and a well-liked caucus chairman, Clyburn could mount a strong candidacy. He ran unopposed for his current post.

"Most people feel Clyburn has earned the respect of being caucus whip," said Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) last week. "That's the consensus of opinion I hear. The fact is the African American community has been a mainstay of the Democratic party. To have someone who is qualified for the job and also African American is an important opportunity."

"Jim is the odds-on favorite," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) two weeks ago. "My sense is Clyburn has the whip job locked up. There hasn't been an African-American whip since [former Rep.] Bill Gray [D-Pa.]. There's also geography, sending the message that Democrats aren't writing off the South."

But many House Democrats believe the caucus will have to find a place in the leadership for Emanuel, the DCCC chair who will have engineered their victory.

Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), who has worked with Emanuel to help recruit Democratic candidates this cycle, said that she has heard his name floated as a whip candidate by her colleagues.

"Specifically by one of the Blue Dogs, who said we should reward him – if we win back the majority," she said, referring to a member of the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative Democrats.

But Solis added that she had heard nothing directly from Emanuel about his ambitions.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, said he would back Clyburn in a whip race and that he has also heard colleagues mention Emanuel as a contender for the post.

While Democratic lawmakers have said little publicly about the whip contest – in contrast to the behind-the-scenes race for Democratic majority leader, which has drawn much press attention – Thompson said there is widespread speculation among his colleagues about next year's leadership.

"Everybody's talking," said Thompson, who declined to name names.

"If we win the House back, Rahm deserves credit and he deserves a place in leadership," said one Democratic lawmaker allied with Emanuel. Some see the whip as the ideal post to showcase Emanuel's effectiveness.

With strong ties to the centrist Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), he appeals to many moderates. He would also have considerable cachet among newly elected members, many of whom he would have personally recruited and funded.

"He's done a helluva job," said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), a founder of the Blue Dog Coalition. "I'd be disposed to vote for him if he does want to run. He's not ideologically hide-bound; He's not in an ideological straight-jacket."

"He has a lot of chits to pull in," conceded a Democratic member who supports Clyburn's bid.

The DCCC post has served as a stepping stone to whip in the past. Former Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.) became whip in 1987 after serving as DCCC chairman from 1981 to 1986.

But Emanuel carries some personal baggage with him. His penchant for profanity and bluntness provokes strong emotions in many quarters, especially with the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

Emanuel himself has long refused to entertain questions about his future, stating that his singular focus is on winning in November.

"Rahm is focused solely on his responsibilities to his Democratic candidates, and to his caucus," said a DCCC aide, "He doesn't have the luxury or the time to focus on anything but the midterm elections."

A Democratic lawmaker allied with Emanuel suggested that Clyburn may be too hard to beat.

"There's this innate desire of the caucus to be representative of all races and genders," said the lawmaker. "It's one of the all-powerful characteristics of the caucus and it's hard to go against." The lawmaker suggested that Democrats might instead opt to create a new leadership position, such as assistant speaker, to accommodate Emanuel. A group of 40 House Democrats are currently rewriting their caucus's rules and have discussed the idea of adding that post to their roster of elected leaders.

Elsewhere on the leadership ticket, full-fledged races have broken out. Reps. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and John Murtha (D-Pa.) are vying for majority leader. Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) has declared for caucus vice-chair.

September 13, 2006, 7:00 pm Bush's Iraq Push Yields Small Gains in Poll

President Bush's latest communications offensive on Iraq appears to be yielding small initial dividends, increasing Republican and independent support as the mid-term election campaign enters its homestretch.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that Mr. Bush's overall approval rating, as well as his rating on handling Iraq, rose modestly after a series of speeches imploring Americans to remain patient despite repeated setbacks in the war.

It remains "a modest uptick" in "a very difficult national environment" for the president's party in mid-term elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though improved from 38% in June. (See full story) – John Harwood

September 13, 2006, 4:55 pm Shadegg Donation Stirs Talk of Leadership Run

After losing his race for House majority leader earlier this year, Arizona Republican Rep. John Shadegg today showed his colleagues that he may be planning another run for the Republican leadership. At a closed-door meeting today of all House Republicans, Shadegg announced he had raised $625,000 for the House Republicans' campaign arm. The sum far surpassed amount he and other Republican lawmakers were asked to raise for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

More importantly, it sparked talk that Shadegg may be interested in another campaign for the House leadership. His donations went to a special party committee that will be used for getting voters to the polls on Election Day. Republicans, who will elect their party leaders before the next session of Congress, give considerable weight to fund-raising ability.

Ironically, Shadegg's attempt to become a party leader would be helped if Republicans lose enough seats in the November election to hand control of the House to Democrats. A Democratic takeover could lead rank-and-file Republicans to reassess their party's leadership.

House Republicans hope to raise $17.5 million for the get-out-the-vote fund. The man who beat Shadegg earlier this year, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio, has contributed $550,000 to the fund, and he kicked in $210,000 total to cover the obligations of three vulnerable Republicans so they can focus on raising money for themselves. Others to top the $550,000 mark include Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana. –Brody Mullins

September 13, 2006, 3:43 pm Cole Turns to Voter Turnout

Oklahoma Congressman Tom Cole could now hold the inside line to succeed Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York as head of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds, who will step down after the November election following two terms heading the House Republicans' campaign apparatus, tapped Cole to head up the committee's get-out-the-vote effort. With Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman leading the Republican National Committee's mammoth effort and the Oklahoman directing the congressional side, Reynolds said Republicans had created a "voter turnout dream team." They'll need it. Republicans' worst nightmare right now is that disillusioned conservatives will avoid voting Nov. 7.

Cole was chief of staff at the RNC during the 2000 election cycle and executive director of the NRCC during the 1992 election. A Reynolds associate tells The Wall Street Journal that the Cole posting doesn't suggest an endorsement. His rivals for the job — Texan Pete Sessions and Pennsylvanian Phil English — already have substantial roles in the NRCC's campaign and have been raising lots of dough for colleagues and candidates. –Amy Schatz

September 13, 2006, 1:36 pm Paulson's Coming Out Party

Paulson As part of his ongoing effort to resurrect the stature of the Treasury and set the tone for his coming trip to Singapore and China, new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson invited a host of academics, business representatives and ambassadors to attend his first speech on the international economy this morning.

Among those seated for the 40-minute speech in the Treasury's historic Cash Room — designed in the 19th Century as a roofed version of an Italian palazzo, a traditional bank design throughout Europe — were Jim Sasser, the former Tennessee Democratic senator and ambassador to China under President Clinton; Charlene Barshefsky, the former U.S. Trade Representative in the Clinton years; John Engler, head of the National Manufacturers Association and a former Republican governor of Michigan; and heads of Council on Foreign Relations, the Securities Industry Association and the Financial Services Forum.

After the speech, Paulson invited guests to a reception in his office, where he personally greeted each one as they munched on cheese and crackers and sipped soft drinks. The speech was Paulson's second, but his first in Washington. The first was delivered at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business in New York.

Mr. Paulson spent the morning reaching out to members of Congress in advance of his speech, talking to folks on both sides of the aisle including Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, Montana Democrat Sen. Max Baucus, Washington Democrat Sen. Patty Murray and several House members such as California Republican Bill Thomas and New York Democrat Charles Rangel. The night before the speech Mr. Paulson talked with two vocal critics of the China's currency policy — Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y) and Lindsay Graham (R., SC). –Deborah Solomon

September 13, 2006, 12:50 pm Targeting Sen. Allen

Virginia Sen. George Allen hasn't exactly had the best month. There was the "macaca" gaffe. And then there were the dropping poll numbers, likely a result of the macaca gaffe. And let's not forget the "ethnic rally" slideshow, which is still up on his campaign site despite wide mocking from bloggers.

Allen

Today brought more fun for Allen campaign strategists, as a scathing ad debuted this morning attacking the Republican senator for voting against a measure that might have helped provide lifesaving body armor for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We believe the voice of the troops is sorely lacking in Washington and we're trying to change that," said Jon Soltz, chairman of VoteVets political action committee, which sponsored the ad. It will air on some broadcast stations and cable operators in Virginia, although the group wouldn't say where or how much the ad buy would be.

The group dubs itself as nonpartisan and notes it has given contributions to both Democrat and Republican vets, including Republican Sam Schultz, who received $2,100 in April for an unsuccessful primary bid to oust incumbent Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana's 9th congressional district. It's not endorsing Allen's opponent, James Webb, or any other candidates who haven't served in Iraq or Afghanistan, Soltz said.

The VoteVets board includes several prominent Democrats, including former Sen. Bob Kerrey, former Democratic presidential candidate Gen. Wesley Clark and Clinton administration official Elaine Kamarck, who has a son who served in Iraq, according to the site. The PAC's last campaign finance report in June showed it received $118,517 in contributions so far this year (including $5,000 from Christopher Heinz).

It's not clear how much money this group has, but if they get more contributions as a result of the Allen ad, other senators better watch out: "There are plenty of senators who deserve to be targets of this ad and they may be," Soltz said. "We have it ready to go in other states." –Amy Schatz

September 13, 2006, 11:13 am Primaries Produce Some Upsetting Results

The Republican rumble in the Rhode Island yesterday between Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey and incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee (who won last night) attracted the most attention, but other races around the country also produced some intriguing results.

Could seven-term Democratic Congressman Albert Wynn be on the verge of losing a primary race in Maryland? Wynn represents the 4th District in suburban Washington and has been battling attorney Donna Edwards. Earlier this morning, with 75% of precincts reporting, she had about a 200 vote advantage, although Wynn has since made up some ground. At last check, he had a 938 vote advantage with 81% of precincts reporting. Edwards was a former employee of the congressman earlier in her career, but she seemed to gain some major momentum after attacking his vote in favor of the war in Iraq.

While the Chafee win was a huge relief for the Republican Party leaders, who fretted Laffey was too conservative to win in November, other races around the country produced something of a mixed blessing for both parties, which had taken sides in several races in hope of producing the strongest candidates for November. In Arizona's 8th congressional district, conservative Randy Graf defeated the National Republican Congressional Committee-backed candidate Steve Huffman, a moderate who was the personal choice of Republican Jim Kolbe, a moderate who is retiring.

In New Hampshire, however, Democrat Jim Craig was upset by Carol Shea-Porter, another Iraq-war critic, in a low-turnout primary race for the 1st District seat. Craig's campaign received some support from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, although it's probably a stretch for the NRCC to call the $24,500 national Dems contributed to Craig's campaign "significant financial backing." Nevertheless, congressional Republicans were chortling over the DCCC's loss this morning: "The DCCC has now seen five of their hand-picked candidates lose during the 2006 primary season (Steve Filson in CA-11, Andrew Horne in KY-03, Craig, (Judy) Aydelott (in NY-19), and Joe Sulzer in OH-18.)" Shea-Porter will now try to capture the seat held by Republican Jeb Bradley.

Meanwhile, in Wisconsin, Republican state Assembly Speaker John Gard easily won the nomination for the 8th District and will go up against Democrat Steve Kagen in November. Gard was the national Republican's choice for the seat and was already being targeted by ads from the DCCC in the primary. Now the fun really begins as both well-funded candidates begin battling for this open seat, which both parties are prepared to spend handsomely to win. "Make no mistake about it, John Gard will keep Wisconsin's 8th in the GOP column come November," the NRCC said this morning. –Amy Schatz

September 13, 2006, 6:10 am Survival Instinct

By helping moderate incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island across the finish line in Tuesday's Republican primary, President Bush's party signaled its pragmatism and determination to hold power in the face of a strong midterm election challenge from Democratic adversaries.

Chafee's victory hardly guarantees that Republicans hold the Rhode Island seat; some polls have shown him behind Democratic opponent Sheldon Whitehouse in a "blue" state John Kerry won handily in the 2004 presidential race. But he had displayed a far more formidable ability to compete than conservative primary challenger Steve Laffey.

The seat is critical to Democrats' uphill fight for the six-seat gain needed to recapture control of the Senate. That's why the national Republican Party poured resources into boosting turnout for Chafee and attacking Laffey in ads and mailings.

Those maneuvers were all the more striking given the party's Bush-era reputation for catering above all to its conservative base. Chafee has opposed Bush on the most important foreign and domestic initiatives of his presidency – the Iraq war and tax cuts. He has even mused publicly about the possibility of becoming a Democrat.

Yet Bush's reduced standing and the war's unpopularity have diminished the president's leverage and left many Republican candidates seeking distance from the administration. In the wake of last night's results, Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman swallowed any misgivings about Chafee's iconoclasm and hailed him as a "principled voice" for Rhode Island; the Republican Senate committee chair, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, praised his "independent, honest leadership."

Chafee's victory complicates Democratic strategy for the Rhode Island general election. Instead of hitting Chafee on policy as they would have attacked Laffey, Democratic strategists say they'll instead tie the moderate incumbent to a single vote – the one to elect a Republican leader for the Senate when the new Congress convenes. By facilitating Republican control of the Senate, they plan to argue, Chafee would empower Bush for the last two years of his presidency even if he defies the White House on key policy choices.

Republican voters displayed less of a pragmatic streak in Arizona Eighth district primary election to succeed retiring moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Kolbe had endorsed moderate Steve Huffman as his successor, and Republican Party leaders backed Huffman as the most electable candidate. Yet primary voters bucked those signals and instead nominated Randy Graf, who took a more conservative line on immigration and other issues in the border district.

That outcome cheered Democrats who consider the race critical to their hopes of picking up the 15 seats needed to win control of the House. Democrats nominated the candidate the national party considered most competitive, Gabrielle Giffords, over former TV anchor Patty Weiss.

After a comparatively mild primary battle, Democrats are counting on achieving greater unity in the fall campaign. The Republican contest between Graf and Huffman had a harsher edge, complicating the challenge of rallying the party faithful in November. — John Harwood

September 13, 2006, 6:00 am Fuel for Republicans?

Republicans could get a boost heading into the midterms from gasoline prices. Prices have fallen more than 35 cents from their $3 a gallon peak in early August and could fall another 35 cents in the weeks ahead because of the recent plunge in oil prices.

High gasoline prices have been a key factor behind the low approval ratings voters give President Bush and the Republican Congress on the economy. Democrats have also used high oil prices to paint the Republicans as the friends of Big Oil.

The price of gasoline is "one leg of a three-legged stool that is upside down and jabbing Republicans in the butt," says Glen Bolger, a partner at Republican polling firm Public Opinion Strategies. The other two are health care costs and stagnant wages. The drop in gas prices is "certainly happening at the right time. There's 56 days left [before the election]. If it continues to drop, that can only redound to our favor."

Administration officials have already started touting the turnaround. Edward Lazear, chairman of Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, said in a speech Tuesday that wages, unadjusted for inflation, have started to pickup recently in a lagged response to big gains in worker output per hour (productivity). But workers haven't enjoyed the benefits, he said, because "recent large and unanticipated increases in energy prices have consumed much of this strong nominal wage growth." Then he noted: "With recent declines in gasoline prices, however, there is the prospect of substantial real wage growth in the rest of 2006."

Inflation data aren't getting the attention now that jobs stats did in 2004. Nonetheless, the GOP could benefit from fortuitous timing on inflation data. The bulk of the recent decline in gasoline prices will show up in the September inflation report. In the same month, the 12-month inflation rate will no longer contain the huge increase in gasoline prices that followed Hurricane Katrina in September 2005. Based on some calculations from Goldman Sachs, that could show the inflation rate plummeting to 2.4%, the lowest in over two years, from 4.3% as recently as June. That report is to be released on Oct. 18, three weeks before the election. A few months after the election, the inflation rate will probably jump back up, because it will no longer be held down by a big drop in gasoline prices in November, 2005.

Still, Democrats maintain the decline will be too little, too late to make a difference. Geoffrey Garin, president of Hart Research Associates, notes that prices have moved sharply up and down for the last year without dislodging gasoline prices as an issue from voters' minds. "The public's been pretty badly scarred over the course of the last year and it will take longer than the two months left in this election cycle for the scars to go away." — Greg Ip

Democrats Plan To Reduce Need For Abortions (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Reaching out to more moderate, church-going voters with misgivings about abortion, House Democrats plan to unveil legislation on Thursday that sets a public policy goal of reducing abortions in America.

The proposal, to be announced at a news conference attended by House Democrats' national campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), would not restrict access to abortion. Instead, it promotes such preventive measures as funding for contraceptives and expanded sex education geared toward avoiding pregnancy as well as support for adoption and services to new mothers, according to several people familiar with the legislation.

The legislation targets voters who have concerns about abortion but who are not absolutely opposed to the procedure. Its introduction follows extended discussion in Democratic political circles about improving the party's image with traditionalist voters and public efforts by prominent Democrats to fashion an approach to abortion with broader appeal.

In January, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) urged the party to find "common ground" with abortion opponents. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) this summer chastised fellow Democrats for giving insufficient regard to "the power of faith."

The issue is delicate as the party seeks to address the ambivalence much of the American public feels toward abortion without offending a Democratic base that includes many passionate believers in abortion rights who are wary of any sign of a weakening in resolve to protect those rights.

The legislation will be announced less than eight weeks before the Nov. 7 mid-term election in which Democratic hopes of wresting control of Congress depend in part on competing in a number of socially conservative districts in places like Ohio and Pennsylvania. The Democratic Senate nominee in Pennsylvania, Bob Casey, opposes abortion rights.

Republicans in recent years have appealed to the unease over abortion felt by many moderates with such legislation as parental notification laws and the ban on certain late-term abortions that detractors labeled "partial-birth abortions."

But Democrats hope the new legislative package will allow candidates to demonstrate that their party acknowledges the moral reservations that many Americans feel about abortion and has a plan to take positive steps to cut use of the procedure.

"From our perspective, it shows Democrats are changing the debate and making it a priority to reduce abortions in America while leaving personal liberties intact," said Rachel Laser, a policy analyst with the center-left group Third Way who was involved with preparation of the legislation.

The House legislation, which is to be co-sponsored by anti-abortion Rep. Tim Ryan (D-Ohio) and abortion rights supporter Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), avoids some of the divisive issues that have been in Democratic legislative packages introduced earlier in the year.

In contrast to a package introduced by anti-abortion Democrats this spring, the legislation does not include a provision to ban adults from transporting minors across state lines to avoid parental notification laws.

The legislation being introduced Thursday also leaves out some of the more controversial provisions on contraception included in another package proposed this year by Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. The Reid legislation would require private group health plans to include contraceptive coverage in prescription drug benefits.

But the House Democrats' bill would considerably expand access to contraceptive services for low-income women. It calls for expanded funding to federal family planning programs and mandates that states provide contraceptive coverage to women with incomes up to twice the federal poverty level.

A congressional aide familiar with the legislation said the sponsors do not yet have a cost estimate for the measure.

According to descriptions from people who have seen the measure, the package also would provide grants for sex education with an "abstinence focus" but would also require that the programs include complete instruction on contraceptives.

Abortion providers would be required to notify patients of the risks of abortion procedures. In the past, abortion rights groups have often fought such patient notification proposals because they considered the wording to be overly alarmist. But the abortion providers would fashion the notifications through guidance from medical groups, such as the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, which does not oppose abortion rights.

There are also provisions for adoption tax credits, funding for nurses to make home visits for teenage and new mothers, funding for day-care programs and expanded funding for health care for low-income mothers and children.

Social Security Lays Out The Funding Consequences (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The Social Security Administration would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices 10 days next year if Congress does not increase its funding in fiscal 2007, the agency has told Congress.

"Fewer resources mean fewer people to serve the public in all areas of SSA's operations," Jo Anne B. Barnhart , the Social Security commissioner, said in a letter to the Senate Appropriations Committee. "Because these budget reductions will affect all employees, they will result in major service disruptions across all workloads."

If the agency resorts to furloughs, the Social Security network of 1,300 field offices would close, probably a day at a time over a five- to six-month period. On those days, the public would not be able to apply for Social Security numbers, replace Social Security cards, file for retirement or disability benefits or obtain decisions on pending disability claims and appeals.

In 2006, nearly 49 million Americans will receive approximately $539 billion in Social Security benefits.

"For an agency like ours, it is kind of a shock," said Richard Warsinskey , president of the National Council of Social Security Management Associations.

Warsinskey said he understands that companies lay off and furlough employees in bad economic times, "but this is a public service issue." He said, "We don't want to take a well-run agency and make it mediocre because we don't get enough money."

Mark Lassiter , the Social Security press officer, said no decisions on furloughs have been made. The House and Senate have not finished work on the agency's budget and Barnhart "remains hopeful that the president's budget request will be approved by Congress," he said.

The Senate bill would provide about $9 billion for the agency -- about $400 million less than the president's request and about $54 million less than what the agency received for this year's budget. The House proposal would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking.

The agency's budget may not be resolved until after the November elections, congressional aides said. A spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee said House and Senate negotiators would review the agency's funding and staffing levels later this year. Many agencies are likely to face budget squeezes next year, in part because Congress faces tough decisions on financing the Iraq war and homeland security.

Social Security, headquartered in Baltimore, has about 65,000 employees, and officials estimate that more than 40 percent of its workforce will retire by 2014. It appears that not all departing employees will be replaced because of budget pressures. Only one employee is being hired for every three that depart, according to 2006 and 2007 budget plans.

Darryl Perkinson , president of the Federal Managers Association, said reduced appropriations for Social Security will probably worsen the backlog of cases in the agency's Office of Disability and Adjudication Review. The association estimates the backlog has grown to 730,000 cases with an average processing time of 481 days. The group is urging Congress to pass the president's budget request and support adequate staffing levels in the disability review office.

Witold Skwierczynski , president of the American Federation of Government Employees' national council for Social Security field operations, testified before Congress in May and warned that the nation's demographics and baby-boomer retirements would require increases in skilled field staff in coming years.

In her letter, Barnhart indicated that the Senate's proposal to provide $400 million less than in the president's budget would require a hiring freeze, overtime reductions and other overhead cuts in addition to a 10-day furlough of staff.

Warsinskey said the agency is scouring its budget for ways to save money. "SSA has never been faced with this before," he said, referring to the prospect of a furlough.Electronic Health Records

The House federal workforce subcommittee approved a bill yesterday that would require insurance companies in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program to make an electronic health record available to enrollees upon request.

The bill goes to the House Government Reform Committee for consideration. Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), the subcommittee chairman and bill's sponsor, said electronic records will improve health-care delivery and help reduce medical errors. Companies would not be allowed to pass along costs of providing the records in premium increases, according to the bill.

Dueling Ex-Party Bosses (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

It was Ed Gillespie's book party, but it was his friendly political rival, Terry McAuliffe, who walked around touting his own new book and bragging how he's going to land on the best-seller list.

"He's incorrigible," Gillespie laughed.

Gillespie and McAuliffe really hit it off in 2004 when the two Irish Catholics ran their respective party operations, Gillespie at the helm of the Republican National Committee and McAuliffe overseeing the Democratic National Committee.

After working on it for 53 weeks, McAuliffe on Tuesday put the final touches on his 170,000-word book "What A Party" and shipped it off to the publisher. It's due out on Jan. 9.

Ironically, and in typical grandstanding style, McAuliffe finished his book on the very day that Gillespie chose to celebrate his new tome, "Winning Right: Campaign Politics and Conservative Policies," published by Simon and Schuster.

McAuliffe was among the fabulous turnout of a who's who of politicos, though no one, not even a single Republican, seemed to linger at the party quite as long as he did. And his favorite topic of conservation was, you guessed it, his book, which includes his inside perspective on the Democratic Party as a close confidant of former President Bill Clinton.

"Get your seatbelts on, it's gonna be a great book," he told HOH on the telephone Wednesday. "I think it'll keep you laughing through the whole book ... I think people will learn a lot from it, too."

Gillespie, a partner at Quinn Gillespie & Associates, said that, obviously, the two books will be at odds "on a number of different fronts." But he joked that he couldn't really promise it would be as sexy or explosive as his buddy's.

"He has a little bit of an edge, because he has Clinton stories in his," Gillespie said.

The Burnses flew back on a Northwest Airlines flight from Minneapolis to Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. The informant sent the information with an accompanying nasty editorial note that said, "Guess women really are second class to him."

The gratuitous little jab was a reference, ironically, to an incident in which two Northwest Airlines flight attendants accused the Senator of sexism after he reportedly suggested to one of them that she could stay at home and be a mother if she lost her job to outsourcing.

Burns denied sexism in that case or in the case of taking the first-class seat while his wife, Phyllis, rode coach on Monday. And we must point out that Mrs. Burns has not accused her husband of sexism. In fact, HOH tends to believe that Sen. Burns wasn't playing the big man card taking the first-class seat while making his little woman ride in the stuffy coach seat.

For one, she had the roomiest coach seat available: the exit row. Burns' spokesman, James Pendleton, swears the Senator chivalrously offered to take that seat and give Phyllis the only first class seat they could get. But she wouldn't hear of such nonsense.

"She declined, as she felt there was more room for him to work with his laptop, etc., in First Class," Pendleton told us via e-mail.

He wrote that it's "no surprise" that Burns has "well over a million miles on Northwest, and gets upgrades to First Class when available, just like any other super-frequent flyer."

On Monday, both he and Mrs. Burns had purchased coach tickets and at the time they upgraded, there wasn't room for both of them to go first class, Pendleton said.

For those of you still feeling sorry for Mrs. Burns, look on the bright side — maybe she can hold this one over her husband's head and get an upgrade on something else she might like.

Mad Max's Milestone. Hurray for Sen. Max Baucus! The Montana Democrat cast his 10,000th Senate vote on Wednesday, becoming one of just 27 in the history of the Senate who have cast 10,000 or more votes.

Baucus' chief of staff, Jim Messina, could hardly believe it himself when he heard the news. "Ten thousand votes? Well, I can still remember the first, and disco was still popular."

Yep, everybody was dancing to "Disco Inferno" and "Stayin' Alive" the year Baucus was elected to the Senate, 1978.

Ends Without Means (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

A leader's first job is to project authority, and George Bush certainly does that. In a 90-minute interview with a few columnists in the Oval Office on Tuesday, Bush swallowed up the room, crouching forward to energetically make a point or spreading his arms wide to illustrate the scope of his ideas — always projecting confidence and intensity.

He opened the session by declaring, "Let me just first tell you that I've never been more convinced that the decisions I made are the right decisions," and he grew more self-assured from there. I interview politicians for a living, and every time I brush against Bush I'm reminded that this guy is different. There's none of that hunger for approval that is common to the breed. This is the most inner-directed man on the globe.

The other striking feature of his conversation is that he possesses an unusual perception of time. Washington, and modern life in general, encourages people to think in the short term. But Bush, who stands aloof, thinks in long durations.

"I got into politics initially because I wanted to help change a culture," he says, referring to his campaign against the instant gratifications of the 1960's counterculture. And he sees his efforts today as a series of long, gradual cultural transformations. Like many executives, he believes that the higher you go, the further into the future you should see, and so his conversation is filled with speculations about the long-term effects of deep social trends — the current religious awakening or the politics of volunteer armies.

All of which prepares him to think about the war on terror as a generations-long struggle. He asked us to think about what the world could look like 50 years from now, with Islamic radicals either controlling the world's oil supply or not. "I firmly believe that some day American presidents will be looking back at this period in time, saying, 'Thank goodness they saw the vision,' " he said.

Sitting between busts of Lincoln and Churchill, he continued, "My hope is to leave behind something — foundations and institutions that will enable future presidents to be able to more likely make the tough decisions that they're going to have to make."

"Ideological struggles take time," he said, explaining the turmoil in Iraq and elsewhere. He said the events of weeks or months were just a nanosecond compared with the long course of this conflict. He was passionate on the need for patience and steadfastness. He talked about "inviolate" principles written upon his heart: "People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift."

He was less personal and less assertive when talking about those tactical decisions made day to day.

We are now at a moment when many of the people who support his long-term goals, and who have stuck with him as the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, fear the war is irreparably lost. The general view among many Republicans is that Bush set out grand goals, but never committed resources commensurate with the task.

Bush was pressed about Iraqi troop levels repeatedly during our interview. His general response was that during Vietnam, tactical decisions were made in the White House. "I thought it was a mistake then, and I think it's a mistake now."

So on troop levels and other tactical issues, Bush defers to Gen. George Casey, who is in Iraq. He asks questions but does not contradict the experts. If Casey asked for two more divisions tomorrow, Bush would deliver, regardless of the political consequences. But Casey does not ask (and maybe none are available).

What if Casey is wrong?

"Then I picked the wrong general," Bush says bluntly. "If he's wrong, I'm wrong."

When asked if he should have expanded the military back in 2003, to give the current commanders more manpower, Bush used words that were uncharacteristically jargon-ridden: "The notion of warfare has changed, and therefore, we're modulizing the army so that it becomes more operational and easier to move." That sounds more like a transformation briefing paper than the president.

In other words, when Bush is strategizing goals, he is assertiveness on stilts. When he is contemplating means, he defers to authority.

And the sad truth is, there has been a gap between Bush's visions and the means his administration has devoted to realize them. And when tactics do not adjust to fit the strategy, then the strategy eventually gets diminished to fit the tactics.

Or worse.

The Medicare Monster (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Unless you're a news junkie, you probably missed Mark McClellan's announcement that he'll resign in early October, after two grueling years as head of CMS.

What's CMS? Well, it's the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, which spent $515 billion in 2005 -- 21 percent of the federal budget and about $21 billion more than all defense spending. Leaving government presents McClellan with a golden opportunity: He can tell us what to do about Medicare. It's the monster in our future -- and no one knows it better than McClellan, who is a medical doctor, a Ph.D. economist and, since 2004, Medicare's chief bureaucrat. Moreover, he's not a rabid partisan. He also worked for Bill Clinton.

If monster seems like rhetorical overkill, then recall what the aging baby boom does to government. Federal spending on the elderly is plausibly projected to double from 2000 to 2030 as a share of national income. About three-quarters of that increase will be health spending -- mostly Medicare but also Medicaid (70 percent of Medicaid spending goes to the old and disabled). The projected increase in health spending exceeds all of today's discretionary domestic spending on schools, the FBI, the environment and much more. If the "aging problem" involved only higher Social Security spending, we could handle it easily.

We all know that runaway health spending is already driving up the number of uninsured (latest count: 46.6 million), because insurance is increasingly too expensive for employers to cover low-skilled workers. Now uncontrolled health spending will dominate the federal budget and pose ugly choices: (a) raise taxes sharply, (b) gut other programs and (c) run ever-larger -- and more dangerous -- deficits.

Some economists believe that we've gotten our money's worth from higher health spending. Since 1960 life expectancy at birth has risen from about 70 to over 77. Harvard health economist David Cutler attributes about half the increase to medical advances -- new drugs, surgeries and therapies. (Candidates for the other half: less smoking, less-punishing jobs, fewer accidents.) Academic studies suggest that people value an extra year of life at about $100,000, says Cutler. That's how much they'd pay -- in theory -- to live a year longer. Since 1960 the average extra health spending at all ages needed to increase life expectancy one year has been less than $100,000 per person. Therefore we've gotten value for money.

By this logic, higher health spending is nonthreatening. In a recent paper, economists Robert Hall of Stanford and Charles Jones of the University of California at Berkeley suggest that health spending may reach 30 percent of national income by 2050, up from 16 percent today and 5 percent in 1950. But they are unperturbed, because as Americans get richer, they prefer more health spending -- longer and better lives -- to a "third car [or] yet another television."

I'm not in this camp. Yes, much health spending has been beneficial and cost-effective. In the future, biotechnology or stem cells may produce large gains against Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's and cancer at reasonable costs. But the present explosion in health spending is increasingly wasteful and socially corrosive. It may ultimately lower economic growth -- a side effect of the high taxes needed to pay for Medicare and Medicaid -- and already depresses take-home pay, squeezes other public services and redistributes income from the young to the old. Meanwhile, the extra health benefits are dwindling.

Today's waste transcends excess paperwork (an easy rhetorical target) and mainly involves unnecessary or harmful care. Using Medicare records, John Wennberg and colleagues at Dartmouth Medical School have documented huge variations in care -- with few, if any, benefits. One study examined 4.7 million Medicare patients with any of 12 chronic illnesses who died from 2000 to 2003. In New York, some hospitalization rates were twice as high as at the Mayo Clinic. (Indeed, Cutler's latest calculation just for the elderly sends the same message; by the 1990s, it cost about $145,000 to increase an average life one year for those over 65.)

We should overhaul Medicare, but just how is unclear. To know, we need to answer three questions: (1) How much health spending can the economy absorb without having higher taxes or depressed wages reduce economic growth? (2) Who should pay for Medicare -- that is, should older people pay more (lessening the burden on the young)? (3) How can we pay physicians and hospitals for better outcomes and not just for more tests, hospitalizations and visits? These questions apply to any system we might adopt -- from a government-run "single payer" system to more "consumer-driven" health care.

Carrying out President Bush's agenda -- including the new drug benefit -- McClellan couldn't pose these basic questions. Now he says he plans to settle at a think tank or university, where he can. He has a huge chance to help define the needed debate. Most studies of Medicare have had a narrow and technical focus, evading the truly central issue. It isn't "What's good for Medicare beneficiaries?" Rather, it's "What's good for America?"

Another Strong Session For The Dow Puts It Within 180 Points Of A Record (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

Oil prices broke their losing streak, but stocks continued their winning ways.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 45.23 points, or 0.39%, to a four-month high of 11543.32. It was the average's 10th-highest close and only the 13th time it ended the day above 11500. The Dow sits 180 points from its all-time peak on Jan. 14, 2000, the record close of 11722.98.

Blue-chip stocks gained despite crude oil's finish 21 cents a barrel higher on the New York Mercantile Exchange, the first gain for crude in the past eight trading sessions. At $63.97 a barrel, the price is still more than 8% below its level at the start of the month and 17% below its July peak.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.38%, or 4.96 points, to 1318.07, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite index rose 0.53%, or 11.85, to 2227.67. Smaller stocks, often more volatile than their bigger brethren, gained 0.86%, or 6.22 points, to 730.70 on the Russell 2000 index.

Energy and commodity stocks showed strength in a day when economically sensitive stocks trumped defensive plays. Exxon Mobil rose 1%, and Alcoa added 2%. Financial stocks benefited from better-than-expected earnings at investment bank Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. Lehman, which also reported strong revenue and a strong outlook for investment-banking deals, rose 3%. Goldman Sachs Group, which reported earnings Tuesday, tacked on 1.6%.

Commodity prices continue to be in the spotlight, as investors consider whether consumer spending will carry the economy. Tomorrow, investors will get the latest reading on inflation when the latest Consumer Price Index is released.

"The big debate that's raging" is whether falling gasoline and oil prices help the consumer enough to offset the weakening housing market, says Robert Harrington, head of U.S. stock trading at UBS's U.S. brokerage firm. "The consumer still seems to be spending," he says, in part because falling oil prices act as an immediate "tax cut" that encourages spending.

Mr. Harrington points to Best Buy, which reported this week that quarterly profit rose 22% on higher sales of flat-panel televisions and notebook computers. But should the economy reheat enough, commodity prices may jump higher. And the factors pushing oil prices down -- a mild hurricane season, OPEC sticking to production schedules and a seasonally slow period for demand -- could easily turn around in coming months.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.625 billion shares, with 2,277 stocks rising and 1,053 falling.

Bond prices advanced. The 10-year Treasury note rose 2/32, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.767%. The 30-year bond rose 3/32, to yield 4.898%.

The dollar was down. It traded at 117.58 yen, down from 117.95, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2697 from $1.2691.

Oil Prices Poised To Drop Sharply, Energy Consultant Says (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The recent sharp drop in the global price of crude oil could mark the start of a massive sell-off that returns gasoline prices to lows not seen since the late 1990s - perhaps as low as $1.15 a gallon.

"All the hurricane flags are flying" in oil markets, said Philip K. Verleger, a noted energy consultant who was a lone voice several years ago in warning that oil prices would soar. Now, he tells McClatchy Newspapers, they appear to be poised for a dramatic plunge.

Crude oil prices have fallen about $14, or roughly 17 percent, from their July 14 peak of $78.40. After falling seven straight days, they rose slightly Wednesday in trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, to $63.97, partly in reaction to a government report showing fuel inventories a bit lower than expected. But the overall price drop is expected to continue, and prices could fall much more in the weeks and months ahead.

Here's why.

For most of the past two years, oil prices have risen because the world's oil producers have struggled to keep pace with growing demand, particularly from China and India. Spare oil production capacity grew so tight that market players feared that any disruption to oil production could create shortages.

Fear of disruption focused on fighting in Nigeria, escalating tensions over Iran's nuclear program, violence between Israel and Lebanon that might spread to oil-producing neighbors, and the prospect that hurricanes might topple oil facilities in the Gulf of Mexico.

Oil traders bet that such worrisome developments would drive up the future price of oil. Oil is traded in contracts for future delivery, and companies that take physical delivery of oil are just a small part of total trading. Financial players, such as large pension and commodities funds, are the big traders and they're seeking profits. They've sunk $105 billion or more into oil futures in recent years, according to Verleger. Their bets that oil prices would rise in the future bid up the price of oil.

That, in turn, led users of oil to create stockpiles as cushions against supply disruptions and even higher future prices. Now inventories of oil are approaching 1990 levels.

But many of the conditions that drove investors to bid up oil prices are ebbing. Tensions over Israel, Lebanon and Nigeria are easing. The hurricane season has presented no threat so far to the Gulf of Mexico. The U.S. peak summer driving season is over, so gasoline demand is falling.

With fear of supply disruptions ebbing, oil prices began sliding. With oil inventories high, refiners that turn oil into gasoline are expected to cut production. As refiners cut production, oil companies increasingly risk getting stuck with excess oil supplies. There's already anecdotal evidence of oil companies chartering tankers to store excess oil.

All this is turning financial markets increasingly bearish on oil.

"If we continue to build inventories, and if we have a warm winter like we had last winter, you could see a large fall in the price of oil," said Gary Pokoik, who manages Hedge Ventures Energy in Los Angeles, an energy hedge fund. "I think there is still a lot of risk in the market."

As it stands now, the recent oil-price slump has brought the national average for a gallon of unleaded gasoline down to $2.59, according to the AAA motor club.

Should oil traders fear that this downward price spiral will get worse and run for the exits by selling off their futures contracts, said Verleger, it's not unthinkable that oil prices could return to $15 or less a barrel, at least temporarily. That could mean gasoline prices as low as $1.15 per gallon.

Other experts won't guess at a floor price, but they agree that a race to the bottom could break out.

"The market may test levels here that are too low to be sustained," said Clay Seigle, an analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates, a consultancy in Boston.

On Monday, the oil-producing cartel OPEC hinted that if prices fall precipitously, OPEC members would cut production to lift them. But that would take time.

"That takes six to nine months. If we don't have a really cold winter here (creating a demand for oil), prices will fall. Literally, you don't know where the floor is," said Verleger. "In a market like this, if things start falling ... prices could take you back to the 1999 levels. It has nothing to do with production."

Producers Move To Debunk Gloomy 'Peak Oil' Forecasts (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And Jeffrey Ball

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Leading players in the petroleum industry, including Saudi Arabia and Exxon Mobil Corp., are aggressively arguing that plenty of crude oil remains for world consumption, in an effort to counter critics who contend crude output is about to plateau.

That argument, known as peak-oil theory, has provided intellectual backing for the boom in crude prices and sowed doubts among some policy makers about crude's long-term reliability as an energy source. Such doubts, coupled with concern over sky-high prices, have added impetus to the search for oil substitutes -- including in Washington, where President Bush this year declared the U.S. "addicted to oil" and sparked a boom in interest in ethanol.

Some in the industry are keen to fight the threat posed by such fears.

Yesterday, Abdallah S. Jum'ah, chief executive of Saudi Arabian state-owned Saudi Aramco, the world's largest oil company by production, argued during a speech in Vienna that the world has more than a century's worth of crude left at current production rates. His talk followed similar remarks by a senior Exxon executive this week. Spokesmen for Exxon and Aramco said they aren't coordinating their remarks.

The belief that the Earth is running dry of oil is just one factor supporting crude prices. Oil supplies -- constrained by underinvestment when crude prices were lower -- have increased more slowly than demand, leading to a thin margin of spare pumping capacity and higher prices.

Demand has shown signs of slowing and prices have fallen from a nominal all-time high of more than $78 a barrel in July, though, adjusted for inflation, oil reached as high as $99.21 in April 1980. In New York yesterday, crude-oil futures rose 21 cents to settle at $63.97.

In a sign that oil-supply concerns are gaining currency, the Department of Energy has asked the National Petroleum Council, an oil-and-gas-industry research group, to investigate peak-oil claims. The council launched a study that includes different industries and environmental groups and appointed Lee Raymond, retired Exxon chief executive, as the study's chairman. It will survey existing studies and examine why they differ on how much oil and gas the world holds and what the response should be.

At an OPEC seminar yesterday, Mr. Jum'ah of Aramco said the world had produced only about one trillion barrels, or about 18%, of the earth's producible potential of 5.7 trillion barrels of oil. "That fact alone should discredit the argument that peak oil is imminent, and put our minds at ease concerning future petroleum supplies," he said. The remaining 4.7 trillion barrels should be enough to last more than 140 years at current output rates, he said.

Saudi Arabia, with a quarter of the world's proven crude reserves, has an interest in countering developments that would reduce demand. "If you are sitting on the world's biggest oil deposits, you would want to prevent the premature development of alternatives to oil," said Herman Franssen, president of International Energy Associates, a consulting firm in Bethesda, Md.

In an interview, Mr. Jum'ah said the Saudis "don't mind the development of alternatives to oil," because increasing energy demand means the world needs supplemental energy sources. But he objected to government subsidies and other supports that lead people to believe that alternatives like ethanol are a "panacea" that is "around the corner," he said.

Still, 3.5 trillion of the roughly 4.7 trillion barrels of oil Mr. Jum'ah is counting on will depend on the development of new technologies. "I believe we will eventually tally about one trillion barrels each from yet-to-be-discovered fields and higher recovery rates" from existing fields, he said in the speech. He also factored in 1.5 trillion barrels from nonconventional sources, such as Canadian tar sands.

Mr. Jum'ah's speech came two days after Exxon's Australia chief, Mark Nolan, told an industry conference in Adelaide, Australia, that "the end of oil is nowhere in sight." Mr. Nolan cited a U.S. Geological Survey estimate of more than three trillion barrels of conventional recoverable oil resources, of which one trillion barrels has been produced. Conservative estimates of heavy-oil and shale-oil resources push the total to four trillion barrels, while a 10% increase in recoverability will deliver an extra 800 billion barrels, Mr. Nolan said.

An Exxon spokesman said the company has long been making a similar argument.

Even mainstream analysts see a practical limit to supply. "The international petroleum system will be hard-pressed to produce more than 100 million barrels a day, given current technology," said J. Robinson West, chairman of consulting firm PFC Energy. Demand, expected to reach 84.8 million barrels a day this year, could rise to that level by about 2015, based on estimates for a different period by the International Energy Agency.

The industry says that while oil is finite, the known pool of obtainable oil grows as technology improves.

"I think there's a lot of misconceptions of what peak oil is," Mr. Raymond, who is leading the U.S. oil study, said in an interview last week. "The resource base is continually changing, driven by economics and technology." But he said his views won't dictate the study's results. "I may learn something."

Republicans Gain From Bush Focus On War On Terror (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

President Bush's series of speeches on the war on terror has boosted the issue's profile and helped recapture Republicans' lead when voters are surveyed on whom they trust to handle terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0062921

Republicans now lead Democrats by 48 percent to 41 percent among registered voters in a new ABC News poll, a flip from a seven-point Democrat advantage in the same poll last month, and 16 percent now choose terrorism as their top voting issue -- a gain of five percentage points.

Analyzing the poll on ABC's Web site, its polling director, Gary Langer, said Republicans' edge on handling terrorism is far less than the 35-point lead they had in 2002, when they won control of the Senate by bashing Democrats for blocking creation of the Department of Homeland Security over union rules.

But he said Republicans have made gains among independents, who are now split on which party they trust more on the issue.

And though it's just a trickle, the president's approval numbers also are ticking higher.

An NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 42 percent -- an increase of five percentage points since June, though still below a comfortable level for a president heading into a midterm election.

Both polls still showed Democrats with a sizable advantage when people are asked which party they want to control Congress -- nine percentage points in the NBC-Journal survey and eight points in the ABC poll.

The ABC poll was taken Sept. 5-7 of 1,003 adults, including 863 registered voters, and had a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points among registered voters. The NBC-Journal survey of 1,009 Americans was taken Sept. 8-11 and has a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

The polls come as Mr. Bush delivers a series of speeches trying to lay out his goals in the war on terror. He has tried to put a face on the terrorists, has released new information about attacks that have been thwarted by good intelligence, and has called for Congress to give official approval to military trials for terror detainees and to the National Security Agency's terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Bush's speeches have also stiffened the spines of Republicans in Congress, and top Republicans have said the details of thwarted plots have given them something concrete they can take home to tell constituents.

"There's been extraordinary successes in this war and a lot of them have occurred outside of plain public view," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

"It's useful and important to provide an update, and obviously, on an issue that continues to be right at the top of everybody's concerns."

He said the president's speeches have been able to give another view to balance out the repeated images of bombings and killings in Iraq and elsewhere.

"We feel confident that when people get a full picture, they're not only going to have confidence in the president, but they're going to want to support him and give him the tools to fight the war on terror," Mr. Snow said.

The ABC poll found that Iraq is still a weak point for Republicans -- those voters who put it as a top concern clearly favor Democrats.

But the poll showed Mr. Bush is still winning some key arguments, such as the 57 percent who agreed with his position that Iraq is part of the war on terror.

Republicans' Strategy May Backfire (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Republican Party leadership won the primary battle in Rhode Island, getting their preferred candidate, incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee, past a conservative challenger. But at what cost?

To boost prospects of holding the Republican seat, the party backed the moderate Mr. Chafee and spent nearly a million dollars on direct-mail and television advertising against Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey, who ran as the kind of conservative the White House usually likes and who pledged to support the very Bush tax cuts Mr. Chafee opposed. That tactic angered Laffey supporters and could deter them from voting in November when Mr. Chafee squares off with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former attorney general whose campaign is flush with cash.

"When you aggressively attack a candidate who stands for the ideas shared by the vast majority of Republicans, that's demoralizing," says Pat Toomey, a former congressman who heads Club for Growth, an antitax group that backed Mr. Laffey.

Just as trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans, Tuesday's back-to-back clashes between the Republican Party machine and its base in Rhode Island as well as in Arizona could diminish turnout among conservative voters in November. Turnout by that voting bloc carried the president in 2000 and 2004.

But frustration among those voters has been mounting for years and covers issues such as government spending, the Iraq war and illegal immigration. "Conservatism traditionally was a philosophy of smaller government. In the Bush years, it appears it isn't," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank.

Washington Monthly this month published a collection of essays, titled "Time For Us To Go," by conservatives on the theme that Republicans have so lost their way they would be better off losing their majorities as well.

In his essay, former congressman and now television talk-show host Joe Scarborough recalls the moment a magazine representative called and "meekly" asked if he would consider writing an article about why "Republicans should get their brains beaten in this fall. 'Count me in!' was my chipper response," he says.

On the political battleground, conservative groups have been trying to change the party profile in primaries.

In California this spring, they backed Howard Kaloogian, who lost to moderate Brian Bilbray, in a race to fill the San Diego seat vacated by Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. The party backed Mr. Bilbray and used $5 million to win the primary and special election against Democrat Francine Busby.

In Michigan, Mr. Toomey's Club for Growth and the National Right to Life Committee rallied behind evangelical minister and former state Rep. Tim Walberg to defeat moderate incumbent Rep. Joe Schwarz, who was endorsed by President Bush.

In Rhode Island, party officials backed Mr. Chafee, who voted against many of the president's tax cuts and the Iraq war, because they thought Mr. Laffey was too conservative to hold on to the Senate seat in the heavily Democratic state.

Laffey activists expected that move, says the Heritage Foundation's Michael Franc, adding: "Incumbent survival instinct trumps all else." What stunned them was a string of last-minute attack ads paid for by the National Republican Senatorial Committee and Republican National Committee that blasted Mr. Laffey's record and his character.

"They really hit low," says Don Devine, editor of the American Conservative Union's newsletter. In Arizona, the battle was for the seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Conservatives supported state Rep. Randy Graf, whose get-tough immigration platform fit with a House bill passed earlier this year. Pro-Graf forces were startled when, in the final weeks of the campaign, Speaker Dennis Hastert and other House leaders poured cash into the race of moderate Steve Huffman, who embraced a Senate immigration bill that would have created a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

Mr. Graf beat Mr. Huffman by six points, but conservatives yesterday were still fuming about House leaders' decision to interfere in a race where they had no incumbent to protect. "It's outrageous," says the Cato Institute's Mr. Boaz.

Party strategists are working to reconnect and reinvigorate their base and believe they have enough time to do that.

"At this point, conservatives are fairly lethargic, if not discouraged. But the prospect of [House Democratic Leader] Nancy Pelosi and [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean running the country can be a great motivator," says Whit Ayres, a Republican polling expert.

Bush Gets A Lift From Emphasis On Terror, Iraq (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's efforts to explain and win support for his policies on Iraq and terrorism appear to be paying some initial dividends as midterm congressional campaigns heat up.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1 shows that Mr. Bush's overall approval rating, as well as his marks on handling Iraq, rose modestly after a series of speeches imploring Americans to remain patient despite repeated setbacks in Iraq. Voters also expressed slightly increased willingness to maintain U.S. troop strength there as commanders struggle to tamp down a continued insurgency and sectarian violence.

It remains "a modest uptick" in "a very difficult national environment" for the president's party in midterm elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though it is improved from 38% in June. A 54% majority of voters continues to say the U.S. is headed in the wrong direction.

Yet the poll results suggest Mr. Bush retains some ability to shape the context of the election to his party's benefit. Whether that can last beyond the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks through to Election Day on Nov. 7 remains an open question. If so, the president could lighten what has been a period of persistent gloom for Republicans. Along with the roiling Iraq issue, factors that have cost the party range from the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina to the administration's fizzled Social Security privatization to rising gasoline prices.

The unpopular war and the historic pattern of midterm losses for the party holding the White House have strategists in both parties maintaining forecasts of Republican losses in Congress. Still, it remains unclear whether those losses will flip control of the House or the Senate or both. Republicans have held the House since 1994 and the Senate since 2002.

"In meteorological terms, it's going to be a hurricane -- what has yet to be determined is whether it's Category 1 or Category 3 or Category 5," says Peter Hart, the Democratic pollster who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Mr. McInturff. "If [Mr. Bush] has the ability to dominate the dialogue, he can push this election toward the Republicans even as he remains unpopular with the voters."

Mr. Bush used the 9/11 anniversary to buttress his assertion that Iraq is the "central front" in the antiterror campaign, an argument that might help Republicans limit their losses and hold control of at least one chamber of Congress for the final two years of Mr. Bush's presidency.

And officials of the Republican Party and at the White House yesterday were celebrating the Tuesday night primary victory of a Republican who opposed the war, moderate Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island. Though Mr. Chafee had opposed Mr. Bush on tax cuts and the war, party strategists concluded he has a far better chance of holding the seat against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in November than his conservative challenger did. Mr. Chafee's re-election would increase the odds against the Democrats' gaining the six seats it needs to capture Senate control. (Please see related article8.)

Strategists in both parties believe Democrats have a stronger chance of picking up the 15 seats necessary to win control of the House. Yet economic developments have the potential to brighten voters' mood after months in which Mr. Bush and Republicans received scant credit for continued growth and low unemployment.

Crude-oil prices have fallen from $77 a barrel in early August to $63.97 yesterday, sending gasoline prices well below previous highs of more than $3 a gallon at the pump. And stock prices continued their climb from a slump in July: The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 45.23 points yesterday to close at 11543.32 -- just 1.6% short of the record.

So far, all of this is providing only mixed benefits for Republican candidates. Approval of Congress actually fell to 20% in this month's survey from 24% in July, and Democrats maintained a 48%-39% edge on voters' preference of which party should control Capitol Hill.

At the same time, the Journal/NBC poll shows voters split on whether their incumbent House member deserves re-election. In July, voters said it was time to "give a new person a chance" by a 10-percentage-point margin. Voters also say by 42% to 37% that they are more concerned Democrats have offered "no specific plans" than that Republicans have offered "no changes" to deal with the country's problems. The telephone survey of 1,009 registered voters, conducted Sept. 8-11, carries a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

In part, those results show the impact of Republican candidates' advertising attacks on their Democratic foes at an earlier point in the campaign season than in past elections. Democrats acknowledge that Mr. Bush's party has been quicker this year than President Clinton's allies were in 1994 to gauge the depth of political trouble they face and adjust tactics accordingly.

The adjustments have been reflected on Capitol Hill in Republican leaders' decision, made in conjunction with White House officials, to spend September debating the surveillance and prosecution of terror suspects in the wake of court decisions rejecting Mr. Bush's initial approach to both. Some Republican lawmakers are dissenting from Mr. Bush's approach, but the Journal/NBC survey shows voters prefer Republicans to Democrats on handling terrorism by a 14-percentage-point margin. (Please see related article9.)

Another such step was Republican leaders' decision to shelve Mr. Bush's request for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws in the face of conservative opposition to a guest-worker program embracing some who already have crossed the border illegally. Instead, House Republicans spent much of the summer courting conservatives by emphasizing border security.

Whatever the cause, the Journal/NBC poll shows Republicans have taken initial steps toward narrowing the gap in voter interest that has favored the Democratic faithful for months. In July, 57% of Democratic voters expressed the highest possible level of interest in the election, compared with 46% of Republicans.

Now, that "interest gap" has narrowed to 51%-46% in the Democrats' favor. Hispanic voters, the constituency Republicans have feared alienating with an emphasis on border security, evince significantly less interest in the election than either whites or African-Americans.

Democrats hold the upper hand on some key issues in the survey, including a 23-percentage-point edge on handling Social Security and a 12-percentage-point advantage on handling the economy. Voters citing jobs, Social Security or health care as their top priority -- a group that accounts for nearly half the electorate -- want Democrats to win control of Congress, 60% to 25%.

Yet the slightly smaller group naming terrorism, moral values or immigration as top priorities favors Republican control by a similarly lopsided margin. That means control of the campaign dialogue will be a critical factor in battleground House and Senate races.

The Iraq war, now in its fourth year and with more than 2,500 U.S. troop deaths, remains the Republicans' most daunting political problem because it has depressed the overall public mood and fueled demand for change. Still, the poll shows how Republican candidates may best be able to limit the political fallout.

When offered a choice between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels and a Democrat who wants to reduce them, voters choose the Democrat by a 53%-40% margin. If offered a choice between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels and a Democrat seeking "immediate and orderly withdrawal," voters prefer the Republican by 48%-41%.

"There's a reason that Republicans and the president are trying to make this a choice for stability [in Iraq] versus 'cut-and-run,'" says Mr. McInturff, the Republican pollster. "If you're a Republican candidate, you'd better make this election on a narrow range of issues."

The Journal/NBC survey shows Mr. Bush's approval rating on the economy has risen to 43% from 39% in June. That may in part reflect an easing of energy costs; 26% cite "gas prices and energy costs" as the biggest economic trouble spot, down from 41% in July.

Rising stock-market values haven't yet translated into increasing optimism about the economy. Just one in five voters surveyed says the economy has improved in the past year, unchanged since June.

An Anti-Incumbent Election? This Year? Of Course Not (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

Over the past year or so, I've heard more than a few people talking about 2006 as an anti-incumbent election. Well, those people are wrong. We are not going to have an anti-incumbent election in November. We are going to have an anti-Bush election.

First, let's get our terms straight. If "anti-incumbent election" means anything, it is that voters are so dissatisfied with the status quo that they vote against all incumbents, regardless of party. The term highlights one, and only one, quality of embattled candidates: their incumbency.

This kind of election is not about party or ideology or how Members voted on a particular piece of legislation. If it were about any of those things, it wouldn't simply be an "anti-incumbent" election. An anti-incumbent election is a referendum on the "ins," and voters, for whatever reasons, are so unhappy with the performance of those "ins" — all the "ins" — that they throw them out. All of them.

I'm sure 2006 won't be an anti-incumbent election, for two very different reasons.

First, history strongly suggests — and "suggests" actually is far too mild a word — that we don't have anti-incumbent elections in this country. I'm not saying that we've never had one or that we never will have one, but I'm hard-pressed to identify one during the past 50 years.

Over the past 26 Congressional elections, going back to 1954, there have been only three elections when at least a half-dozen incumbents of both parties were defeated — 1956, 1990 and 1992, according to "Vital Statistics on Congress, 2001-02," edited by Norman Ornstein, Thomas Mann and Michael Malbin.

By contrast, we have had eight elections in which one party knocked off at least 20 of the opponent's incumbents and lost fewer than a half-dozen of its own.

Virtually all midterm elections are a referendum on the party of the president, so it isn't surprising that when a political wave hits, it damages one party much more heavily than it does the other.

The worst bipartisan election since the mid-1950s was in 1992, when a total of 24 sitting House Members — 16 Republicans and eight Democrats — were defeated. While there was a strong anti-Washington, D.C., mood developing in this country at that time, that year also was a redistricting election in which some incumbents didn't possess the normal advantages of incumbency. That fact undoubtedly explains so many incumbent losses.

Otherwise, over the past 50 years, the closest we've come to an anti-incumbent election was in 1990, when six Democrats and nine Republicans lost in the general election, and in 1978, when 14 Democrats and five Republicans were defeated that November.

Second, there is very little evidence that the environment in the current cycle is heavily stacked against incumbents in general, even though a handful have been defeated for renomination.

Looking toward November, there is no indication that the two major parties both are facing significant incumbent losses. I suppose Democrats could lose an incumbent or two if things go poorly for them, but right now there isn't a single Democratic seat that ranks in the 25 most vulnerable House seats in the country.

Not one. Not a single one. The vulnerability is entirely on one side of the partisan aisle.

How could we possibly be having an anti-incumbent election if one party loses 10, 15 or even 20 incumbents and the other party loses none, or one or two?

Instead, what is developing is a classic political wave of voter dissatisfaction about the direction of the nation and the performance of the president. Congressional candidates from the president's party are about to bear the brunt of voter dissatisfaction, because President Bush isn't on the ballot.

Republican incumbents are in trouble not because they are incumbents, but because they are Republicans.

This election isn't really about agendas. Sure, Democrats have something called their "New Direction," but most voters aren't regarding November primarily as a choice between two visions or two ideologies. No, it's about sending a message to the president and to Congress that they aren't happy — specifically with the Iraq War, but more generally as well.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is quite correct when he says Republicans will do better when the election is a choice rather than a referendum. Unfortunately for him, that's not likely to happen until 2008.

So what about the defeats of Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), Reps. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) and Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.), and even Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski (R)? The answer is simple. Each lost for specific reasons, not because of a trend. It isn't their incumbency that unites them. They lost because of their own voting records and style.

While it is true that voters are not particularly impressed with Congress in general or either of the two major parties, the midterm elections have developed into a referendum on the president. Republicans may well succeed in minimizing the damage in November by localizing elections and re-electing incumbents, but there is no indication that voters will send a message of dissatisfaction with all incumbents in the fall.

That means that all but a handful of Democratic House incumbents can rest easy.

Analysis: Party Convictions Sidelined (AP-Y)

By David Espo

DOJ_NMG_0062926

AP, September 13, 2006

All politics is national in the 2006 midterm elections, with both parties willing to put aside deeply held views over war, taxes and more in the surpassing struggle for control of the House and Senate.

Which explains why a conservative Republican Party rejoiced Wednesday at the primary victory of Rhode Island's incorrigibly independent GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee, and struggled with the defeat of the more moderate of two leading contenders for a House seat in Arizona.

Or why Democrats, whose leaders call daily for a timetable for a troop withdrawal from Iraq, were less than thrilled to find vigorously anti-war contenders winning nominations for House seats in New Hampshire and New York.

Nowhere was the phenomenon more obvious than Rhode Island, where Republicans placed an abundance of money and manpower into an effort to save their most liberal senator from defeat at the hands of a conservative primary challenger.

"We appreciate him. We know that he fits Rhode Island and he's got a record that's effective for the concerns of the people of Rhode Island," Sen. Elizabeth Dole, head of the GOP senatorial campaign committee, said in praise of Chafee. The Rhode Islander opposes the war in Iraq and President Bush's tax cuts, while supporting abortion rights.

In case anyone missed the point, she recast it in more overtly political terms. "This race would've immediately fallen into the hands of the Democrats if, in fact, Linc Chafee had lost this race" to Stephen Laffey.

Nationally, Democrats must gain six seats to capture control of the Senate.

"That would have been one down, right there," Dole said. She felt strongly about it, having approved a barrage of television commercials that depicted Laffey as weak on immigration and prone to raising taxes.

Not that Rhode Island is safe for Chafee or the Republicans in the fall.

The state's former attorney general, Sheldon Whitehouse, drew more votes in an essentially uncontested Democratic primary than Chafee and Laffey combined in their heated race, and the most recent pre-primary polls point toward a close race in November.

Chafee presented his credentials as he returned to campaigning.

"Rhode Islanders are going to know I'm independent, over and over again," he said.

But Whitehouse had already served notice he would try to undercut the claim. Speaking to supporters Tuesday night, he noted that the first vote cast when the new Congress convenes will determine which party controls the Senate.

"I can tell you this: I will never cast that vote to empower the Bush agenda," he said, a slap at Chafee.

Republican Party officials applied the same logic in Arizona, where Randy Graf ran on a tough-on-immigration platform for the GOP nomination in a district that runs to the Mexican border.

Strategists in Washington deemed him too conservative to hold the seat, and ran television commercials praising one of his rivals, Steven Huffman.

Graf won anyway, and immediately ran into difficulties. Rep. Jim Kolbe, the Republican who has held the seat for more than 20 years, issued a statement that said, "There are such profound and fundamental differences between his views and mine on several key issues that I would not be true to my own principles were I to endorse him now for the general election in November."

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win control of the House, and like Republicans, looked past their policy views — then conceded they had run afoul of voters who preferred a nominee with a sharper position on the war.

Judith Aydelott was the early choice of the Democratic establishment to run in the Hudson Valley of New York. The voters weren't as impressed, giving her little more than one-fourth of the votes cast.

Singer-songwriter John Hall carries the nomination into the fall campaign against Republican Sue Kelly.

For months, party officials had touted Jim Craig as the type of challenger who could make a New Hampshire congressional seat competitive. A leader in the New Hampshire legislature, he had the support of party officials in Washington as well as at the state capital in Concord, N.H.

He lost, in a rout, to Carol Shea-Porter, who raised a mere $40,000.

Of the war, she said recently, "We need to get out. We don't have to tell insurgents over there the exact date, but we better tell ourselves what the date is and better start planning to leave."

That sounds like something any one of dozens of congressional Democrats could say with pride.

Now, they'll find out whether their calculation was correct — that it might have been preferable to mute opposition to the war in districts like the one around the New Hampshire seacoast or the military academy at West Point.

What Primaries Say About US Voter Mood (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

In the end, the most-watched race of the Sept. 12 primaries became the dog that didn't bark. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, beat back a fierce challenge by a populist conservative supported by the antitax Club for Growth.

A loss by Senator Chafee would have been nearly without precedent in modern times - the second senator to lose in the primaries, following Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman's defeat in Connecticut last month. Headlines would have screamed about voters clamoring for change, and about ideological purges in both parties.

The outcome - a 54-to-46 Chafee victory over Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, relatively close for an incumbent in a primary - suggests that the national Republican Party did indeed need to pull out all the stops, as it did, to ensure that the conservative was not the nominee and a near-certain loser in November. Rhode Island is one of the most liberal states in the country. Before the primary race heated up, sparking a flurry of Republican registration by independents and even some Democrats to help save Chafee, only about 11 percent of voters were registered Republican.

But the dynamic in Rhode Island was completely different from that of Connecticut. In the Lieberman race, no viable Republican is running, so the Demo- crats could afford to hold a primary centered on a major issue - US policy in Iraq. The Republicans could not afford to let the Senate primary be all about taxes and pork-barrel spending and the Iraq war. It needed to be about electability.

"In Rhode Island, had Chafee lost, the Democrats would have picked up that seat," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. Renominating Chafee is "a matter of pure pragmatism on the part of Republicans in Rhode Island."

Thus Chafee, the only Republican senator to vote against authorizing US military action in Iraq in 2002 - and who did not even vote to reelect President Bush in 2004 - was treated to lots of national Republican money in his quest for renomination. Dr. Sabato surmises that if just the true Republicans had voted in the primary, Laffey probably would have won 60 percent to 40 percent or better.

"It was the independents and even Democrats who switched registration who saved Chafee," he says, noting that small-state, personal loyalty to the patrician senator among non-Republicans likely played a role. Chafee is one of Rhode Island's political brand names; Lincoln's father, John, was a longtime, beloved senator from the state.

Still, the Chafee name and record may not be enough to save the current senator in November. He faces a tough challenge from former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse (D). Mr. Whitehouse's father roomed with John Chafee at Yale University, a sign of just how small Rhode Island is.

By keeping that race competitive for the GOP, Chafee's primary victory makes it that much more difficult for the Democrats to retake control of the Senate in November. The party needs to make a net gain of six seats to win control.

In other Sept. 12 primaries:

• In Arizona's eighth congressional district, Randy Graf, a conservative running against illegal immigration, defeated the moderate Republican, handing a major opportunity to the Democrats to take over a seat currently held by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R). State Sen. Gabrielle Giffords won the Democratic primary.

• In Maryland, Rep. Ben Cardin defeated former Rep. Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination. Mr. Cardin will face Lt. Gov. Michael Steele (R), one of the handful of African-Americans running for high-level office this November.

• In Washington, D.C., city council member Adrian Fenty handily won the Democratic primary for mayor, and will almost certainly coast to victory in November. At age 35, he would be the youngest mayor in city history, and also the first native

Washingtonian to win that position. Washington has had elected mayors since it gained home rule in 1973. Mr. Fenty defeated D.C. council chair and veteran politician Linda Cropp, a sign of voter hunger for change.

• In Michigan, state Rep. Keith Ellison is now in position to become the first Muslim elected to Congress, as well as the first African-American to the House from Minnesota. He won the Democratic primary, in a highly Democratic district, to replace retiring Rep. Martin Sabo (D).

• In New Hampshire's first congressional district, antiwar Democrat Carol Shea-Porter won a primary upset, defeating the party's favored candidate, state House minority leader Jim Craig. Ms. Shea-Porter will face Rep. Jeb Bradley (R) in November. The Bradley seat appears on most lists of competitive House races, and the Iraq war is likely to be a central issue in the general election. Shea-Porter favors a deadline for withdrawal, while Bradley favors withdrawal only after Iraq is stable.

• In New York, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) cruised to renomination, with 83 percent of the vote, over antiwar candidate Jonathan Tasini. Senator Clinton is expected to win reelection easily in November, thus paving the way for her to address the biggest question of her political career: Will she run for president in 2008?

Primaries Sharpen Focus In The Battle For Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The battle for control of Congress came into sharper focus Wednesday after Tuesday's primaries gave House Republicans an edge in a New Hampshire race, Democrats got a leg up on an open House seat in Arizona and the two parties settled in for a Senate showdown in Rhode Island.

In a display of Republican ability to get voters to the polls, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island rode a record Republican primary turnout to a victory over Mayor Stephen Laffey of Cranston, saving Republicans from prematurely surrendering a seat to Democrats, who need a net gain of six to take over the Senate.

"That would have been one down right there,'' said Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "There was no way that Mayor Laffey could have won the general election.''

Despite Mr. Chafee's penchant for crossing party lines on big issues, national Republicans poured in money and workers in a push to hold the seat, displaying anew why Democrats are worried about the deep pockets and get-out-the-vote operations of their rivals.

But Democrats said the level of support for their candidate in Rhode Island, former Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse — who received more votes than the two Republican candidates combined — left them confident they could unseat Mr. Chafee in November. They also said that Mr. Chafee had been bolstered by his opposition to the war in Iraq and other Bush policies and that Mr. Whitehouse could trump him there.

"Yesterday's election showed that when you're anti-Bush, you win,'' said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, who said Democrats had showed strong enthusiasm even without a contested race.

"This is going to be an uphill fight for them in November,'' Mr. Schumer said of Republicans.

Mrs. Dole and other Republicans said they believed that Mr. Chafee, whose father was a popular Rhode Island senator, would attract substantial Democratic and independent support in November. "He has shown the ability to win with cross-over voters,'' said Senator George Allen of Virginia, who ran the Senate Republican campaign organization two years ago.

In Arizona, Democrats said they believed their chances for winning the House seat in the Tucson area being vacated by Representative Jim Kolbe, a Republican, were enhanced by the primary victory of Randy Graf, a conservative Republican.

The National Republican Congressional Committee had backed Mr. Graf's more moderate opponent, Steve Huffman, as the better candidate for the general election. Mr. Kolbe said Wednesday that he would not endorse Mr. Graf, citing "profound and fundamental differences between his views and mine on several key issues.''

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign arm, said the party would rally behind Mr. Graf, including showcasing him on Thursday before potential party donors. In addition, Mr. Forti said, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of

New York, chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, would be contributing $5,000 from his own campaign to Mr. Graf.

Democrats said they were confident that the division within the Republican Party would open the door to their candidate, Gabrielle Giffords, a former state legislator, capturing the seat held for two decades by Mr. Kolbe.

In New Hampshire, Jim Craig, a moderate Democrat who had been backed by his party in the primary to take on Representative Jeb Bradley in the Manchester area, lost to the antiwar candidate Carol Shea-Porter.

"Obviously, that is embarrassing for Democrats,'' said Representative Charles Bass, the Republican who represents New Hampshire's other House district, predicting that Mr. Bradley would now be re-elected.

The Democratic Party's choice in the 19th Congressional District of New York, represented by Sue W. Kelly, a Republican, also lost on Tuesday. Ms. Kelly will now face the singer-songwriter John Hall, who has attracted celebrity backing from the music community.

In a highly publicized primary to succeed Representative Martin Olav Sabo of Minnesota, a Democrat who is retiring, Keith Ellison, a state legislator, won a tough race in the Minneapolis-area district. That puts Mr. Ellison in line to become the first Muslim member of Congress.

Primary Colors (WSJ)

Hillary Clinton and Eliot Spitzer barely broke a sweat in winning their primaries Tuesday, but that doesn't mean the day lacked drama. Just ask Rhode Island Senator Lincoln Chafee, who staved off a spirited challenge from tax-cutting conservative Stephen Laffey, thanks largely to the national GOP he belongs to but regularly undermines.

Mr. Chafee has caused nothing but headaches for his caucus on everything from tax cuts to Social Security to the war on terror, but he was backed by a White House concerned with keeping the seat nominally Republican and worried that Mr. Laffey was too conservative to win in November. The national party poured millions into attack ads against Mr. Laffey and more or less told GOP voters the party would abandon the seat if he won.

The White House used a similar strategy in 2004, when it backed Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania against a conservative challenge by Pat Toomey. At least Mr. Specter has returned the favor by helping to confirm President Bush's Supreme Court nominees. Now we'll see if Mr. Chafee -- who famously didn't vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito -- is similarly grateful. The first test will be if he votes to confirm John Bolton as U.N. Ambassador.

Meanwhile, the national GOP was on the losing side Tuesday in Arizona, where a primary for an open House seat went to anti-immigration hard-liner Randy Graf. Immigration was the dominant issue in the Tucson district that borders Mexico. Yet Mr. Graf managed a plurality of just 43%, the same amount he received in a primary two years ago in a loss to Jim Kolbe, the 11-term pro-immigration incumbent retiring this year. GOP restrictionists are cheering Mr. Graf's victory, but he is now expected to lose the seat in November. Restrictionists also took a blow as their Arizona candidate for governor, Don Goldwater -- who campaigned at the border, yelling "Mr. Bush, build this wall now!" -- lost handily to a conservative who favors comprehensive immigration reform.

Back East, Maryland Democrats chose Representative Ben Cardin over former NAACP chief Kweisi Mfume in a Senate primary, which means GOP candidate and current Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele has his work cut out. It also means there won't be two black candidates for a Senate seat, although it will be interesting to see what inroads Mr. Steele can make with black Democrats. If he wins the general election, the Senate will have two black Members for the first time in history.

Antiwar Democrats also made themselves heard again. They won in New Hampshire, lifting Carol Shea-Porter, who called for withdrawal from Iraq, over Jim Craig, who heavily outspent her and was backed by the party establishment. They lost in Maryland, but not before putting a scare into Representative Al Wynn, who voted for the war and has voted with the GOP on campaign finance issues and some tax cuts. He won 50%-46%.

Both were electoral surprises likely to push the Congressional Democrats further left on the war. Whether that will help them in November is another story, since Ned Lamont's victory last month over Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman seems to be helping the GOP retain its three vulnerable House seats in that state. You know it's a volatile political year when the GOP is counting on victories by a pro-war Democrat and an antiwar Republican (Mr. Chafee) to keep control of Congress.

Prudence At The Polls (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The lesson from Tuesday's round of primaries in nine states and the District of Columbia was simple and reassuring. Credentials count. Experience counts. And so does the willingness to engage some serious issues.

For the most part, the candidates nominated for Congress and governor come from the mainstream establishments of their parties. Despite the widespread voter discontent with the political status quo, few mavericks, rebels or true outsiders won places on the November ballot.

In the day's headline event, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, turned back the challenge of Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, a conservative populist.

The margin was not great -- 5,000 votes in a turnout of some 63,000. Chafee probably owes his victory as much to the financial and organizational support supplied by the Republicans' national campaign committees as to his own diffident campaigning. The White House and GOP Senate leaders decided to overlook Chafee's frequent disagreements with the president in hopes of keeping a Senate seat that Democrats have to win to have any chance of capturing a Senate majority.

The Chafee name is honored in Rhode Island, thanks to the legacy of the incumbent's father, the late John Chafee, who served as governor and senator for years. Chafee still faces a serious challenge from the Democratic nominee, former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, in the heavily Democratic state. But the Republicans' chances are far better with Chafee than with anyone else.

In another Rhode Island contest, Brown University professor Jennifer Lawless challenged Rep. Jim Langevin in the Democratic primary, arguing that his support of bills to finance the war in Iraq and his opposition to abortion rights put him outside the mainstream of the party. But this effort failed, as did most other tries inside Democratic primaries to repeat Ned Lamont's upset of Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman. With Lieberman now out front in the race, running as an independent, the idea that Lamont represented the new model for the party looks suspect.

One exception was in New Hampshire, where an antiwar activist, Carol Shea-Porter, who mobilized student and liberal support, beat the party-endorsed legislative leader, Jim Craig, for a House nomination. But she is a long shot against Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley.

The antiwar maverick who tried to upset Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in New York predictably was swamped, as was the estimable Long Island Democratic official, Thomas Suozzi, who challenged Attorney General Eliot Spitzer for governor. Spitzer now becomes a heavy favorite in November.

In another New York race, a seeming outsider, musician and pop composer John Hall, won the Democratic nomination to oppose Republican Rep. Sue Kelly. Hall, who played with the rock band Orleans and co-wrote "Still the One," had to overcome the early favorite, Judy Aydelott, who switched from the GOP in disagreement with President Bush's policies and attracted support from feminist groups and Hollywood types. Hall had stronger ties to the district's Democrats, and the backing of organized labor, so he was really the insiders' choice.

But out in Arizona, the power of another issue -- immigration -- was displayed when Randy Graf, an outspoken advocate of closing the border, won a close victory over party-endorsed moderate state Rep. Steve Huffman, for the Republican nomination to succeed retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe. The Kolbe-backed Huffman might have won, except that another moderate candidate took 12 percent of the vote -- twice Graf's margin. The district now becomes even more of a pickup target for the Democrats.

In Maryland, quiet competence prevailed when Rep. Ben Cardin, a 10-term veteran of the House and one of its most skilled but unflamboyant legislators, won in a large field to pick a successor to retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes. Having defeated Kweisi Mfume, the former head of the NAACP, in the primary, Cardin now faces another attractive African American, Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Maryland usually elects Democrats, but Steele could change the dynamics of the race.

The Sarbanes legacy continues, as the senator's son, attorney John Sarbanes, won the Democratic nomination to succeed Cardin in the House. His dad appeared in the novice candidate's commercials.

Another notable likely Democratic winner is state Rep. Keith Ellison of Minneapolis, the nominee for the seat of retiring Rep. Martin Olav Sabo in a heavily Democratic district. Ellison would be the first Muslim elected to Congress.

All together, the day's results showed commendable discernment on the part of the voters. It augurs well for November.

The GOP's Borderline Politics In Arizona (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

REPUBLICAN LAWMAKERS' internecine battles over immigration policy have already prevented them from acting on one of President Bush's top second-term priorities: comprehensive immigration reform. Now the GOP border split is threatening to cost Republicans at least one seat in the House of Representatives.

On Tuesday, Republican primary voters in Arizona's 8th Congressional District chose former state legislator and pro golfer Randy Graf — who wants to militarize the southern border and who received $40,000 from the vigilante Minuteman Project — over four opponents, most of whom took a more sensible approach on immigration.

Graf may be further to the right than the national GOP, but on issues such as taxes, same-sex marriage and abortion, he's right in line with the Bush administration. Nevertheless, the National Republican Congressional Committee was so worried about his ability to win this marginally Republican district in November that it threw more than $250,000 worth of advertising behind one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman.

The money and national support may have helped Huffman, but not enough. He wound up with 37% of the vote to Graf's 43%; the remaining 20% was divided among the other three candidates. Democrats, meanwhile, threw their support behind former Republican Gabrielle Giffords, who served five years in the state Legislature as a Democrat. Early polls show Giffords leading Graf in the race to succeed retiring Republican Jim Kolbe, who handily defeated Graf in the GOP primary two years ago.

Like Southern Californians, Arizonans experience firsthand the effects of illegal immigration, both bad and good. The labor supply and entrepreneurial energy have become vital to some industries even as schools, hospitals and other public institutions have strained to meet the burdens imposed. These experiences have divided voters and elected representatives. Three Arizona Republicans, including Kolbe, are leading sponsors of comprehensive reform bills that would create a guest-worker program as well as increase border security; four others are members of Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo's Immigration Reform Caucus, which seeks to seal the borders, deny citizenship to American-born children of illegal immigrant parents and slow legal immigration to a trickle.

Though he won, Graf drew fewer votes this year than he did in 2004 against Kolbe. Meanwhile, in the GOP primary for Arizona governor, an immigration restrictionist candidate, Don Goldwater (Barry's nephew), was outpolled, 49% to 41%, by Len Munsil, who took a less aggressive stance on illegal immigrants. So it's hard to argue that either side of the debate is gathering steam. The intriguing question remains whether the tough talk that wins primaries in September will do as well in general elections this November.

In R.I., A Model For Voter Turnout (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The turnout campaign that Republican operatives used to help pull Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee to victory in the Rhode Island primary was a potent demonstration of how money and manpower can transform a race even in an unfavorable political environment -- and a preview of the strategy that national party officials say they plan to replicate in the most competitive House and Senate races over the next 55 days.

In the past two national elections, in 2002 and 2004, Republicans outperformed Democrats in bringing their backers to the polls, but many Democrats and independent analysts have suggested that the competition may be different this year, in part because of slumping morale among GOP activists. But Chafee's performance -- combined with reports of late-starting organization and internal bickering on the Democratic side -- suggest that the Republican advantage on turnout may remain intact even as many other trends are favoring the opposition.

The Republican National Committee, convinced that Chafee is the party's only chance of keeping a seat in a Democratic-leaning state, spent $400,000 to ship 86 out-of-state volunteers and several paid staff members to Rhode Island. They targeted not just Republicans but also independent voters during the final days of the campaign, following a blueprint developed months ago by the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the Chafee campaign.

The effort helped Chafee survive a spirited challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey by boosting primary turnout to an all-time high. In June, GOP leaders used a similar turnout program to help lobbyist Brian Bilbray win a special California election for the House seat vacated by indicted GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

There were several factors behind Chafee's 54 percent to 46 percent win, including his popularity among independents and his decision to attack Laffey in television ads during the final weeks of the campaign. But it was the repeat success of the GOP voter-mobilization program that had Democrats anxiously examining returns.

"Their turnout operation is exquisite," a senior Democratic strategist said. "We are not going to match them."

While Democrats are confident they are on track to capture the House and possibly the Senate, top party leaders are privately expressing concerns about the RNC's $30 million financial advantage over the Democratic National Committee and how the money will be used to maximize turnout in pivotal races.

Events this week put the GOP edge in sharp relief. While the RNC was fine-tuning its "microtargeting" program in Rhode Island, Democrats were announcing they had finally resolved a months-long dispute between Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) over a budget for mobilizing voters.

The DNC will spend $12 million to help Democrats up and down the ballot this fall. Some party leaders privately acknowledge that House Democrats in particular are only beginning to put in place an operation to turn out voters and that Republicans are many months ahead in planning.

Democratic leaders, who agreed to speak about the matter on the condition of anonymity, said their turnout strategy will be sufficient even if it is not equal. Senate Democrats have already put $10 million into turnout for contested races and began a detailed voter-identification effort months ago, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has brought on grass-roots organizing expert Michael Whouley to head up its turnout efforts. Democrats said they have one advantage this year that Republicans cannot match: voter intensity. Numerous polls show that Democrats, disdainful of President Bush and the Iraq war, are motivated to vote on Nov. 7, while Republicans do not have similar enthusiasm.

Still, Republicans said the combination of the Chafee win and new polling data showing renewed voter confidence in GOP anti-terrorism policies suggest their election plan could limit losses and protect their congressional majorities. An ABC News poll released yesterday found that Bush's relentless focus on terrorism in the run-up to the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks benefited the White House and the GOP. Republicans held an edge of seven percentage points when respondents were asked which party they trust to handle terrorism, a 14-point change from last month.

Fred Yang, a Democratic pollster involved in competitive races this fall, said he was not surprised by Republicans' improving numbers on the fight against terrorism but added: "If this blip holds, it should be something that concerns us."

Chafee, who often clashes with the White House and congressional leaders over policy and political tactics, said the Rhode Island primary shows that the GOP strategy can work. "The proof is in the pudding," he said. He noted that the state saw a record turnout for a Republican primary and said that the turnout operation "made the difference." The RNC lacks the resources to replicate its efforts in Rhode Island in every competitive congressional race. But GOP officials said that the $30 million they plan to spend on turnout will allow them to run aggressive programs in most of them. Already, for example, they have more than 40 paid field experts in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee and nine in Connecticut for the three competitive House races, according to a person familiar with RNC operations.

Near Election Day, they will decide where to deploy thousands of volunteers, some paid, for reinforcements.

Recent history underscores the importance of superior voter-mobilization plans. In 2004, Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.) thought that if he received 190,000 votes it would be impossible for former congressman John Thune (R) to beat him. Daschle won 193,340 votes; Thune got 197,848. In Ohio -- the central battleground in the race between Bush and Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) -- Democrats met all of their projected vote totals but came up more than 100,000 short.

The Rhode Island effort offered a window into how a mobilization program unfolds.

About six months ago, the National Republican Senatorial Committee sat down with the Chafee campaign to construct a voter-turnout program. Weekly phone calls followed and a number of NRSC senior staffers -- including political director Blaise Hazelwood -- made regular trips to the state to ensure the structure was being built. They identified potential Chafee voters and pressed Democrats to change their party identification to "unaffiliated," a move that would allow them to vote in the Republican primary.

As the campaign wore on, Republicans began another slew of phone calls to unaffiliated voters to tell them that they could vote for Chafee and then immediately change their registration back to unaffiliated or Democrat. The RNC road-tested a new technology in the race that officials said is making their targeting program faster and more precise. It is based on a program that allows volunteers to call potential voters, note their political views and preferences on sheet of paper and immediately scan the results into a huge database known as the Voter Vault. Experts in the political practice known as microtargeting can then instantly analyze the results to determine which issues are moving voters and adjust their pitch.

All told, the Chafee campaign spent $500,000 on the effort, while the Republican National Committee chipped in an additional $400,000. The NRSC spent $1.2 million on the race -- primarily on an extended television campaign that attacked Laffey. Heading into the final day, Chafee said he had "deep apprehensions" about his ability to win.

Bill Lynch, chairman of the Rhode Island Democratic Party, said the turnout numbers are worrisome. "It will make for an interesting couple of months," he said.

Democrats Form New Group For Fund-Raising And Ads (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Sensing both political danger and opportunity, a top Democratic operative and a group of major party donors have banded together to deliver a barrage of late advertising and on-the-ground action to secure Democratic victories in November.

The operative, Harold M. Ickes, a top aide to former President Bill Clinton and informal adviser to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, and a group of allies are soliciting money for a new organization called the September Fund.

They hope to raise and spend as much as $25 million to influence not only crucial Congressional races but also other campaigns and ballot initiatives at the federal and state level.

Mr. Ickes was among the chief organizers of several groups that raised more than $200 million from wealthy liberals and labor unions in 2004 to try to defeat President Bush.

After months in which Democrats have fretted about how much support they would get from those sources this time around, Mr. Ickes is turning to many of the same donors in hopes that a surge of spending in the fall campaign's final weeks will cement Democratic gains against a president and a Republican-led Congress whose approval ratings are sagging.

Mr. Ickes has already contacted George Soros, the billionaire financier who gave Democratic committees more than $25 million in 2004. Among others on the fund's list of potential donors are Steve Bing, a Hollywood producer; Linda Pritzker, a member of the family that owns Hyatt hotels; Herb and Marion Sandler, owners of a California savings and loan; and Ted Waitt, founder of the computer company Gateway. All gave multimillion-dollar gifts to the funds Mr. Ickes directed in 2004.

The September Fund, like the groups Mr. Ickes helped organize in 2004, is set up under a loophole in campaign finance law that allows political groups to escape federal donation limits that apply to party committees and candidates. Such groups, called 527 groups for the relevant section of the Internal Revenue Code, cannot advocate the election or defeat of any candidate but can engage in issue advertising that draws distinctions between the two parties.

Federal law bars such groups from coordinating their activities with candidates or party committees, although many of the people running them, like Mr. Ickes, have longstanding ties to top party figures.

Groups formed under Section 527 of the code were major players on both sides of the 2004 campaign. The best-known 527's allied with the Republicans were Swift Vets and P.O.W.'s for Truth (formerly known as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth) and Progress for America.

The Democrats were even more aggressive in 2004 in exploiting the 527 loophole. In addition to the Ickes groups — America Coming Together, the Media Fund and Joint Victory Campaign — major unions, environmental groups and MoveOn.org spent nearly $100 million.

The September Fund is Mr. Ickes's second venture this year to conduct political operations outside the formal structure of the Democratic Party and its chairman, Howard Dean. Earlier this year, he established a database of potential Democratic voters, partly financed by Mr. Soros, that some officials complained diverted resources from the party and could be used to assist a presidential bid by Senator Clinton.

The September Fund's president is Erik Smith, a longtime Democratic operative who directed the Media Fund. The treasurer is Albert J. Dwoskin, a Virginia developer and major party donor.

Mr. Smith said the group began soliciting money less than a week ago and had already secured pledges for several million dollars from individuals and labor unions. He would not name them.

Michael Vachon, a spokesman for Mr. Soros, said Mr. Soros had received a memorandum from the group and was considering a donation. Mr. Soros has already pledged about $3 million to other Democratic groups active in the fall campaign, Mr. Vachon said.

Leaders of the fund include Karen Ackerman, the political director of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., and Anna Burger, chairwoman of the Change to Win labor federation. Others involved are Gen. Wesley K. Clark, retired, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate; Nick Baldick, who managed the presidential campaign of former Senator John Edwards and the New York mayoral campaign of Fernando Ferrer; and Bill Lynch, a New York lobbyist and strategist.

America Coming Together and the Media Fund evaporated after the 2004 election, with many of their donors dispirited and apparently unwilling to participate in this year's election. But Mr. Ickes, an aide said, became alarmed in late August about what he saw as a growing Republican financial advantage and feared a late salvo of negative advertising that could overwhelm Democrats in close races.

In a memorandum to potential donors, Mr. Ickes and the other organizers of the fund warned that while Democrats appeared united in their political goals, Republicans had $80 million more than Democrats to spend on fall races.

If the September Fund achieves its financial goals, it will be one of the largest 527's operating at the federal level this fall, but there are several others in the field.

MoveOn.org, the Internet-based progressive group, plans to spend as much as $25 million on advertising and voter mobilization, particularly in races focusing on the war in Iraq. Majority Action, a project of two former Democratic Party chairmen, Joe Andrew and Don Fowler, is planning to spend $8 million to $10 million on advertisements in several Congressional districts. The Senate Majority Project is setting up a group to help Democrats in close races.

On the Republican side, Club for Growth has supported conservatives in primaries against moderate incumbents in Michigan and Rhode Island. Progress for America is running advertisements on national cable television and in Missouri praising Republican strength in combating terrorism.

Va. Senate Race Goes Negative On 1979 Essay (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

RICHMOND, Sept. 13 -- Virginia's U.S. Senate race turned nasty Wednesday as Republican Sen. George Allen launched a character attack on his Democratic opponent's past views toward women in combat, signaling the start of a two-month barrage of negative campaigning in what has become a close race.

Allen, who is fighting for a second term, organized a news conference with five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said an article written 27 years ago by Allen's opponent, James Webb, prompted harassment by male midshipmen at the academy.

In the Washingtonian magazine article, "Women Can't Fight," the ex-Marine Webb wrote of the brutal conditions during the Vietnam War and argued against letting women into combat. Allen's campaign zeroed in on passages in which Webb described one of the academy's coed dorms as "a horny woman's dream" and said that he had never met a woman he "would trust to provide . . . combat leadership."

Linda G. Postenrieder, a 1982 Naval Academy graduate and a registered Democrat from California, said the article "infected the brigade with hate and divisive anger." Lisa Stolle, an academy graduate from Virginia Beach, said that for women, Webb's article "was like throwing gasoline" on a fire.

Webb, a Naval Academy graduate who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan, issued a statement saying he was sorry "to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship."

But his campaign also responded aggressively, accusing Allen of opposing the admission of women to the Virginia Military Institute and of once having accepted membership into an exclusive club while he was governor.

The rapid-fire charges from both sides offered clues to the days leading up to the Nov. 7 election. A campaign in which both sides had been trading disagreements about energy policy and the Iraq war is quickly becoming a personal spat between a decorated war hero and a football-loving senator and former governor.

"It's probably a good time to break out the Disney tapes for the kids, because the TV ads aren't going to be pretty," said Charlie Cook, an independent political analyst who edits the Cook Political Report. "Both these guys will do whatever it takes to win. Nobody's going to hold anything back."

Already Wednesday, an independent veterans group began airing a TV commercial in some parts of Virginia accusing Allen of voting against a $1 billion amendment for high-quality body armor for troops in Iraq. In the ad, as bullets pierce a Vietnam-era flak jacket, an announcer urges voters to oust Allen. Jon Soltz, an Iraq war veteran from Pittsburgh, said his group is targeting Allen because "he let the troops down."

Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said the amendment, which Allen and other GOP senators opposed, was not specifically for body armor. He called the attack "so off the charts, unfair and completely false."

In response to Webb's other charges, Allen aides pointed out that Allen declined membership in Richmond's Commonwealth Club, which admitted no women and few blacks, a few days after he initially accepted it. They also said that Democrats and Republicans had opposed coeducation at VMI before courts ordered the school to admit women. Later, aides said, Allen insisted that female cadets be treated well.

"The difference is that Jim Webb used his position to demean women who wanted to serve their country," said Chris LaCivita, a senior consultant to the Allen campaign, which set up cameras to record the news conference for a possible campaign ad.

Allen has been on the defensive for a month, responding to criticism after calling a young Webb volunteer "Macaca" and fighting old charges of racial insensitivity. In a speech Tuesday to a black educational foundation, Allen again apologized for the comment and attempted to explain his youthful admiration of the Confederate flag.

"What I was slow to appreciate -- and wish I had understood much sooner -- is that this symbol, which for me simply stood for rebellion against authority, and for others stood for regional pride in heritage, is, for black Americans, an emblem of hate and terror, an emblem of intolerance and intimidation," Allen said.

On Wednesday, Allen's campaign went on the offensive. The five women said they were among the first to attend the Naval Academy, which began admitting women in 1976. In Webb's article, he argued women cannot physically endure combat training and military-style hazing. He also raised concerns about fraternization. "Men fight better without women around," Webb said.

"This article was brandished repeatedly. [Men] quoted and used it as an excuse to mistreat us," said Kathleen Murray, a 1984 academy graduate who rose to commander in the Navy and retired to Norfolk.

Murray said she contacted other women and urged them to discuss Webb's article after learning that he was running for the Senate. She described the group as "not partisan," though she acknowledged that Allen's campaign helped to "facilitate" their news conference.

Interviewed later, Dan Proulx, a member of the academy's Class of 1982, said that early classes of women were harassed but that he didn't think Webb's article fueled the problem: "I would say it reflected more the time and spirit of times and the debate than it caused anything."

In his statement, Webb said that his article was written "during a time of great emotional debate . . . in this country." He said he is "completely comfortable" with the role of women in the military today, which he helped achieve by increasing opportunities for women while he was Navy secretary.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said Allen was trying to smear Webb because the Democrat has been gaining in recent polls. "This is all they have, this kind of thing," she said. "It makes sense they would go in this direction."

Female Naval Academy Grads Say Webb Column Caused Harassment (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 14, 2006

RICHMOND — Five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates today said Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb fostered an air of hostility and harassment for them with a magazine article he wrote in 1979.

The women, who attended the academy in the late 1970s and early '80s, said the column in Washingtonian magazine emboldened male midshipmen to humiliate them continuously, and some even wore "Jim Webb Fan Club" T-shirts.

"I was devastated to be told by a war hero that the academy should be shut down rather than accept me and that my very presence was responsible for the degradation of the military," said Jennifer Brooks, a 1982 graduate now retired after 20 years in the Navy.

In a statement released by Webb's campaign, he said he did not anticipate the widespread reaction to his article, "and to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship, I remain profoundly sorry."

Webb said in the statement he wrote the article "during a time of great emotional debate over a wide array of social issues in this country, and the tone of this article was no exception." He said he is "completely comfortable" with women's roles in today's military.

The women spoke at a news conference organized and paid for by Webb's Republican opponent, Sen. George Allen, on a day that marked a sharp negative turn in a race that polls show is about even.

An independent political action committee of Iraq war veterans announced the first television attack ad of the race, accusing Allen of voting in the Senate not to fund lifesaving modern body armor for combat troops. VoteVets.org is not endorsing Webb, just opposing Allen.

The women said Webb's article in Washingtonian magazine, "Women Can't Fight," made almost intolerable the already edgy relationship between male midshipmen and females, first admitted to the military service academies in 1976.

Excerpts from the article, in large bold print, hung against a black drape behind a podium theatrically lit for a camera crew of Scott Howell & Co., the Republican media firm producing Allen's campaign ads.

In the article, Webb describes the horror of combat in Vietnam for himself and the Marine infantry company he commanded and explains why he believes it was no place for a woman. He wrote that he'd never met a woman, including those at the academy who would become Navy officers, "whom I would trust to provide those men with combat leadership."

The article also described an academy residence hall that housed 4,000 men and 300 women as "a horny woman's dream."

"There was no way, ... no method to getting away from the intense, almost palpable resentment," Brooks said. "It was unbelievably demoralizing to be painted as a pampered slut who was just taking up classroom space and predestined to endanger the lives of the brave young men around me."

One of the women, 1982 graduate Linda Postenreider, said she had a telephone conversation with Webb on Tuesday night.

"He seemed willing to consider an apology or at least an acknowledgment to the brigade, especially those who served in the classes of '80 through '89, for his article that caused such grief and destruction," said Postenreider, who now lives in California and said she is a registered Democrat.

None of the women said they filed a complaint over the harassment they say Webb enabled.

Webb's Democratic primary opponent, Harris Miller, also made an issue of Webb's attitude toward military women. During the primary campaign, retired Army Gen. Claudia Kennedy accused Webb of discrimination against women in the military and endorsed Miller.

Cardin, Steele Start General Election Drive (BSUN)

By Matthew Hay Brown

The Baltimore Sun, September 14, 2006

With the primary races finally decided Wednesday, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele launched their general election campaigns for Maryland's open seat in the U.S. Senate, a contest that already is drawing national attention -- and money.

Cardin, who defeated friend and former congressional colleague Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic nomination to the seat held by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, came out firing Wednesday, linking Steele with President Bush while invoking what he described as government failures in Iraq and the Gulf Coast.

"There is a big difference between Michael Steele and me as to the agendas that we will bring to Washington," the 10-term congressman told supporters at a Democratic rally Wednesday in Northwest Baltimore.

"We need the United States Senate to stand up and hold President Bush accountable," Cardin said. "We need the U.S. Senate to stop the blockage of stem cells based upon an ideological wall to be available for research. We need the U.S. Senate to hold President Bush accountable for his efforts to privatize and dismantle Social Security. We need the U.S. Senate to hold President Bush accountable for the mess he's made in Iraq."

Steele, speaking later in the day, rejected attempts to link him to the president.

"If Congressman Cardin wants to run against George Bush, then he should have run for president," he told WBAL Radio. "But the reality of it is, no amount of demonizing of the president, no amount of scaring people about the war, is going to change the reality that we have kids in failing public schools. We have entrepreneurs who are weighted down by heavy tax burdens and regulatory burdens, unable to free up capital to hire people and to expand businesses. We've got a health care crisis staring us in the face. We're living an energy crisis at the moment, and it's going to take leadership that's going to be focused on the realities of everyday life."

The tone of the exchange differed markedly from that of the primary races, when Cardin and Mfume had presided over an amicable contest for the Democratic nomination, and Steele faced no serious opposition for the Republican nomination.

Early Wednesday, state Republicans issued a release titled "Meet Congressman Ben Cardin," in which they sought to portray him as a career politician beholden to the special interests -- the oil, gas, pharmaceutical and health care industries among them -- that they said had contributed more than $4.5 million to his campaigns since he entered Congress in 1986.

"A lifetime spent as a politician and Washington, D.C., insider has made Congressman Cardin totally out-of-touch with Marylanders and a totally unlikely advocate for change," the Maryland Republican Party said in a statement.

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur accused Republicans of attempting to distract voters.

"Once again we're seeing Michael Steele and his allies launch attacks instead of talking about issues important to Maryland families," he said. "Ben Cardin and Michael Steele have sharp differences on the Bush agenda. Michael Steele supports the president's plan to privatize Social Security. Ben Cardin opposes it. Michael Steele supports the war in Iraq. Ben Cardin voted against it. The Republicans are hoping to distract voters from the clear differences between the candidates in this race."

Such language reflects the stakes in the contest, seen as one of the few opportunities nationwide that the Republicans have this year to take a Senate seat from the Democrats. Both parties are expected to target the state with money and visits from national leaders.

"For Republicans, I can't think of a more important race in the country," said Zach Messitte, director of the Center for the Study of Democracy at St. Mary's College of Maryland. "Here's a chance to pick up a seat that's been in Democratic hands for 30 years."

Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the party's nominee for president in 2004, planned to attend a fundraiser for Cardin and other Maryland Democrats Wednesday night in Clarksville. Steele has received fundraising help from Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, White House political adviser Karl Rove and other prominent Republicans.

Steele launched what he called the "Steele Wheels for Change Bus Tour" Wednesday, making stops at the Park Heights Barbershop in Baltimore, Main Street in Parkville and the Anne Arundel County Fair in Crownsville.

Kevin Zeese, who has won the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties for the Senate, opened what he described as a "three-way race" Wednesday with a speech in Washington at the Palestine Center on reforming Middle East policy.

"The security of Americans demands that we get Middle East policy right," Zeese, the director of the anti-war group DemocracyRising.US, said in a statement. "But too many elected officials refuse to discuss the mistakes the U.S. Government is making in the region."

Messitte said Cardin's and Steele's strategies are now apparent.

"Steele's message has been that it's time for a change," he said. "Cardin doesn't have skeletons in his closet and doesn't have a lot of very controversial votes. So they've positioned themselves as, 'Do you want old, or do you want new?'

"Cardin, on the other hand, his strategy is probably pretty clear, which is, 'This guy is a Republican, and he's a conservative Republican. He may tell you that he's a different kind of politician, but here's where he stood on the stem-cell debate, here's where he stood on abortion.' I'm sure they've got quotes on him talking about Iraq before Iraq became uncool."

In an election between a white Democrat and a black Republican, the African-American community has been seen as a crucial constituency for both sides. Cardin and Steele have worked to woo black voters, many of whom traditionally vote Democratic but could be open to supporting Steele.

"One of the things that the Democrats had better start thinking about carefully is appeals to African-American voters because they have four white males nominated for four statewide offices, and one of them defeated a black candidate," said Matthew A. Crenson, a political scientist at the Johns Hopkins University. "They're going to have to work to get the black vote this time."

Cardin Ready To Face Steele (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday claimed the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat from Maryland, pitting himself against the Republican nominee -- Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- in a general election showdown that will hinge on racial issues and draw attention from across the country.

Just after 2 a.m. yesterday at the Wyndham Baltimore Hotel, Mr. Cardin delivered a victory speech aimed, in part, at shoring up support among black Democrats who may defect to Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

Mr. Cardin, who is white, appeared to have defeated Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in large part with help from party leaders such as House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr.

With 96 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Cardin had 229,835 votes, or 45 percent, and Mr. Mfume had 206,450 votes, or 40 percent. The Mfume campaign said the candidate would not contest the election results.

As Sly & the Family Stone's "Everyday People" blasted over the hotel's sound system, Mr. Cardin, 62, took the stage and invoked the tragedy of Hurricane Katrina, which critics of President Bush say demonstrated the Republican Party's indifference to poor, black communities.

"Katrina was not the disaster caused by nature. It was the disaster of government's failure to help our most vulnerable people," he said. "I am running for the United States Senate to change the priorities in Washington, to take on the moral challenges of our time and to never ever leave Americans behind."

Later in the day, Mr. Steele, 47, began a statewide bus tour in the mostly black and downtrodden West Baltimore neighborhood of Park Heights, which borders a more affluent Jewish community with the same name in Baltimore County.

"I am no stranger to this neighborhood," Mr. Steele said. "When I go to the United States Senate, I will represent both sides of Park Heights. ... You're going with me to Washington. You will have a seat in the halls of Congress. Your voice will be heard."

Mr. Cardin, who is Jewish, has represented the Park Heights area in the U.S. House for 20 years.

Mr. Steele also delivered a message of economic empowerment and the establishment of legacy wealth in poor communities, which has become a central plank in his campaign.

"If you are not about ownership, then you are not about communities like this," he said. Martin Luther "King made it very clear that we had to have a seat at the lunch counter. Our generation will be the generation that will own the diner. That's what it is about for us in neighborhoods like this."

Henry Wilkerson, a black barber in the neighborhood, said he would cross party lines to vote for Mr. Steele.

"I'm a Democrat, but if the right man says the right thing, I'll be a Republican," said Mr. Wilkerson, 55, who is also a pastor at a nearby Baptist church. "I believe he has moral standards, and I believe he has the spiritual standards that will govern is decision-making."

Old allegiances, however, die hard.

"He's a Republican. I don't mess with Republicans," a woman told her husband over the speaker of his cell phone as he stood in the crowd to see Mr. Steele.

Mr. Cardin is actively cultivating support among black voters, who make up as much as 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland.

He has made Baltimore City Council member Kenneth N. Harris Sr., a black Democrat, a central figure in his Senate campaign and has enlisted the support of black clergy in Baltimore and Prince George's County.

The Rev. Marvis May, pastor of the Macedonia Baptist Church in Baltimore and a strong Cardin supporter in the city's black faith community, said black voters would remain loyal to the Democratic Party and Mr. Cardin despite Mr. Steele's racial appeal.

"It's a done deal," he said. "This is a Democratic state, and we are tired of President Bush. We are tired of Republicans."

Still, Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Late last month, Mr. Steele had $3.1 million in his campaign war chest, compared with Mr. Cardin's $1.6 million. Those totals are likely to be eclipsed by the dollars that will pour into Maryland from the national fundraising wings of the Republican and Democratic parties.

Are Black Voters In Maryland Up For Grabs? (RC)

By Josh Kurtz And Emily Yehle

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

BALTIMORE — Right after declaring victory in Tuesday night's Republican Senate primary — in which he bested his nearest opponent by 84 points — Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele headed to the election-night celebration of Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson, a black Democrat. Then, he drove to the celebration of Johnson's challenger, former state Del. Rushern Baker, another black Democrat.

On Wednesday, the first day of the general-election fight he has been eagerly awaiting, Steele kicked off a statewide bus tour. His first stop: a barber shop in a heavily black West Baltimore neighborhood that ex-Rep. Kweisi Mfume (D-Md.) once represented in Congress.

Now that Mfume has lost to white Rep. Benjamin Cardin in Tuesday's Democratic Senate primary, Steele's strategy for victory is hardly subtle. Even before the primary, Steele began airing a statewide ad aimed at black voters — an ad that his campaign spokesman said is scheduled to run indefinitely.

"I think Michael Steele has a real ability to win over voters who don't usually vote Republican," said Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, a Baltimore native.

Several Republican operatives had been open about their desire to run against Mfume rather than Cardin this fall. Mfume, while a talented politician with a magnetic personality, has been unable to escape personal or political controversy throughout his career, and Republicans figured that Steele, a former seminarian, would be able to appeal to a slice of moderates as a safe alternative to Mfume, despite Maryland's Democratic tilt.

But with Cardin as their Senate nominee, the Democrats now have the "safe" candidate. Despite his liberal voting record, Cardin is a proven entity — a soft-spoken, scholarly Congressman with 40 years of public service under his belt who had the overwhelming majority of the state's Democratic establishment supporting him.

Cardin starts out as the favorite over Steele. So in a state that is so strongly Democratic, Steele's only path to victory may be doubling — or even tripling — the 10 percent to 12 percent of the black vote that Maryland Republicans generally attract in statewide elections.

At Mfume's primary night party at the Hippodrome Theater in downtown Baltimore, the potential of Steele's gambit was in abundant evidence. Several black supporters of Mfume's said they were going to vote for Steele in the general election.

"A lot of black professionals will vote for Michael Steele because the Democratic Party totally says to blacks, 'Vote for us, but don't sit at the head of the table,'" said Baltimore attorney Gary Stern.

In Maryland, the resentment among some black voters is particularly acute after the Democratic gubernatorial nominee in 2002, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, bypassed several potentially strong black officials when filling her lieutenant governor slot, choosing instead a white Republican.

Also on Tuesday, a black candidate for state attorney general lost to a white candidate in the Democratic primary by 12 points. Other than the appointed candidate for lieutenant governor, all of the Democratic nominees for statewide office in Maryland are white males.

However, some of Mfume's supporters saw the problem as more than just a racial question. Cardin represents the status quo at a time when voters are clamoring for change, said Walt Mallette, a business developer in Washington, D.C.

Party leaders are "backing [Sen. John] Kerry [D-Mass.] and Cardin instead of [Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard] Dean and Mfume," he said, referring to how establishment support lined up during the 2004 presidential primaries.

That lack of spine is driving black voters away from the party, Mallette said.

"Young black people who were raised as Democrats are increasingly voting as Republicans," he said. "They need a new start. Mfume gives them a new start."

But shortly before 2 a.m. Wednesday, Mfume was ready to call it quits. Although Cardin wasn't officially declared the winner until several hours later, Mfume signaled that he knew how the primary would end up and offered Cardin his support.

"Although I wanted to be Ben's Senator, he might just have to be mine, and he'll be a damn good one," he told the crowd.

Whether Mfume supporters follow his lead remains an open question.

"I'd have to do some really deep soul-searching," said Danielle Mitchell, a second-grade teacher.

And that's why Steele keeps working the black vote. "He's going to campaign aggressively and at unprecedented levels for African-American voters," said Doug Heye, Steele's campaign spokesman.

Cardin has a long record of support for civil rights, and most black Democratic officeholders are expected to join his camp quickly. In fact, just days before the primary, Cardin held an endorsement event in populous Prince George's County — Steele's home turf — featuring several black elected officials.

"Ben Cardin is a man of family and faith," said the highest-ranking Democrat there, Ulysses Currie, chairman of the state Senate budget committee. "He spends a lot of time in our community, understands our needs and has a record of getting results."

The event seemed as much about the general election to come as the primary Cardin had not yet won.

Muslim's Win In Minn. Seen As Step For Community (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Minnesota Democrat who is likely to become the first Muslim elected to Congress says he wants to "promote the idea that America needs friends around the world, not more enemies."

Keith Ellison, an African-American state legislator from Minneapolis, won Tuesday's Democratic primary to replace Rep. Martin Olav Sabo. The son of Norwegian immigrants is retiring after 28 years in the House of Representatives. Ellison beat three other Democrats, including Sabo's former chief of staff and ex-party chairman, Mike Erlandson.

Although Ellison will face Republican business consultant Alan Fine in November, his election is all but guaranteed, says University of Minnesota political scientist Larry Jacobs. In 2004, 71% of the district's voters backed Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry. Minnesota's most ethnically diverse district is home to veiled Somali women, Russian Jewish immigrants and Hmong refugees, belying the state's image as a homogeneous Scandinavian enclave.

Ellison's victory marks a turning point for American Muslims, according to community leaders such as Ali Khan of the American Muslim Council.

"It says, 'Look, you are part of America,' " says Khan, who notes that until recently the diverse community was "not very organized" or interested in electoral politics.

Estimates of the number of U.S. Muslims vary between 2 million and 6 million. The Council on American-Islamic Relations says about a third are black and another third are from South Asia. One in four are of Arab descent and the rest from Africa and elsewhere.

Ellison, 43, was raised Catholic in Detroit and converted to Islam as a 19-year-old student at Wayne State University before moving to Minnesota for law school.

Islam "makes a lot of sense to me. It works for me," Ellison said in a phone interview Wednesday.

A criminal defense lawyer, he called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and the impeachment of President Bush. Such stands and his passionate oratory recall Paul Wellstone, the Minnesota senator killed in a plane crash in 2002, says Jacobs, although he calls Ellison "pragmatic and someone who can work with others. He won't be what people expect."

Ellison says he never brought up his religion or his race — he would be Minnesota's first black member of Congress — during the campaign. Voters did, however, ask about his position, as a Muslim, on Israel, the separation of church and state, abortion rights and gay rights. He says he supports them all.

Ellison had a tougher time explaining revelations about late campaign-finance reports, unpaid parking tickets and a suspended driver's license. More controversial were his ties to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Ellison worked with his group as an organizer of 1995's Million Man March.

Ellison is "a uniquely polarizing figure the likes of which we've never seen in this state," Minnesota GOP spokesman Mark Drake says.

Jacobs says the Democrat ran an effective grass-roots effort of direct mail and door-knocking, but at times, "It had the smell of a campaign about to collapse."

Ellison, a married father of four, responded by visiting synagogues and apologizing for past statements. He said he never met Farrakhan and repudiated his own defense of the Muslim leader, who has been accused of anti-Semitism by the Anti-Defamation League.

"I take responsibility for the mistakes I made," Ellison says.

The Democrat's apology convinced a Minneapolis Jewish newspaper, which endorsed him.

Pollster John Zogby, a Lebanese-American, says Ellison's victory is a win for an eclectic group that ranges from Pakistani immigrants to native-born blacks.

"American Muslims are now a political constituency," he says, "not just simply a growing group."

Former Texas Gov. Ann Richards Dies At 73 (HC)

By R.G. Ratcliffe And Anne Marie Kilday

Houston Chronicle, September 14, 2006

AUSTIN — Ann Richards, who shed the role of homemaker to rise through Texas politics to become the state's 45th governor and a national celebrity, died today after a six-month battle with cancer. She was 73.

Richards was diagnosed with esophageal cancer in March.

Richards was the quintessential Texas woman, with a sassy homespun charm, sharp wit and tough pioneer spirit. With bright silver hair, a weathered face and an affinity for cobalt blue suits and pearls, Richards was instantly recognizable to national television audiences.

As a Democratic politician, Richards' 1990 race for governor against Republican cowboy oilman Clayton Williams became a battle of the sexes. Her victory symbolically broke down gender barriers for a generation of Texas women who were seeking professional careers.

Richards labeled her administration the "New Texas," appointing more Hispanics, blacks and women to state boards and commissions than any previous governor. She pushed for increases in public education funding and promoted business expansion in the state.

A recovering alcoholic, Richards also pressed lawmakers to increase funding for drug and alcohol abuse treatment programs.

Polls showed Richards was the most personally popular governor in 30 years. But a liberal image kept her job approval rating beneath 50 percent, and she lost her 1994 re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush, the future president.

Late in her term as governor, the Houston Chronicle asked Richards how she viewed her gubernatorial legacy.

"How about, 'She changed the economic future of Texas,'" Richards replied. "And that really beats what I feared my tombstone was going to say, and that was: 'She kept a really clean house.'"

Richards was born Dorothy Ann Willis in the front bedroom of a white frame house in what is now Lacy-Lakeview, a Waco suburb. Her father, Cecil Willis, was a pharmaceutical salesman. Her mother, Ona, was a homemaker.

After earning a bachelor's degree at Baylor University in 1954, Richards did additional course work at the University of Texas to earn a teaching certificate. For a year she taught social studies and history at Fulmore Junior High School in Austin.

Richards married her high school sweetheart, David Richards, while still at Baylor. They had four children: Cecile, Clark, Ellen and Dan. As David Richards praticed law in Dallas, Ann Richards was a full-time mother and homemaker and a part-time political volunteer.

"I was mostly involved with my babies. We did everything by Dr. Spock; if you did not have a Dr. Spock book, you could not raise a child," Richards said in her autobiography, Straight from the Heart.

The Richards family moved to Austin in 1969. Three years later, Ann Richards took her first big step toward becoming a politician, agreeing to help run a legislative campaign for Sarah Weddington.

Weddington was the 25-year-old lawyer who had won the Roe v. Wade case in the Supreme Court legalizing abortion. Weddington wanted to win a seat in the Texas House to push for laws giving women equal rights with men, such as giving a woman a right to credit in her own name and not her husband's.

Weddington won, and in her second term she hired Richards as her legislative director.

The political transformation began in 1975, when a group of Austin activists approached David Richards and asked him to run for county commissioner. When he declined, she decided to run for the seat, defeating an incumbent.

But while Richards' political career was blossoming as a Travis County commissioner, her personal life was deteriorating. Her marriage was failing as they grew apart, and she began drinking heavily in Austin's political bars after work every day.

On Sept. 27, 1980, her family and friends cornered her in the living room of a friend's house and told her she was an alcoholic who needed treatment. Richards received treatment at the St. Mary's Chemical Dependency Center in Minnesota.

Afterward, she became a lifetime advocate for people suffering from alcohol and susbstance abuse problems. She helped pass laws requiring insurance companies to pay for treatment and she convinced legislators to fund expanded substance abuse programs for state prison inmates.

While the alcoholism treatment saved Richards, she said in her autobiography, the change of lifestyle that went along with being sober finished her marriage. She and David Richards split in December 1980 and ultimately divorced in 1984.

She plunged into statewide politics in 1982 after discovering that state Treasurer Warren G. Harding was under investigation by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle for possible misuse of office.

Friends convinced Richards to challenge Harding in the Democratic primary, and she ended up in a runoff with him. But Harding was indicted on charges that he used state employees to send out political mail. He pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor and dropped out of the race, effectively giving Richards her first statewide victory.

As state treasurer, Richards was a little-noticed public official. She managed state investments and the sale of bonds and cash management notes. She was best known on the "rubber chicken" circuit, making humorous speechs to civic organizations, women's groups and Democratic clubs.

Her profile changed dramatically in 1988 when Democratic National Chairman Paul Kirk asked her to be the keynote speaker at the party's national convention that summer. Her speech was to draw differences between the parties and take aim at a fellow Texan: Vice President George Bush, the GOP nominee for president.

Richards thrilled her national audience with some of her feminist humor on the ability of women to equal men: "Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did. She just did it backwards and in high heels."

What became memorable, though, was a line she delivered to show Bush was out of touch with the economic and family issues that were important to poor and middle class Americans.

"Poor George, he can't help it — he was born with a silver foot in his mouth," Richards said.

Bush dismissed Richards' statement, accurately predicting he would carry Texas that fall.

"If you just go nasty, go ugly, that isn't an effective way to do business," Bush said.

That speech set the stage for Richards to run for governor in 1990. She defeated former Gov. Mark White in the primary and then Attorney General Jim Mattox in the runoff.

The runoff became nasty as Mattox accused Richards of illegally using cocaine and seeing treatment for a cocaine addiction. Richards declined to answer any questions about possible past drug use.

The general election race against Williams became a classic Texas political battle. She was the image of the modern Texas woman, while Williams projected the cowboy aura of the state's heritage.

Williams was a cowboy who had become a millionaire oilman and had expanded his empire into telecommunications and banking.

Richards played off his mistakes. Williams once compared bad weather to rape, saying there is nothing to be done about it, so "relax and enjoy it." He also refused to shake Richards' hand after she had criticized some of his business practices.

The state's male vote gave Williams the edge, but women voted overwhelmingly for Richards.

Richards became the first woman to win the Texas governor's office in her own right. Miriam "Ma" Ferguson had won the office in 1924 as a surrogate for her husband, former Gov. James Ferguson.

During her first year in office, Richards signed a $2.7 billion tax bill to balance the state's budget. The state also adopted the lottery under her.

Her most notable achievement was opening the doors of government to people other than Anglos and men. About 44 percent of her appointees were female; 20 percent Hispanic; and 14 percent black. Her two predecessors in office had given more than 77 percent of their appointments to Anglo men.

The biggest problem that faced Richards was overhauling the state's public school finance system under orders from the Texas Supreme Court.

Voters soundly defeated a proposed constitutional amendment she supported to redistribute wealth from rich school districts to poor ones. Opponents labeled it a "Robin Hood" system.

Richards then urged the Legislature to come up with just about any school finance plan that would save Texas — and her — the embarrassment of forced school closures. Lawmakers responded with a plan that gave wealthier districts five options for sharing their property wealth. That plan also became known as "Robin Hood."

During her tenure, Richards' popularity continued to expand to a national audience. She was featured in Vogue, Glamour, Cosmopolitan, Ladies Home Journal and The New York Times Magazine. Superstar photographer Annie Leibovitz took a portrait of her for Vanity Fair. Richards traded one-liners with late-night talk show hosts Jay Leno and David Letterman.

Richards' personal charm probably played best in the area of economic development. She once described herself as a "two-headed cow," a curiosity that corporate leaders allow through the door just so they can see her.

She could brag about getting General Motors to keep its Arlington plant open, as the company was partly motivated by a package of state incentives. She persuaded Southwestern Bell to move its corporate headquarters from St. Louis to San Antonio. She convinced computer giant Apple to consolidate its customer service operations in Williamson County.

Richards went into her 1994 re-election campaign against the younger Bush with the highest personal popularity ratings of any governor in 30 years, but her job approval ratings rarely topped 45 percent in public opinion polls.

"The polls show the people of Texas want to see Ann Richards on Leno, not in the Governor's Mansion," one of her campaign insiders lamented at the time.

Richards' frustration erupted at one point when she questioned Bush's experience to serve as Texas governor and his criticism of her record. She called him "some jerk who's running for public office."

Bush studiously avoided engaging Richards in a personality contest. Focused on issues and aided by a national tide toward Republicans, Bush defeated Richards.

After leaving office, Richards became a client recruiter and lobbyist from the firms of Verner, Liipfert, Bernhard, McPherson and Hand of Washington, D.C., and then later Public Strategies of Austin. She also was a frequent guest on CNN talk shows, particularly Larry King Live.

In her farewell news conference as governor, Richards said she was ready to move to the next phase of her life. The homemaker-turned-politician wanted to earn the money that would make her secure in retirement.

"Life is like a layer cake," Richards said. "You put one layer on top of the other, and whether you frost it or not is up to you. I'm looking forward now to a little frosting."

In addition to politics, Richards loved her family, Lady Longhorns basketball, and attending the movies. Every week, she would brief reporters on the latest movie she had seen.

Evan Smith, the editor of Texas Monthly magazine, had become close friends with Richards through her love of the movies. Smith is the co-founder of the Texas Film Hall of Fame, and Richards emceed four of the five ceremonies sponsored by that group.

``As a personality, if you think about the nature of politics today, they don't make them like Ann Richards," Smith said. ``Ann Richards was one of the truly funniest people God ever put on this earth."

``Ann was obligated, chemically and biologically, to say what was on her mind, even if the truth was uncomfortable. Ann's honesty and candor is one of the great things about her that will be missed," Smith said.

``God bless her, there were times when Ann Richards was a divider, not a uniter," Smith said. ``And God bless her for that.''

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) -- Former Gov. Ann Richards, the witty and flamboyant Democrat who went from homemaker to national political celebrity, died Wednesday night after a battle with cancer, a family spokeswoman said. She was 73.

She died at home surrounded by her family, the spokeswoman said. Richards was found to have esophageal cancer in March and underwent chemotherapy treatments.

The silver-haired, silver-tongued Richards said she entered politics to help others -- especially women and minorities who were often ignored by Texas' male-dominated establishment.

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone,'" Richards said shortly before leaving office in January 1995.

She was governor for one term, losing her re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush.

Her four adult children spent Wednesday with her, said family spokeswoman Cathy Bonner, a longtime family friend.

"They're a strong group of people but they're broken-hearted, of course," Bonner said.

Her family said as governor she was most proud of two actions that probably cost her re-election. She vetoed legislation that would allow people to carry concealed handguns, automatic weapons and "cop-killer bullets." She also vetoed a bill that would have allowed the destruction of the environment over the Edwards Aquifer.

She grabbed the national spotlight with her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic National Convention when she was the Texas state treasurer. Richards won cheers from delegates when she reminded them that Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did, "only backwards and in high heels."

Richards sealed her partisan reputation with a blast at George H. Bush, a fellow Texan who was vice president at the time: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

Four years later, she was chairwoman of the Democratic convention that nominated Bill Clinton for president.

Richards rose to the governorship with a come-from-behind victory over millionaire cowboy Clayton Williams in 1990. She cracked a half-century male grip on the governor's mansion and celebrated by holding up a T-shirt that showed the state Capitol and read: "A woman's place is in the dome."

In four years as governor, Richards championed what she called the "New Texas," appointing more women and more minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors.

She appointed the first black University of Texas regent; the first crime victim to join the state Criminal Justice Board; the first disabled person to serve on the human services board; and the first teacher to lead the State Board of Education. Under Richards, the fabled Texas Rangers pinned stars on their first black and female officers.

She polished Texas' image, courted movie producers, championed the North American Free Trade Agreement, oversaw an expansion of the state prison system, and presided over rising student achievement scores and plunging dropout rates.

She took time out to celebrate her 60th birthday by earning her motorcycle driver's license.

Throughout her years in office, her personal popularity remained high. One poll put it at more than 60 percent the year she lost to Bush.

"I may have lost the race," Richards said after the defeat. "But I don't think I lost the good feelings that people have about me in this state. That's tremendously reassuring to me."

Richards went on to give speeches, work as a commentator for CNN and serve as a senior adviser in the New York office of Public Strategies Inc., an Austin-based consulting firm.

In her last 10 years, Richards worked for many social causes and helped develop the Ann Richards School for Young Women Leaders, scheduled to open in Austin in 2007.

Born in Lakeview, Texas, in 1933, Richards grew up near Waco, married civil rights lawyer David Richards and spent her early adulthood volunteering in campaigns and raising four children. She often said the hardest job she ever had was as a public school teacher at Fulmore Junior High School in Austin.

Richards served on the Travis County Commissioners Court in Austin for six years before jumping to a bigger arena in 1982. Her election as state treasurer made her the first woman elected statewide in nearly 50 years.

But politics took a toll. It helped break up her marriage. And public life forced her to be remarkably candid about her 1980 treatment for alcoholism.

"I had seen the very bottom of life," she once recalled. "I was so afraid I wouldn't be funny anymore. I just knew that I would lose my zaniness and my sense of humor. But I didn't. Recovery turned out to be a wonderful thing."

The 1990 election was rough. Her Democratic primary opponent, then-Attorney General Jim Mattox, accused her of using illegal drugs. Williams, an oilman, banker and rancher, spent millions of his own money on the race she narrowly won.

After her unsuccessful re-election campaign against Bush, Richards said she never missed being in public office.

Asked once what she might have done differently had she known she was going to be a one-term governor, Richards grinned.

"Oh, I would probably have raised more hell."

Survivors include her children, Cecile Richards, Daniel Richards, Clark Richards and Ellen Richards; their spouses; and eight grandchildren.

Ann Richards, Former Governor Of Texas, Dies (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy And Stuart Silverstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

Former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, a Democrat known for her freewheeling oratory who famously branded the first President George Bush as being "born with a silver foot in his mouth," died Wednesday night after a battle with cancer. She was 73.

A family representative said Richards died at home in Austin, Texas, surrounded by her family. She had been undergoing chemotherapy treatment after being diagnosed in March with cancer of the esophagus.

The silver-haired, charismatic Richards became a well-known national political figure with her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic National Convention. Richards, at the time Texas' state treasurer, took aim at the elder Bush, vice president at the time and the presumptive Republican candidate for president.

In the address that July night at the Omni in Atlanta, she zinged Bush, declaring: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

Bush went on to win the election that November. But Richards also advanced politically, winning a come-from-behind battle for governor two years later over Republican millionaire rancher Clayton Williams and serving two years after that as chairwoman of the Democratic convention that nominated Bill Clinton for the presidency.

Still, her political comeuppance came two years later when she ran for a second term and was defeated by George W. Bush, putting him on the political trajectory that took him to the White House.

Richards, instantly recognizable with her white hairdo, was still a political question mark to most of her listeners when she delivered her 1988 keynote address. But she went on to become one of the most prominent women politicians in the United States.

"I wanted Ann to be more than she was, but for her generation she was something special," said Garry Mauro, a longtime friend of Richards who ran and lost against Bush in the 1998 Texas gubernatorial campaign. "When a young girl heard Ann Richards speak, she became a believer in her own ability to succeed in America. She was the icon for women with any doubts about their own self-image."

Her victory in the 1990 governor's contest against Williams was one of the most brutal, dirty campaigns in Texas history.

Despite winning, she was bruised politically and was reluctant after that to pursue national office.

During her term as governor, Richards developed a reputation for fighting for expanded rights for women and minorities. She also worked to streamline government and reform the education system, while establishing the Texas state lottery as a means to fund the public schools.

She also sought to change the Texas prison system by creating inmate substance abuse programs and by releasing fewer violent criminals.

Richards always emphasized her country roots, often expressing criticism with the phrase "that dog won't hunt."

Richards grew up in Lakeview, a small town outside Waco in central Texas, the daughter of a pharmaceuticals salesman. In those days, she went by Dorothy Ann Willis and in her autobiography, "Straight From the Heart," she said her parents put more stock in personality than scholarship.

"I learned early on that people liked you if you told stories, if you made them laugh," she wrote.

Richards' family moved to Waco for her high school education and she had only to go across town to enroll in Baylor University, the nation's largest Southern Baptist institution, where she won a debating scholarship.

At 19, Richards married David Richards, whom she had dated since high school. For the next two decades, she was a wife and mother of four who taught high school to put her husband through law school.

In 1975, while the family was living in Austin, a group asked David Richards to run for county commissioner. Her husband wasn't interested, but Ann Richards was.

She won the election with ease in 1976 and remained in public office until she was defeated by Bush.

Richards' marriage of almost 30 years ended in divorce in 1984, prompted in part by her longtime struggle with alcoholism. She underwent a monthlong treatment at St. Mary's Hospital in Minneapolis and had remained sober afterward.

In 1982, Richards was drafted to run for state treasurer and won handily, becoming the first woman to hold a statewide office in Texas in 50 years. Her reelection four years later was even more resounding, which set the stage for the 1988 speech in Atlanta and her gubernatorial victory in 1990.

Survivors include her children, Cecile Richards, Daniel Richards, Clark Richards and Ellen Richards; their spouses; and eight grandchildren.

Overhauls Proposed In Benefits For Jobless (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The nation's unemployment insurance system, which has hardly changed since its inception in 1935, should be revamped to aid more workers displaced by a transforming economy, economists said this week as they released overhaul proposals.

Currently, because of tight state eligibility requirements and because a growing number of workers do not have long-term, full-time jobs, unemployment insurance is paid to just over a third of those who are laid off, government data show, and coverage is less likely among the lower-income workers who most need it.

"The nation's unemployment insurance program is seriously out of date, given the changes over the last 70 years in the U.S. labor market," said Lori G. Kletzer, an economist at the University of California, Santa Cruz. Dr. Kletzer and Howard Rosen of the Institute for International Economics in Washington are the authors of one of two proposals for revamping the system that were released on Tuesday by the Brookings Institution in Washington.

The system was intended to provide workers with half their former wages during temporary periods between jobs, though it seldom reaches that level today. In 2004, some 8.8 million workers who qualified received an average weekly benefit of $262, often for up to 26 weeks, though benefits varied by state. The costs, which totaled $41 billion that year, are paid by federal and state payroll taxes paid mainly by employers.

Benefits are seldom available to the self-employed, to those working intermittently or to many of the lowest-paid workers.

At the same time, Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen said, the nature of unemployment is changing. In the last six years, despite lower overall rates of unemployment, the average period of joblessness for laid-off workers was 16 weeks, compared with 12 weeks in the 1970's.

Because of globalization and changes in the economic structure, more workers are forced to change industries and a significant minority take jobs paying less than before, indicating a trend "from temporary layoff to permanent displacement," according to the paper by Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen.

They propose stronger federal guidelines to end the wide disparities in eligibility and benefit rules among the states and to extend coverage to a broader group of workers.

They call for a new system of personal accounts for self-employed workers, allowing them to contribute pretax money, with matching grants from the federal government up to $200 a year, to help cushion income drops or pay for job training and searches.

They also propose a wage insurance program to help offset declines in income for a period of years when workers switch to jobs paying less than they had been making. This would apply only to workers making $15 an hour or less.

To help pay some $13 billion in added costs for these programs, Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen suggest raising the federal unemployment tax, which for 22 years has been levied on only the first $7,000 of each worker's income. After tax credits are counted, employers now pay a maximum of $56 a year for each covered worker, the scholars said.

In the second paper, Jeffrey R. Kling, an economist at the Brookings Institution, proposed a more radical overhaul. Dr. Kling would scrap the existing unemployment insurance system and replace it with personal accounts and loans to help people through short-term joblessness and a large program of wage-loss insurance to help low- and moderate-income workers when they are forced to take new jobs at lower salaries.

By curbing government payments to those who experience only short-term joblessness, he said, this new plan could operate with the same total money as the current system but would provide more help to the neediest.

States Give Tax Breaks To College Savers (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Giving another boost to 529 college-savings plans, a growing number of states are allowing their residents to take state-tax deductions for contributions they make to other states' 529 plans.

Pennsylvania, Maine and Kansas have approved such tax breaks, and a handful of other states are considering similar measures. Previously, these states offered either no tax deduction or a deduction only if a resident contributed to the state's own 529 plan.

The states' move toward tax parity for all 529 contributions is likely to make it simpler and more appealing for residents to save for their children's college educations. A new law that makes permanent the 529s' federal tax benefits has also helped spark more interest in these plans.

The 529 plans — named for a section of the federal tax code — have gained popularity by allowing parents and grandparents to put away money for college and pay no federal tax on withdrawals if the money goes for tuition and books. In many cases, the money can be used for any college or university, not just a school in the state that sponsors the 529.

More than half of states provide deductions — generally ranging from $2,000 to $12,000 — on state income-tax returns for 529 contributions.

Over the past four years, 529 assets have more than quadrupled, to about $93 billion as of June 2006, compared with about $22 billion at the same time in 2002, according to the College Savings Plans Network, an organization of states that sponsor 529s.

In Kansas, Treasurer Lynn Jenkins says the move to expand the state-tax deduction for Kansans starting in 2007 to all 529 contributions, rather than just those to the in-state plan, means the "playing field is entirely level" for investors.

The change "may make our plan even better," Jenkins says. "It forces me to make sure that happens."

College-financing experts recommend that investors compare investment options and expenses — in addition to state tax benefits — before socking away money in any one 529 plan.

The trend isn't likely to catch on in every state. After all, states will see less tax revenue if they extend deductions to contributions to out-of-state 529 plans. Pennsylvania estimates a loss of $25 million a year in tax revenue from the state's 529 tax change, which took effect this year.

"There's no question that in any instance, a tax break is going to reduce revenue," says Pennsylvania Treasurer Robert Casey. Still, "I think that when you're providing an incentive to save for college now, it's an exchange many people think is a good strategy."

There may also be a downside for some investors. Should many residents of a state decide to bypass its 529 plan in favor of out-of-state plans, that state plan's investment management fees could rise to compensate for fewer assets in the plan, says Joseph Hurley, founder of Savingforcollege.com, a website that compares states' 529 plans.

Same Mission, New Look For Islamic Group (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

With too many Americans viewing their Muslim fellow citizens with suspicion because of the 9/11 attacks and other terrorist acts, the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a civil rights and advocacy group, decided to launch "a new brand identity and logo."

In a letter to the American Muslim community, CAIR board Chairman Parvez Ahmed said the group after 12 years of service is "reaffirming our core values and recommitting ourselves to three central aspects of CAIR's mission -- enhancing understanding of Islam, protecting civil liberties and empowering American Muslims." Those values include promoting pluralism for a better America, justice and dialogue.

The new logo, Ahmed wrote, "affirms that we are one human family, created by God into different nations and tribes so that we may come to know each other and not despise each other."

Ahmed said in an interview that the timing of the new branding effort was "not particularly interesting." But he said that "a handful of extremists are distorting the image of Islam."

"We needed to think of new ways of becoming more effective, a much better way of communicating how [we are] part of the American mainstream," Ahmed said. "It is important that they [other Americans] have a clear understanding of us."Coalition to Market America

Also in the Getting-to-Know-You-Better category: A coalition of high-powered business executives has formed the Discover America Partnership, a multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign designed to boost the number of visitors -- by 10 million a year -- to the United States.

Their aim is to help improve America's image abroad and bolster national security by introducing more people from other countries to us. "In the effort to win hearts and minds, we have a unique card to play," Jay Rasulo , chairman of Walt Disney Parks and Resorts, said in a statement. "That card is an invitation . . . to visit America, meet our people and experience our values."

Geoff Freeman , executive director of Discover America, said the campaign intends to educate lawmakers and other policymakers about the need to attract foreign visitors, and it will work to smooth out visa and airport policies that may discourage travel. But he said the group "by no means" wants to lessen security standards. "It makes good business sense. It makes good policy sense. There's no shame in it," Freeman said.

Among the coalition's leaders: Rasulo; Steven C. Anderson of the National Restaurant Association; August A. Busch III of Anheuser-Busch Companies Inc.; Roger Dow of the Travel Industry Association of America; Michael D. Gehrisch of Destination

Marketing Association International; J.W. Marriott of Marriott International Inc.; Joseph A. McInerney of the American Hotel & Lodging Association; Bud Nocera of Visit Florida; Howard C. Nusbaum of American Resort Development Association; Stevan D. Porter of the InterContinental Hotel Group; Andrew C. Taylor of Enterprise Rent-a-Car; and Jonathan M. Tisch of Loews Hotels Inc.

Also working on the campaign: Fleishman-Hillard , a PR company; Charles L. Merin of BKSH & Associates , who specializes in travel and tourism clients; and C. Stewart Verdery Jr. of Monument Policy Group LLC , who represents the Travel Industry Association and served as assistant secretary of homeland security.And Meridian Hill Makes Three

The Tiber Creek lobby shops have added a third: a new company named Meridian Hill Strategies Inc. , formed by Alix Burns , former vice president of TechNet. Burns was finance director for major states for Vice President Al Gore's presidential bid in 2000.

Tiber Creek was started in 2003 as a partnership of Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart Inc. and Ickes & Enright Group.

Jeffrey Peck said Burns was instrumental in developing ties between high-tech firms and House Democrats. Johnson Madigan, a bipartisan shop, has strong ties to the Senate; Harold Ickes and Janice Enright were Clinton White House aides.

"As we look to the November elections, she'll be essential," Peck said, referring to an expected increased presence of Democrats in the House, if not a Democratic takeover.Here and There

Moving about town . . . Christopher Staszak , a former assistant counsel to New York Gov. George E. Pataki (R), has joined the D.C. office of Bracewell & Giuliani .

Mary-Lacey Reuther , special assistant to Mark McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, has joined the GOP lobby shop of Barbour Griffith & Rogers as a vice president.

Former diplomat Terry Snell has joined King & Spalding as a senior international government relations adviser. Most recently, he was political adviser to the U.S. European Command, and earlier he was deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in Berlin. Also at the law firm: former senator Daniel R. Coats (R-Ind.), who was ambassador to Germany.

Democrats Vs. Wal-Mart (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

EVERGREEN PARK, Ill. -- This suburb, contiguous with Chicago's western edge, is 88 percent white. A large majority of the customers of the Wal-Mart that sits here, less than a block outside Chicago, are from the city, and more than 90 percent of the store's customers are African American.

One of whom, a woman pushing a shopping cart with a stoical 3-year-old along for the ride, has a chip on her shoulder about the size of this 141,000-square-foot Wal-Mart. She applied for a job when the store opened in January and was turned down because, she said, the person doing the hiring "had an attitude." So why is the woman shopping here anyway? She looks at the questioner as though he is dimwitted and directs his attention to the low prices of the DVDs on the rack next to her.

Sensibly, she compartmentalizes her moods and her money. Besides, she should not brood. She had lots of company in not being hired: More than 25,000 people applied for the 325 openings.

Which vexes liberals such as John Kerry. (He and his helpmeet last shopped at Wal-Mart when?) In 2004 he tested what has become one of the Democrats' 2006 themes: Wal-Mart is, he said, "disgraceful" and symbolic of "what's wrong with America." By now Democrats have succeeded, to their embarrassment (if they are susceptible to that), in making the basic numbers familiar:

The median household income of Wal-Mart shoppers is under $40,000. Wal-Mart, the most prodigious job-creator in the history of the private sector in this galaxy, has almost as many employees (1.3 million) as the U.S. military has uniformed personnel. A McKinsey company study concluded that Wal-Mart accounted for 13 percent of the nation's productivity gains in the second half of the 1990s, which probably made Wal-Mart about as important as the Federal Reserve in holding down inflation. By lowering consumer prices, Wal-Mart costs about 50 retail jobs among competitors for every 100 jobs Wal-Mart creates . Wal-

Mart and its effects save shoppers more than $200 billion a year, dwarfing such government programs as food stamps ($28.6 billion) and the earned-income tax credit ($34.6 billion).

People who buy their groceries from Wal-Mart -- it has one-fifth of the nation's grocery business -- save at least 17 percent. But because unions are strong in many grocery stores trying to compete with Wal-Mart, unions are yanking on the Democratic Party's leash, demanding laws to force Wal-Mart to pay wages and benefits higher than those that already are high enough to attract 77 times as many applicants than there were jobs at this store.

The big-hearted progressives on Chicago's City Council, evidently unconcerned that the city gets zero sales tax revenue from a half-billion dollars that Chicago residents spend in the 42 suburban Wal-Marts, have passed a bill that, by dictating wages and benefits, would keep Wal-Marts from locating in the city. Richard Daley, a bread-and-butter Democrat, used his first veto in 17 years as mayor to swat it away.

Liberals think their campaign against Wal-Mart is a way of introducing the subject of class into America's political argument, and they are more correct than they understand. Their campaign is liberalism as condescension. It is a philosophic repugnance toward markets, because consumer sovereignty results in the masses making messes. Liberals, aghast, see the choices Americans make with their dollars and their ballots and announce -- yes, announce -- that Americans are sorely in need of more supervision by . . . liberals.

Before they went on their bender of indignation about Wal-Mart (customers per week: 127 million), liberals had drummed McDonald's (customers per week: 175 million) out of civilized society because it is making us fat, or something. So, what next? Which preferences of ordinary Americans will liberals, in their role as national scolds, next disapprove? Baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet?

No. The current issue of the American Prospect, an impeccably progressive magazine, carries a full-page advertisement denouncing something responsible for "lies, deception, immorality, corruption, and widespread labor, human rights and environmental abuses" and for having brought "great hardship and despair to people and communities throughout the world."

What is this focus of evil in the modern world? North Korea? The Bush administration? Fox News Channel? No, it is Coca-Cola (number of servings to Americans of the company's products each week: 2.5 billion).

When liberals' presidential nominees consistently fail to carry Kansas, liberals do not rush to read a book titled "What's the Matter With Liberals' Nominees?" No, the book they turned into a bestseller is titled "What's the Matter With Kansas?" Notice a pattern here?

Extreme Tuberculosis (NYT)

Tuberculosis is outrunning us. In the last few months, 53 patients in the South African province of KwaZulu-Natal were found to have a form of the disease resistant to enough existing drugs that it is virtually incurable. All but one of those patients have died. Airborne and deadly, extensively drug-resistant TB is a nightmare disease. It has been found worldwide, including in the United States.

The accelerated pace of resistance comes from the world's neglect of tuberculosis, which is best cured with a cocktail of four drugs, with medicines taken daily for six to nine months. But most patients who start this difficult regime fail to complete it, leading to resistance. Of the 9.5 million new TB cases globally every year, about 425,000 of them are resistant to the standard medicines.

While a course of these drugs costs as little as $11, the medicines needed to cure resistant TB can cost up to a thousand times as much, can have harmful side effects, and must be taken for as much as two years. The really bad news, however, is that even these backup drugs are starting to fail, as they have in KwaZulu-Natal. Globally, about 6 percent of resistant TB cases are also resistant to second-line drugs — 15 percent in the former Soviet Union.

The development of antibiotics had allowed wealthy nations to dismiss TB as a disease of the past. But H.I.V. and AIDS have changed that calculus. In Africa, active TB cases are rising by 4 percent a year, largely because H.I.V. activates latent TB infection. TB is the leading cause of AIDS-related deaths. Every patient tested in the KwaZulu-Natal study was H.I.V.-positive — and more than a quarter of those who died were taking antiretroviral therapy.

African health officials gathered in South Africa last week to discuss extreme tuberculosis, but they are hobbled by the world's indifference. It is crucial, for example, to find out quickly where else extremely resistant TB lurks. But surveillance in Africa is poor, there have been no new diagnostic tests invented in the past 50 years, and the tests in use can take months. Efforts to make sure patients complete their treatment reach less than a third of TB victims. New drugs are needed to replace current ones, which are all at least 40 years old. But TB drug research had dried up until a few years ago.

A group called the Global Alliance for TB Drug Development has six compounds in the pipeline, but a treatment for extremely resistant TB is not likely before 2012. Money for clinical trials would speed things. But donors have always slighted tuberculosis. According to a new report by Results International, an advocacy group, the World Bank spent only $3.5 million directly on TB in Africa in 2005. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation are big donors, but much more is needed. Stinginess created this problem. Generosity is needed to fix it.

Bush, Roh To Meet Amid Tension Over North Korea (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and President Bush will try to downplay the strains between their countries over how to deal with the North Korean nuclear standoff when they meet Thursday at the White House.

The White House is pushing a hard line in trying to get the strident North Korean government to return to six-party talks designed to halt its nuclear program. South Korea, which has sought to engage North Korea since 1998, is seeking a softer diplomatic approach toward its reclusive communist neighbor.

The United Nations Security Council has approved a resolution condemning North Korea for conducting ballistic missile tests in July that bans any deals with the Pyongyang government that might help its arms trade. The Bush administration wants that policy applied firmly, while South Korea is wary of being too confrontational.

To complicate Thursday's meeting further, it comes amid reports that North Korea is preparing for an underground nuclear test, which some U.S. intelligence officials think may come before the end of the year.

"The expectations of a significant breakthrough between the U.S. and ROK (Republic of Korea) are not there," said Michael Green, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right research center. He was Bush's senior adviser on Asia until last December. "In general, the South Koreans would like the U.S. to be more accommodating to the North."

North Korea walked away last November from talks with the United States, Japan, China, Russia and the European Union, partially citing American restrictions imposed on a Macau-based bank accused of laundering money, counterfeiting and other illicit activities for Pyongyang.

Worried that the restrictions could prompt North Korean President Kim Jong Il to take desperate measures, South Korean officials would like the Bush administration to talk to the North Koreans about the counterfeiting issue as a prelude to resuming the six-party talks, according to Donald G. Gross, a State Department adviser during the Clinton administration.

Not wanting to be seen as rewarding bad behavior, White House officials said Wednesday that they had no intention of lifting the restrictions.

"Look, the United States has worked with its allies and made clear to the North Koreans that they have obligations," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We have said, `You need to get back to the table.' There are incentives awaiting the government if it behaves well. That remains the proper approach, and it also remains a proper approach to say to those in the neighborhood, `You're closest; you have the most influence. You need to step up as well.'"

That was a veiled reference to China primarily.

Bush and Roh are also likely to touch on a proposal, controversial in South Korea, whereby Seoul would take over wartime command of its troops from the United States. It surrendered command of its troops to U.S.-led U.N. forces during the Korean War. It regained peacetime control of its troops in 1994.

Roh has pushed for the move, saying the time has come for South Korea to defend itself. But his nation's political conservatives, veterans and Christian activists oppose the proposal, saying it would erode American-South Korean relations and weaken the country's defense capabilities as tensions with North Korea escalate.

Roh calls for transferring military authority by 2012. U.S. officials said the handoff could be done by 2009, a counterproposal that some analysts construed as another sign of strain between Washington and Seoul.

Gross and other Asia analysts predict that Bush and Roh will attempt to gloss over their differences. For example, American and South Korean officials agreed not to issue a joint statement after Thursday's meeting. Such statements are common practice after two leaders meet to discuss a wide range of issues.

White House officials said a joint statement would be redundant because Bush and Roh issued one that covered the North Korea nuclear issue after they met in South Korea last November during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperative forum.

"A lack of a joint statement shows they want to work around hard issues and focus on areas of agreement," Gross said. "If they had a joint statement, they'd have to talk about North Korea."

U.S. To Roll Out Tepid Welcome For President Of South Korea (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — As President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea prepares to visit President Bush on Thursday morning, the two men have rarely been further apart on the central issue that long ago turned their relationship so frosty.

Mr. Bush is determined to squeeze North Korea with every financial sanction possible until it gives up its nuclear capacity and other illicit activities, or, some believe, until it collapses. Mr. Roh insists the only course is to coax the country out of its isolation.

In the weeks leading to the visit here, Mr. Bush's aides have been using a new United Nations Security Council resolution, passed after North Korea's missile tests in July, to prepare a list of banks it can press to cut ties with North Korea.

Mr. Roh has been playing down the missile launching as a meaningless, attention-grabbing temper tantrum by the North Koreans, and he has resumed South Korean aid and investment to the country, in hopes of preventing what his country fears would turn into collapse or confrontation.

In past meetings, Mr. Bush has done his best to paper over the differences. But his aides acknowledge that the gap has grown so much in recent months — "as wide as the Sea of Japan" one senior official said Wednesday — that it will be almost impossible to hide.

Mr. Roh will receive treatment that contrasts sharply with the warm embrace extended in June to Japan's prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. Mr. Koizumi got long meetings, a glittering dinner and a trip to Graceland; Mr. Roh, leader of the other major United States ally in Asia, is getting an hour in the Oval Office and a quick lunch.

It is a symbol of the enormous strains in the alliance, strains so great that Mitchell B. Reiss, the director of policy planning at the State Department during part of Mr. Bush's first term, wrote in an op-ed column in The Los Angeles Times on Wednesday that the two leaders "should agree to disagree on North Korea and move onward.''

Asked how they could avoid the security issue that has been the cement of their alliance since 1950, Mr. Reiss, now a vice provost at the College of William and Mary, said in an interview, "They don't have a choice, because you can't let it erode the foundations of the alliance."

Mr. Bush has a polite but distant relationship with Mr. Roh, whom current and former White House aides say Mr. Bush believes is wedded to a doomed policy of appeasement toward a country that runs prison camps and regularly threatens its neighbors by expanding both its nuclear capacity and the range of its missiles.

The missile defense system that the administration has deployed in rudimentary form in Alaska and aboard ships is geared toward deterring a North Korean attack, though White House officials say their bigger fear is that the country, perpetually broke, might sell a weapon to a terrorist group.

Mr. Roh, however, appears to view Mr. Bush's approach as a dangerous failure, more likely to prompt North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, to lash out than disarm. Ahead of this trip, South Korean officials said in interviews that they believed Mr. Bush's policies prompted Mr. Kim to produce the fuel for six or eight new nuclear weapons; American officials say North Korea would have done so anyway.

Speaking on Wednesday at the United States Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Roh said he was “quite aware” of concerns about the state of American-South Korean relations.

Mr. Roh authorized 3,000 troops for Iraq. But he was widely criticized for the decision at home, where polls show that the country is almost as distrustful of Washington as it is worried about the North Koreans.

What further complicates Thursday’s meetings, however, is growing speculation that North Korea may be preparing for another test: this time, an underground nuclear test, which it has never before conducted.

“For the North Koreans, it would be the next logical step in managed escalation,” said Richard L. Armitage, the former deputy secretary of state. “The irony of the situation is that the farther away you are from the peril, the more concerned you are about it.”

Roh Says U.S.-S.Korea Alliance Changing (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 13, 2006

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said Wednesday that while his country's five-decade alliance with the United States is changing, Seoul will continue to support the U.S.-led fight against terrorism.

The South Korea-U.S. "alliance will in part change according to the times," Roh said through an interpreter. "But the very fundamental basis of this alliance will not change."

Roh noted he will meet with President Bush Thursday to discuss the state of the alliance and ways to settle a tense nuclear standoff with North Korea.

Both Roh and Bush want the North to return to stalled negotiations aimed at persuading Pyongyang to scrap its self-proclaimed nuclear bomb production program. But bickering has flared occasionally on just how to achieve that.

Roh told business leaders at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that he was "quite aware that in Korea and the United States, we have many people who are quite concerned about the state" of the U.S.-South Korea relationship.

But "in all areas where the United States has been fighting to establish order and freedom, Korea has always been at the United States' side," he said.

South Korea deployed nearly 3,600 troops in Iraq in 2004, making it the second-largest U.S. coalition partner after Britain. It plans to withdraw about 1,000 of its 3,200-member contingent by the end of the year.

Roh met Wednesday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, with both leaders underlining that U.S.-South Korean cooperation was needed to resume stalled nuclear disarmament talks, according to South Korean officials. Roh was scheduled later Wednesday to visit the Korean War Memorial and to meet with U.S. lawmakers.

How the two allies handle the North Korean nuclear crisis matters because some believe mixed messages from Washington and Seoul have allowed the reclusive North to boost its nuclear arsenal while falling into deeper isolation.

Efforts to restart the disarmament talks have gained greater urgency in recent weeks as leaders worry about a potential North Korean nuclear weapons test, and after the North decided in July to test launch seven missiles. But so far, no resumption of the negotiations by the Koreas, the United States, Russia, Japan and China is in sight.

"The most important thing is that they can get along, and project that to the world," Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow of foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution, said in looking ahead to Roh's meeting with Bush.

"They just totally see the world differently," O'Hanlon said, calling the Roh-Bush relationship perhaps "the single rockiest" of Bush's tenure and "probably the one with the greatest consequences."

Roh's time in Washington will be a low-key affair, in marked contrast to a June trip by the leader of another major U.S. ally in Asia, Japan. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi spoke publicly of his "heart-to-heart" friendship with Bush during that visit, and Bush treated Koizumi to a rare presidential tour of the home of the prime minister's musical hero, Elvis Presley, in Memphis, Tennessee.

During their meeting, Roh and Bush will discuss an ambitious U.S.-South Korean free trade proposal and Seoul's desire to retake wartime command of its troops from the United States. The focus, however, will be on North Korea.

Bush favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside of the six-nation talks, which Pyongyang has boycotted since November. Roh has tried to engage Kim Jong Il's communist government.

"North Korean policy has been foundering, in part because North Korea sees the huge gap between Seoul and Washington and drives right through it," O'Hanlon said.

Separately, U.S. lawmakers were expected to consider on Wednesday a North Korean nonproliferation measure and a resolution asking Japan to accept responsibility for the sexual exploitation of women in Korea and other Asian countries during World War II.

Michael Green, Bush's senior adviser on Asia until December, said that Roh and Bush have a good working relationship, but he noted that there will be intense pressure on Roh from some in Seoul to emphasize differences with Washington about North Korea.

In the past, Roh has lobbied Bush to change the tone of U.S. policy on North Korea, an attempt to cater to South Koreans who favor expanding ties with the North, said Green, now an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Seoul Backs Censure Of North (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon yesterday said Seoul strongly supports the United Nations' condemnation of North Korea for its recent missile tests, and denied that South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun was trying to play down the missile tests when he described them recently as tests carried out by the communist North for political, not military effect.

"I do not know if the United States and others have fully made up their positions, but the South Korea government will faithfully implement the U.N. Security Council resolution [1695]. We fully supported it," Mr. Ban said.

Mr. Ban spoke with reporters from The Washington Times on the eve of an Oval Office summit today between President Bush and Mr. Roh.

Mr. Ban acknowledged there was a "perception gap" between the two allies on North Korea and other issues, a gap often exaggerated by South Korea's domestic press.

He said the alliance remained fundamentally healthy and that public opinion in South Korea toward the United States had improved in recent years.

On other issues, the South Korean offered the following thoughts:

•The South Korean government is "firmly committed" to a new bilateral free-trade agreement with the United States. He said Seoul hoped to have a deal by spring, despite strong opposition in South Korea from farmers and other groups.

•He said Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh would not nail down at today's meeting an accord to transfer operational control of South Korean forces in wartime. Details of such an accord would be left to military officials meeting next month.

But he said South Korea should assume responsibility as a sovereign country.

"When you are making fundamental changes, it's better that they be done as soon as possible and not to leave a long period of uncertainty," he said.

Mr. Roh, who last met Mr. Bush 10 months ago on the sidelines of a summit of Asia-Pacific leaders, will hold a one-hour Oval Office meeting and have an hourlong working lunch with Mr. Bush today. He met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday and will also visit San Francisco before returning home.

The short, low-key summit is in sharp contrast to the warm welcome Mr. Bush recently extended to Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, one of the U.S. administration's closest allies in the region.

That visit included a trip by the two leaders to Memphis, Tenn., to tour Graceland, home of Mr. Junichiro's musical idol, Elvis Presley.

U.S. and South Korean officials have dismissed the idea of fundamental problems with the alliance, despite clear tactical differences in recent months over how to deal with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0062957

But Mr. Roh, in a speech yesterday to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, acknowledged there was considerable talk in both capitals about strains in the alliance forged in the early days of the Cold War.

"I am quite aware that in Korea and the United States, we have many people who are quite concerned" about the state of bilateral ties, Mr. Roh said, speaking through an interpreter.

But "in all areas where the United States has been fighting to establish order and freedom, Korea has always been at the United States' side," he added.

Among the delicate issues on the bilateral agenda: how tough a line to take with North Korea; a proposed U.S.-South Korea free-trade agreement; and Seoul's efforts to reclaim operational control of its military forces in wartime from U.S. command.

Mr. Ban, in an interview with South Korean journalists last month, conceded there were "a number of perception gaps" between Seoul and Washington.

"The upcoming summit is important," he said then. "Once a perception is formed, it is difficult to remove it."

Mr. Roh's government, beset by scandals and worries over North Korea policy, has hit historic lows in recent South Korean polls.

The South Korean president's five-year term ends in December 2007, but Mr. Ban, minister of foreign affairs and trade since January 2004, may be in line to move to a bigger stage.

The 62-year-old career diplomat and government minister announced in February his candidacy to succeed U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, whose term ends Dec. 31. Mr. Ban topped an unofficial Security Council straw poll held in July.

Just Say No (To Roh) (WSJ)

By Jin Ha Hwang

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

North Korea is no longer a threat to South Korea. The wartime operational control (OP-CON) of 680,000 Korean troops will be transferred back to South Korea by 2009, and the U.S.-Republic of Korea Combined Forces Command (CFC) will be consequently dismantled.

At least that is what the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea think will happen in the next three years. But they would be making a grave mistake.

It may seem natural for a sovereign nation like South Korea to exercise wartime control over its military. It is also natural, however, for a sovereign nation to work with other countries to increase its ability for deterrence against an unpredictable and ever-present adversary, especially when other countries share common goals. Such is the rationale behind the 1978 establishment of the CFC, and it has served most successfully over the years in deterring military aggression by North Korea. In its inception, the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea, under an understanding of mutual benefit and operational efficiency, agreed to delegate power to the commander of the CFC to exercise wartime control.

Given its history and prime importance to the survival of South Korea, not to mention the benefits of peace in Northeast Asia, both Koreans and Americans must be aware of what risks the transfer of wartime OP-CON would bring to the U.S.-South Korea combined defense posture, and whether this would spell further uncertainty for Northeast Asia's future. That the current uproar in South Korean society over this issue was fuelled by a few pro-North Korean politicians makes the issue doubly concerning.

While certain leaders wish to make this issue a national priority, the Korean people themselves have not called for the transfer of wartime operational control, nor do most desire dismantlement of the robust and effective U.S.-ROK Combined Forces Command. We must also find out what the Korean and U.S. military field commanders think about the issue.

Transfer of the wartime OP-CON, and the consequent dismantlement of the CFC, is a dangerous move that would not only increase chances of instability, but could may well benefit North Korea in the long run. Here's why:

• First, the security situation on the Korean peninsula is more fragile than ever. It was only March of this year when the commanding general of the U.S. Forces Korea, Gen. Burwell B. Bell, testified at the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee that "North Korea poses a variety of threats to regional and global stability." His testimony tells us that we need a strong alliance with a well-coordinated combined defense posture, and most Koreans, military or civilian, agree. Furthermore, North Korea is still trying to develop ICBM missiles and nuclear weapons.

• Second, a transfer might encourage North Korea to step up its rogue tactics. For the past half-century, North Korean leaders have persistently called for the withdrawal of American troops and dismantlement of the Combined Forces Command. Pyongyang has also continuously insisted that it would not discuss any military issues with a Seoul that does not even have wartime control over its military. The North's regime would undoubtedly see the transfer as a victory, and use it to strengthen their otherwise dissipating domestic legitimacy, perhaps even emboldening them to make further demands.

• Third, the concept of "independent operation" is no longer applicable for 21st-century wars. All the militaries of the world are cooperating and delegating responsibilities and commands to one other. This is seen clearly in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Operations of the NATO Allied Command are controlled by the commander of the U.S.-European Command. The U.S. and Japan have two separate commands, but this is because Japan's Constitution prohibits its Self-Defense Forces from being a part of any combined war operations. The Korean peninsula is the most fortified and politically complex region in the world, and an alliance with two separate military commands would lose cohesion during a major crisis.

Even as politics may have changed on the Korean peninsula, the security situation, in terms of the need for deterrence, has not changed one bit. North Korea's asymmetric threats still pose a grave danger to South Korea's security, as well as to countless U.S. economic and political interests. What about the possibility of a major crisis like the North's sudden collapse? Now is the time to keep the alliance intact and strengthen its combined defense capabilities.

The wartime OP-CON is a delegated power granted with consent of the commanders in chief of the two countries, for the purpose of fulfilling a nonpolitical but essential technical need. No national pride is lost because of it. Yet South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun wishes to politicize the issue by linking it with words such as "sovereignty" or "destiny." He is also playing a dangerous game of dangling the OP-CON transfer issue in front of North Korea to open up a channel for communication, since the dismantlement of the CFC was one of the three preconditions North Korea suggested to the South for any serious inter-Korean talks. The results of this year's local elections say most South Koreans do not support Mr. Roh's stance. So for whose interests is he pushing forward the transfer?

The U.S.-ROK Combined Forces Command is a mechanism designed to deter war, and also to fight and win a war should deterrence fail. It is a military structure that has functioned admirably for the benefit of both South Korea and the United States. Should we let it go because of domestic political interests? Who has the last laugh then?

Iran And European Union Postpone Talks (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

The European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's top nuclear negotiator on Wednesday abruptly postponed talks on easing tensions over the refusal of the Tehran regime to suspend uranium enrichment.

Cristina Gallach, spokeswoman for EU foreign policy official Javier Solana, did not say what prompted the decision to downgrade Thursday's meeting in Paris to the level of aides to Solana and Ali Larijani, Iran's senior nuclear negotiator.

But the decision of the two principals to stay away from what would have been their third meeting in a week suggested snags had developed from their direct contacts over the weekend.

The absence of Solana and Larijani was bound to dampen high expectations for the meeting. Their two sessions in Vienna had been described by both men as making progress toward solving the impasse over Tehran's defiance of a U.N. Security Council that it freeze enrichment.

Members of delegations familiar with the outcome of the talks Saturday and Sunday had said Iran suggested it was ready to consider suspending enrichment for up to two months.

But the officials also told The Associated Press that Iran continued to refuse pressure to stop enrichment before talks with a six-nation alliance meant to resolve the nuclear standoff, even though those nations conditioned starting negotiations on a freeze.

In Dakar Senegal, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his country's nuclear standoff with the West can be solved through dialogue, and called for unspecified "new conditions" in negotiations.

Ahmedinejad, on an hours-long stopover in Senegal en route to Cuba for a summit of the Nonaligned Movement, said the debate over Iranian nuclear enrichment could be solved peacefully.

"We're partisans of dialogue and negotiation. We believe that we can resolve our problems in a space of dialogue and justice — together," he told reporters.

Oil-rich Iran says it needs uranium enrichment to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that would generate electricity. Enrichment can also create material for atomic bombs, however, and the United States and other nations suspect that is Tehran's real goal.

Gallach, the EU spokeswoman, said the results of the meeting Thursday would be reported to Iran's capital and EU headquarters before a decision on scheduling further talks between Solana and Larijani.

In a telephone call from the EU offices in Brussels, Belgium, Gallach said the two aides meeting Thursday — EU negotiator Robert Cooper and Javad Vaeidi, deputy head of Iran's powerful National Security Council — had also held talks in Vienna on Tuesday.

Different interpretations of what was achieved at the weekend talks were reflected earlier in the day.

In moderate language, Britain, France and Germany only alluded to the threat of Security Council sanctions if Iran continues to enrich uranium and called on the Tehran regime to negotiate the dispute with the international community.

The United States, in contrast, said it was time for the council "to back international diplomacy with sanctions."

The relatively soft tone of the European statement at a meeting of the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency appeared focused on keeping confrontation low a day ahead of what then was still thought to be a Solana-Larijani meeting.

Diplomats accredited to the IAEA meeting, who agreed to discuss the matter only if granted anonymity, said that while France and Britain favored a tougher approach, Germany wanted a more toned-down text.

The need for bargaining among the Europeans — and the sharper tone of the U.S. statement — reflected uncertainties about Iranian intentions after Tehran suggested during the talks Sunday that it was ready to consider a short-term enrichment freeze.

"We continue to extend an open hand to Iran," the European statement said. It added that if Iran met the demand on enrichment, "we will ask to suspend action in the Security Council."

The three said the Solana-Larijani meetings had "helped clarify some misunderstandings."

But the chief U.S. delegate, Gregory L. Schulte, accused Iran of "a history of deception, lack of transparency, provocative behavior and disregard for its international obligations."

"The time has come for the Security Council to back international diplomacy with international sanctions," he said.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will take up the sanctions issue with other diplomats when the U.N. General Assembly meets next week in New York.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — along with Germany have offered Iran economic and political rewards if it agrees to consider a long-term moratorium on enrichment and commits to an enrichment freeze before talks to discuss details of their package.

Reflecting differences over how to deal with Tehran, they gave up an attempt to jointly criticize Iran's defiance Tuesday, after China and Russia refused to endorse U.S.-backed tough language, diplomats said.

Those two countries have resisted U.S.-led efforts to move to sanctions quickly, despite the passing of the Security Council's Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to freeze work on developing enrichment technology. They favor continued negotiations.

Foreign Ministers To Meet In New York On Iranian Sanctions: Rice (AFP)

AFP, September 14, 2006

Foreign ministers from the six major powers involved in the nuclear standoff with Iran will meet soon in New York to discuss imposing sanctions against Tehran, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice will travel to New York next week for talks on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly meeting and she said this would be the opportunity to press ahead with the sanctions if Iran continues to reject demands it freeze its suspected nuclear weapons program.

"There will be a meeting in New York of the ministers of the P5-plus-1," she said, referring to the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, plus Germany -- the coalition that has led efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program.

"I think that is a natural time to assess where we are and make some movement forward," she said following a meeting at the State Department with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution in July giving Iran a month to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing program or face sanctions.

Washington and some other governments believe the enrichment is aimed at producing material for nuclear weapons.

Iran insists the work is only to make fuel for electricity generation and has rejected the UN demand, although negotiations have continued between Iran and European Union officials acting as intermediaries in the dispute.

Rice said the way forward for Iran was clear, it can either suspend its uranium enrichment as a prelude to broader negotiations on improving economic and diplomatic ties with the international community, or face new UN Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions.

"We have always believed that the path was very clear: suspend and go down the path of negotiations or the international community will go down the path of the Security Council," she said.

"We are working on that track," she said, noting that senior diplomats of the P5-plus-1 governments have been holding discussions in recent days on specific sanctions measures.

"If the Iranians wish to suspend, and begin negotiations, obviously that would be a good thing," Rice said.

But she said that in light of a decision by Iran to cancel without explanation a planned meeting Thursday between Tehran's lead negotiator, Ari Larijani, and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana, "I don't really know that that option is still available".

Earlier Wednesday the State Department spokesman brushed aside new indications that key allies in the P5-plus-one group were wavering on the issue of imposing sanctions.

"We have full confidence" the six will back sanctions, spokesman Sean McCormack said.

He was speaking after the six failed to agree Tuesday on a joint statement on Iran at a meeting in Vienna because "the United States was too tough" and Russia and China did not want the word "sanctions" mentioned, a Western diplomat told AFP.

Livni, speaking alongside Rice, also referred to the danger of a split in the coalition confronting the Islamic government in Iran, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist.

"The United States shows its determination (for sanctions), but there's a need to get more states on board and there are some hesitations, unfortunately, from other parts of the world," she said after a closed door meeting with Rice.

"But our expectation is that the international community will show more determination on this issue on the understanding that this is not a threat to Israel but a threat to the entire free world."

U.N. Inspectors Dispute Iran Report By House Panel (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

U.N. inspectors investigating Iran's nuclear program angrily complained to the Bush administration and to a Republican congressman yesterday about a recent House committee report on Iran's capabilities, calling parts of the document "outrageous and dishonest" and offering evidence to refute its central claims.

Officials of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency said in a letter that the report contained some "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated statements." The letter, signed by a senior director at the agency, was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, which issued the report. A copy was hand-delivered to Gregory L. Schulte, the U.S. ambassador to the IAEA in Vienna.

The IAEA openly clashed with the Bush administration on pre-war assessments of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Relations all but collapsed when the agency revealed that the White House had based some allegations about an Iraqi nuclear program on forged documents.

After no such weapons were found in Iraq, the IAEA came under additional criticism for taking a cautious approach on Iran, which the White House says is trying to building nuclear weapons in secret. At one point, the administration orchestrated a campaign to remove the IAEA's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei. It failed, and he won the Nobel Peace Prize last year.

Yesterday's letter, a copy of which was provided to The Washington Post, was the first time the IAEA has publicly disputed U.S. allegations about its Iran investigation. The agency noted five major errors in the committee's 29-page report, which said Iran's nuclear capabilities are more advanced than either the IAEA or U.S. intelligence has shown.

Among the committee's assertions is that Iran is producing weapons-grade uranium at its facility in the town of Natanz. The IAEA called that "incorrect," noting that weapons-grade uranium is enriched to a level of 90 percent or more. Iran has enriched uranium to 3.5 percent under IAEA monitoring.

When the congressional report was released last month, Hoekstra said his intent was "to help increase the American public's understanding of Iran as a threat." Spokesman Jamal Ware said yesterday that Hoekstra will respond to the IAEA letter.

Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.), a committee members, said the report was "clearly not prepared in a manner that we can rely on." He agreed to send it to the full committee for review, but the Republicans decided to make it public before then, he said in an interview.

The report was never voted on or discussed by the full committee. Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the vice chairman, told Democratic colleagues in a private e-mail that the report "took a number of analytical shortcuts that present the Iran threat as more dire -- and the Intelligence Community's assessments as more certain -- than they are."

Privately, several intelligence officials said the committee report included at least a dozen claims that were either demonstrably wrong or impossible to substantiate. Hoekstra's office said the report was reviewed by the office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

Negroponte's spokesman, John Callahan, said in a statement that his office "reviewed the report and provided its response to the committee on July 24, '06." He did not say whether it had approved or challenged any of the claims about Iran's capabilities.

"This is like prewar Iraq all over again," said David Albright, a former nuclear inspector who is president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security. "You have an Iranian nuclear threat that is spun up, using bad information that's cherry-picked and a report that trashes the inspectors."

The committee report, written by a single Republican staffer with a hard-line position on Iran, chastised the CIA and other agencies for not providing evidence to back assertions that Iran is building nuclear weapons.

It concluded that the lack of intelligence made it impossible to support talks with Tehran. Democrats on the committee saw it as an attempt from within conservative Republican circles to undermine Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has agreed to talk with the Iranians under certain conditions.

The report's author, Fredrick Fleitz, is a onetime CIA officer and special assistant to John R. Bolton, the administration's former point man on Iran at the State Department. Bolton, who is now ambassador to the United Nations, had been highly influential during President Bush's first term in drawing up a tough policy that rejected talks with Tehran.

Among the allegations in Fleitz's Iran report is that ElBaradei removed a senior inspector from the Iran investigation because he raised "concerns about Iranian deception regarding its nuclear program." The agency said the inspector has not been removed.

A suggestion that ElBaradei had an "unstated" policy that prevented inspectors from telling the truth about Iran's program was particularly "outrageous and dishonest," according to the IAEA letter, which was signed by Vilmos Cserveny, the IAEA's director for external affairs and a former Hungarian ambassador.

Hoekstra's committee is working on a separate report about North Korea that is also being written principally by Fleitz. A draft of the report, provided to The Post, includes several assertions about North Korea's weapons program that the intelligence officials said they cannot substantiate, including one that Pyongyang is already enriching uranium.

The intelligence community believes North Korea is trying to acquire an enrichment capability but has no proof that an enrichment facility has been built, the officials said.

Political, Tech Hurdles Muddle Iran Oil Industry (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 14, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — Nobody worries about spilling a little as they fill 'er up here at the gas station on Vali Asr Avenue. Why should they? With gas costing less than 40 cents — that's right, cents — a gallon, leaving a little on the pavement is no big deal.

"It's very cheap," says Feridoun Mansouri, 52, with a laugh. The retired government worker tops off the tank of his silver sedan for 12,000 rials, or about $1.35.

Perhaps it's no surprise that a country sitting on 132 billion barrels of oil, the world's third-largest total, enjoys cheap gasoline. But the scene at this urban filling station suggests an abundance that couldn't be further removed from the grinding reality of Iran's oil industry.

From wellhead to gas pump, Iran's fabulously endowed petroleum industry confronts debilitating political and technological headwinds. Aging oil fields are starved of the most advanced technology because U.S. sanctions and pervasive political uncertainty limit investment by major oil companies. A shortage of domestic refining capacity means oil-rich Iran must import 40% of its gasoline. That dependence is one of the country's chief vulnerabilities as it faces the potential imposition of new sanctions over its controversial nuclear research program.

Yet, Iran remains defiant. Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei has threatened to halt his country's oil exports if the U.S. slaps sanctions on Iran because of its uranium enrichment efforts, which the Bush administration suspects are intended to produce nuclear weapons. Europe, Japan and China purchase two-thirds of Iran's exports. Though the U.S. buys no Iranian oil, a cutoff of Iranian shipments, or a broader clamp-down on oil tankers leaving the Persian Gulf, could be a catastrophe for the global economy.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has dismissed the danger, arguing that Iran depends almost entirely on oil export revenue to keep its economy and government afloat. And Wednesday in Vienna, Iran oil minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh reaffirmed Tehran's commitment to supplying global crude markets despite the standoff over its nuclear program, the Associated Press reported.

Others aren't so sanguine. "The Iranians would have no difficulty starving themselves to prove a point. They are terribly cognizant of image, face and respect," says Kent Moors, chief executive of Asida Group, a Pittsburgh-based oil industry consultant.

Domestic political jockeying has further complicated Iran's oil field management. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office one year ago vowing to root out a corrupt "oil mafia" he accused of stealing the nation's patrimony. But parliament balked at his first three oil minister nominees, regarding each as long on Islamic fervor and short on petroleum expertise.

Only after a three-month showdown did Ahmadinejad tap veteran oil man Vaziri-Hamaneh for the job. Few posts are more vital: Oil sales account for 85% of Iran's export earnings and more than 40% of government revenue.

Vaziri-Hamaneh and other Iranian oil officials responsible for holding the industry together are well regarded by global oil pros. Massaging ancient fields to squeeze out every last drop of oil is no easy task given that the best technology and expertise in the global industry remains off-limits.

But Ahmadinejad's continuing bid to exert political influence over the oil ministry is raising alarms in some industry circles. Amid continued infighting, the pace of activity has slowed. "The management is not so quick in their decisions. … It takes longer," says Hamid Zaheri, general manager of United Arab Emirates-based Crescent Petroleum's Tehran office.

The oil ministry denied a request to interview Vaziri-Hamaneh or other senior ministry officials.

Ahmadinejad also has stirred concern among oil professionals by awarding several billion dollars in oil and gas industry contracts to companies affiliated with Iran's Revolutionary Guards, the paramilitary force charged with safeguarding the Islamic revolution. More awards are likely.

The Revolutionary Guards' preferential access to state financing allows them to underbid private firms, says Bijan Khajehpour, chairman of Tehran-based Atieh Group, which advises foreign firms on the Iranian market.

The Revolutionary Guards, which number the president among its veterans, developed significant experience managing large infrastructure projects after the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. But Khajehpour says that the organization lacks specific oil business know-how, and they fear "that some technologically difficult projects would not be efficiently managed by such companies."

Still, it's not all bad news. Thanks to high oil prices, government coffers are bulging: Oil export revenue for the 12 months ending in March is expected to total $49.7 billion vs. $19.4 billion four years ago.

That enables Iran to afford an estimated $5.8 billion bill for imported gasoline this year, plus additional subsidies to keep prices low on food and fertilizer, according to the International Monetary Fund.

So far, rising revenue has outpaced mushrooming public expenditures. But government spending, which has doubled in three years, appears certain to continue rising under the populist Ahmadinejad.

For Iran, remaining sufficiently flush to continue affording the presidential spending spree may depend upon reaching unrealistically ambitious oil production goals. In its current five-year development plan, the government calls for boosting output from 4.1 million barrels a day to 5 million a day by 2009 and 7 million by 2024.

That won't be easy. A $2 billion project for a Japanese consortium to develop Iran's largest new discovery since the late 1960s, the massive Azadegan field, remains in limbo two years after the contract was signed. A Japanese consortium headed by Inpex has refused to start work on the field, saying that landmines left over from the Iran-Iraq war remain in the area.

Some Iranian officials, believing the Japanese actually are waiting for a resolution of the nuclear controversy, have set a deadline for action. If work doesn't begin by Friday, they say, they will solicit new bids, giving preference to domestic companies.

Output at Iran's aging fields, most of which are in the southwestern province of Khuzestan, is declining each year by about 300,000 barrels a day. And Iran is drilling few new exploration wells. "Iranian oil field output is dropping very seriously, not because the government is mismanaging them, but because the fields are old. The Iranians have to struggle to keep things where they are," says Fereidun Fesharaki, an Iranian oil official in the 1970s who is now an industry consultant.

To reverse the decline, Iran must attract an enormous surge of foreign investment. A critical need is outside cash and expertise to boost recovery rates — the percentage of a field's total reserves brought to the surface — from Iran's 24%-27% to the 35% global average, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Since 1995, U.S. sanctions have barred American oil companies from major investments in Iran. Additional sanctions enacted one year later were intended to extend the prohibition to bar foreign energy firms from helping Iran upgrade its oil and gas industry.

But amid howls from European allies, the United States granted waivers for foreign firms such as France's Total. Since 1997, foreign firms have plowed $15 billion into Iranian oil and gas projects.

That's a fraction of the $162 billion the International Energy Agency estimates Iran will need by 2030. Securing that much foreign capital is unlikely given unfavorable Iranian contract terms and political uncertainty surrounding Iran's controversial nuclear program.

"The issue is not that the industry came to a halt because of U.S. sanctions. It hasn't. The industry's potential with no sanctions is the issue. … The potential of Iran has not been met," says Narsi Ghorban, a prominent local energy expert and managing director of NarKangan Gas-to-Liquid International.

Iranian officials late last month acknowledged they likely will fall short of their production goals, perhaps increasing crude oil production to only 4.5 million barrels a day by 2010.

"We are not close to the 5 million (barrels per day) target. … More than 80% of the current total oil output is being provided from aged oil fields that need serious investment to increase production," said Hossein Nozari, managing director of National Iranian Oil, the BBC reported.

Barring an additional oil price spike, the failure to significantly increase production means Iran likely will face a tough choice between painful cuts in spending and allowing already high inflation to spike, says Djavad Salehi-Isfahani, an Iranian-born economist at Virginia Tech University.

"(Ahmadinejad) may be able to manage this year … but the chickens will come home to roost in the fall of '08," he says.

Meanwhile, back at the gas station, absent-minded motorists pay no attention as gas sloshes onto the pavement and trickles away into the gutter. For now, government efforts to reduce the bill for Iran's gasoline imports are limited to colorful billboards urging motorists to stop pumping before gas spills onto the pavement. (Pump nozzles here lack the automatic shut-off features common in the USA and Europe.)

Proposals to discourage consumption by trimming costly subsidies, thus raising pump prices, have foundered amid politicians' well-founded fears of popular unrest.

"If they lift the subsidy, the price will go higher (and) we will have higher inflation," says motorist Mansouri, turning grim. "The people will be very upset."

U.S., Israel Cool To Proposal For Palestinian Unity Government (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni reacted skeptically yesterday to a proposed unity Palestinian government that would include Hamas, saying the militant group must first renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist before restrictions on international aid can be lifted.

The Palestinian Authority has teetered near collapse since foreign governments largely cut off aid after the radical Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, unexpectedly won legislative elections in January. President Mahmoud Abbas, of the more moderate Fatah faction that lost the elections, this week reached a deal with Hamas to form a government that would empower him to negotiate with Israel -- in effect sidestepping Hamas's pledge to destroy the Jewish state. The Palestinian cabinet resigned yesterday to clear the way for a new unity government.

Some European officials have greeted the announcement as a possible breakthrough, potentially allowing for increased aid. The Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay civil salaries, which about 1 million Palestinians rely on for their livelihood.

But Rice and Livni, speaking to reporters after a meeting at the State Department, reiterated that the new government must meet conditions that were set by the United States and its allies after the Hamas victory.

"The outcome of the process is not clear," Rice said. "It goes without saying that it's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist. It goes without saying that it's hard to have a process for peace if you do not renounce violence."

Livni, who is also deputy prime minister, said that Israel is still committed to helping create a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel. "Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy," she said. But she added that it is up to the Palestinians "to meet these requirements fully and completely, and we believe that these requirements are not negotiable."

Abbas plans to meet President Bush on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly meeting next week, and Livni put the onus on Abbas to produce results. "Now is a moment in time in which Mahmoud Abbas has to decide whether the Palestinian Authority will operate on his terms or on the terrorists' terms," she said.

Livni's visit to Washington is the first by a senior Israeli official since a U.S.-brokered cease-fire helped end a month-long war between Israel and the radical Shiite group Hezbollah in southern Lebanon. The war was sparked by the capture of two Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah as Israel was battling militants in the Gaza Strip. The soldiers have not been released.

Despite complaints from other nations that Israel's response was disproportionate, the Bush administration firmly backed Israel in its fight with Hezbollah. Livni praised Rice's "determination not to come back to the dangerous status quo that we faced before the unprovoked attack on Israel." But she said it is unclear whether "the window of opportunity" could be seized to fully implement a U.N. resolution that calls for the disarmament of Hezbollah.

Assistant Secretary of State C. David Welch yesterday gave the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a relatively upbeat assessment of the situation in Lebanon, saying Hezbollah has difficulty obtaining new weapons and 4,000 foreign troops have begun peacekeeping missions. He noted that, for the first time in four decades, the Lebanese army has moved into southern Lebanon, which has long been firmly under the control of Hezbollah.

Earlier this week, however, the House International Relations Committee put a hold on tens of millions of dollars in announced assistance to Lebanon, arguing that the Lebanese government was not adhering to the "spirit of the relevant resolutions" of the U.N. Security Council. The move was initiated by Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, after he returned from Lebanon two weeks ago. Lantos said he told the Lebanese prime minister and defense minister that they can have their money as soon as they request that the international force be deployed on the Syrian border.

A State Department official said the administration will work to address the committee's concerns, adding that there is "shared interest in both the Congress and the administration to ensure that Lebanon's borders are secure."

Palestinian Cabinet Makes Room For Planned Unity Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 13 — Palestinian cabinet members submitted their resignations Wednesday night to allow for the creation of a national unity government that is expected to include a broad range of factions, Palestinian officials said.

The new government may not be in place for weeks, and it is not clear whether Western countries will be prepared to restore assistance that was halted when the militant Islamic movement Hamas came to power earlier this year.

Isolated by the West, starved of funding and squeezed by Israel, Hamas has not been able to govern and agreed this week to the unity government. Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said Wednesday night that cabinet ministers had offered their resignations to Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, of the rival Fatah faction, says he plans to dismiss the government formally in the coming days, though he intends to ask Mr. Haniya to form the new government.

“As I said in the beginning of the week, the government will be formed soon,” Mr. Abbas said.

While the departing cabinet was dominated by Hamas, which won the Palestinian elections in January, the unity government is expected to include members of Fatah. Smaller factions, independents and technocrats are also considered likely to be part of the new cabinet.

Mr. Abbas said Wednesday that he would send a delegation to the United Nations General Assembly next week in an effort to restart a dialogue with Israel.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel says that he is willing to meet with Mr. Abbas, but that the Palestinians must release a captured Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, before there can be progress.

Hamas says that it does not object to Mr. Abbas’s holding talks with Israel, but the group remains committed to its positions, including a refusal to recognize Israel.

Mr. Haniya said that he saw little point in any Palestinian politician meeting with Israeli officials. “We do not want to relive the experience of past negotiations,” he said. “Before talking about negotiations, we should ask ourselves: Do the Israelis recognize the rights of Palestinians? Will the refugees return? Will the prisoners be released? Will Israeli occupation and aggression end?”

Local Conflicts Cloud Palestinian Pact (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Tensions Boil Over in Teachers' Strike Even as Top Leaders Prepare to Share Power

TULKAREM, West Bank -- The two rival factions vying for control of the Palestinian government appear headed for a shotgun wedding that has the potential to breathe life back into a peace process.

But tensions being played out in towns and neighborhoods continue to smolder. Among the most high-profile is a teachers' strike, now in its second week, that has closed schools for hundreds of thousands of Palestinian children. How local conflicts such as these are resolved could determine whether the new unity government succeeds or fails, with major implications for Israel and the West.

The announcement this week by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas that his Fatah organization and rival Hamas had agreed to form a unity government was the first glimmer of progress in the Palestinian situation in months.

Hamas, which came to power in elections in January and whose leader Ismail Haniya is the Palestinian Authority prime minister, has agreed to share power with Fatah. The agreement doesn't explicitly say whether Hamas will meet the demands of Western powers that it renounce terrorism and recognize Israel, but its rapprochement with Fatah could mark the beginning of the end of the international boycott of financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority that was imposed after Hamas came to power in January and has contributed to seething tensions in the West Bank and Gaza.

Among those tensions, since Sept. 2, tens of thousands of teachers, whose salaries haven't been paid in months, have been on strike in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Many here say the strike was orchestrated by Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction to pressure Hamas to yield control of the government. That in turn may have ended crippling economic sanctions, which were imposed on the Palestinian government because the U.S. and others have designated Hamas a terrorist organization and which have kept it from receiving hundreds of millions of dollars of international aid and tens of millions in tax revenue withheld by Israel since Hamas swept the January elections.

The strike hasn't held easily. In Tulkarem, a city located on the western edge of the West Bank, one family said their children showed up for school during the first week of the strike and found masked gunmen chasing away teachers -- believed to be Hamas loyalists who showed up for work to break the strike. There have been other reports of similar confrontations across the territories over the past two weeks.

Ayman Khalil, a 42-year-old father of six, says that during the first week of classes in early September, he rushed to their neighborhood school to find people he knew to be Fatah militiamen firing their guns and intimidating teachers and children.

Mr. Khalil fears the violence at the schools foreshadows an inevitable showdown between Hamas and Fatah over how to divide the newly proclaimed unity government. "Their differences will be resolved by the gun," he says.

The strike continued yesterday, according to the Palestinian teachers union, and will continue until the workers receive their salaries.

But local residents say a small number of Hamas teachers are still showing up to teach. Mr. Khalil's 17-year-old daughter attends a public school where classes are being taught by Hamas loyalists. She says on some mornings, teachers use wire cutters to break into the classrooms that have been locked down by Fatah supporters.

Hamas also supports, through its charities, private schools that continue to operate during the strike and are taking in new students who are shut out from the public schools.

While these private schools are relatively small in number -- less than 10% of the roughly 3,000 schools in the West Bank and Gaza -- they have become a powerful symbol among Palestinians of Hamas's ability to provide services to its people even in dire economic conditions.

To be sure, Hamas's political leadership has been hurt by the arrest of several of its lawmakers by the Israeli military, and Fatah officials cite local polls showing many Palestinians growing frustrated with the Hamas government. But whether the militant Islamist group's long-term popularity has eroded is less clear.

Mr. Abbas hasn't yet detailed how the new coalition government's ministries will be divided between the factions, and taking control of the public-school system could be one way for Hamas to shore up its base of support and continue to exert its Islamic influence on Palestinian society. Hamas might insist on controlling the social institutions, such as schools and health care, while the ministries of finance and foreign affairs, which would interface with Israel and Western nations, could go to Fatah.

But leaving educational duties to Hamas poses the risk that under the religious group's guidance, the Palestinian population could become even more extreme, which is something Fatah, which wants to see a secular Palestinian society, could find hard to swallow. "Education will be one thing they will fight over," says Ron Pundak, director general of The Peres Center for Peace in Tel Aviv. "Education is where you influence the future. This is at the heart of what kind of Palestinian society that we will see for generations to come. But I don't think this will be a hurdle too high for the government."

At one private school in Tulkarem, which local residents say is supported by Hamas, the airy classrooms have fresh coats of paint and there is a swimming pool, and a computer lab wired to the Internet. At the entrance, there is a small carpeted room where the children come to pray. They are building a language lab to help the students learn English and beefing up the science lab. Children's poems and riddles adorn the walls. One small sign, decorated with hearts, reads: "If you want peace, be prepared for war."

DOJ_NMG_0062967

The headmaster says the school isn't run by Hamas or any other political party. "Our main target is quality education," said headmaster Munir Abu-Safia. He says funding for the school comes from tuition, and that about 20 additional students have joined the school during the strike at the public schools.

Security analysts say these private schools are more of a political gift to Hamas loyalists, rather than a breeding ground for suicide bombers and militants. For that, they say, Hamas relies on recruits drawn mostly from mosques and refugee camps.

The broad appeal of Hamas, and its schools, may lie less in its religious nature and more in the overall quality of its institutions. Many people say they want to send their children there because they say the academics are strong.

Even some Fatah loyalists, like Mr. Khalil, sent their children there. But then the school started raising tuition beyond what he could afford. He had to send his children to the public school, until it was shot up by the Fatah gunmen. He says the militia went too far. "Even the Israelis don't shoot in our school yards," he says.

U.S., Israel Warn Palestinian Factions (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 13, 2006

U.S. and Israeli diplomats warned on Wednesday that Palestinian leaders cannot assume their proposed unity government will gain international acceptance unless they renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni responded cautiously to Palestinian efforts to resolve an eight-month political standoff that has frozen foreign aid vital to the Palestinians.

"We will see what the outcome is here," Rice said, referring to efforts by the radical Hamas group and the moderate Fatah Party to form a coalition Palestinian government.

On Iran, Rice was skeptical about Tehran's suggestion it temporarily might suspend uranium enrichment as a condition for beginning talks about its nuclear program with the U.S. and Europe.

"They canceled the meeting for tomorrow and that should tell us something," Rice said. A session had been scheduled between the European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's top nuclear negotiator.

Rice said the U.N. General Assembly meeting next week would be a "natural time to assess where we are" regarding possible penalties if Iran does not suspend its nuclear activity.

Focusing on the Mideast, Rice said the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, "is someone with whom we can work and with whom we are working." But, she added, a Palestinian coalition must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements between Palestinians and the Israelis.

Those internally accepted principles are the "very essential elements" of a solution, Rice said. "It's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist."

Rice and Livni indicated their governments could continue to deal with Abbas as part of a coalition, but it is not clear whether that arrangement would prove more workable than the current impasse.

The U.S., Israel and the EU consider Hamas a terrorist organization; the U.S. and Israel have sworn off any dealings with Hamas.

Livni offered assurances that Israel wants to make headway on the stalled plan to make peace with an eventual independent Palestinian state, despite the disarray in the Palestinian territories since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January.

"Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy," she said.

Livni said it was Abbas' responsibility to make progress.

"Now is a moment in time in which Mahmoud Abbas has to decide whether the Palestinian Authority will operate on his terms or on the terrorists' terms," she said.

President Bush is expected to meet with Abbas when the leaders attend the U.N. session in New York.

Livni saw Bush and other administration officials Wednesday as attention in the Middle East shifted to Palestinian humanitarian and political crises following Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0062968

The president joined Livni's meeting with the White House national security adviser, Stephen Hadley. Bush reiterated his strong support for Israel's security and discussed with Livni "the threat posed by the Iranian and Syrian regimes," said Hadley's spokesman, Frederick Jones.

Livni is the most senior Israeli to visit Washington since a month of battles against Hezbollah ended in August with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire but without a decisive victory for Israel.

The U.S., Israel's closest ally, was its firmest defender during the cross-border war. U.S. allies and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan wanted a cease-fire much earlier in the fighting that killed 159 Israelis and at least 854 Lebanese, most of them civilians.

The Palestinian aid cutoff and Israel's refusal to transfer taxes it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority have to a severe financial crisis in Palestinian towns and left the government unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 workers for the past six months.

Palestinians agreed on Monday to form a national unity government to revive peace talks and end their international isolation.

The Palestinian Authority is effectively broke, with a monthly deficit in the tens of millions of dollars. Palestinians are the biggest per capita recipients of foreign aid in the world. In 2005, the first year the authority was not headed by Yasser Arafat, overseas donors contributed about $1 billion of the authority's approximately $1.9 billion budget.

U.S. direct aid was a small part of that — $70 million last year. Separately, the U.S. spent $225 million for humanitarian projects through the U.S. Agency for International Development last year, and gave $88 million for refugee assistance.

Gazans Go Unpaid, And Children Go Hungry (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

KHAN YUNIS, Gaza Strip, Sept. 12 — For the last week, Zidan Abu Reziq has been sleeping outside, next to his plantings on a small square of sand he expropriated.

The Abu Reziqs, like many of the large, destitute refugee families in this shrapneled, tumbledown slum, need to plant to eat. They took the land and planted it with vegetables, an investment of about $50, most of the money that the United Nations Relief and Works Agency gave them to buy school uniforms for the children.

Zidan's wife, Tamam, admits her 51-year-old husband sleeps with his plants because he needs to protect their investment in the lawless chaos of Gaza, where his own small theft of land, 20 square yards that belongs to the government, is dwarfed by the huge expropriations by gangs and families and militia groups that have taken over much of the best land left behind when the Israelis pulled out their settlers a year ago.

It is difficult to exaggerate the economic collapse of Gaza, with the Palestinian Authority cut off from funds by Israel, the United States and the European Union after Hamas won the legislative elections on Jan. 25.

Since then, the authority has paid most of its 73,000 employees here, nearly 40 percent of Gaza's work force, only 1.5 months' salary, resulting in a severe economic depression and growing signs of malnutrition, especially among the poorest children.

Few here are using the United Nations grants for school. The Abu Reziqs are carefully investing the rest of their relief money. More than $20 went straight to the local grocer, Tamam said, as a down payment on the credit extended to the family, which still owes more than $200. About $11 went to buy the ingredients, including two chickens, for the couscous dish that Tamam and her daughter, Fatma, 29, are making early this morning, kneading relief agency flour in big aluminum bowls, pouring in relief agency oil, rubbing the flour over a screen to get the right consistency.

The result will serve 15 people, Tamam said. "We want to feed the people who helped us with the land," she said, and some of their neighbors, even worse off than they.

Gaza's situation has worsened since Palestinian gunmen, including those from Hamas, killed two Israeli soldiers and captured a third on June 25. Israel reinvaded Gaza, and has since killed more than 240 Palestinians, many of them in gun battles.

An Israeli airstrike on Gaza's only electrical power plant means that most Gazans now get only 7 to 12 hours a day of electricity, at unpredictable hours, with running water largely dependent on electric pumps.

Fishermen, now prevented from going more than a few hundred yards from shore by the Israeli Navy, are using hand-thrown nets from the beach to catch a few sprats and sardines.

Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary for humanitarian affairs, said that Gaza was "a ticking time bomb." The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development warned Tuesday that the economy could shrink next year to the level of 15 years ago, and unemployment could rise to over 50 percent. The World Bank expects gross domestic product to decline by 27 percent this year.

These pressures have forced Hamas to agree to a proposal by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, for a national unity government, led by the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, which could allow Israel and the West to resume transferring funds and aid.

The Abu Reziqs are hopeful, like many Palestinians, that a new government will be better, but they are reluctant to blame Hamas, which, Zidan said, "was never given a chance to succeed." Still, it is unclear whether the new government, when there is one, will be seen to meet Western demands that it recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Hamas promised security in its victorious election campaign. But it has failed at that, said Hamdi Shaqqura of the Palestinian Center for Human Rights. "There is security chaos and no respect for law," he said, and a prime reason is the involvement of the police and security forces, many of them from Fatah, in the lawlessness, and the constant clashes with militia and gunmen affiliated with Hamas.

"People who are supposed to protect the law are the people who break it," he said, "and no one is brought to justice." For this chaos, he said, "I must blame the Palestinian Authority," not Israel.

Tamam, 49, recalls a near riot here when cooking gas was in short supply and there was a delivery of canisters. The police were called, she said. "They took canisters for themselves and then left," she said, shrugging.

Zidan used to work in the nearby Israeli settlement of Neve Dekalim. But after the outbreak of the second intifada in 2000, he was not allowed to enter the settlement. Now, Zidan is lucky to get three days a month of casual construction work.

His son Muhammad is a Palestinian Authority policeman who is supposed to make $340 a month, but who has been paid only $500 since Feb. 1. Now, Fatma says, "he spends little time at home, because he hasn't a shekel in his pocket, and he's ashamed."

The small welfare check Fatma, a divorced mother, used to get has stopped coming, and the women's group for which she used to do embroidery has collapsed with the death of its leader.

Tamam's son Suleiman, 20, watches television, until the electricity suddenly dies. "I'd like to have any job," he said simply. "Any job at all."

The United Nations is now helping to feed 830,000 people in Gaza, an increase of 100,000 since March, but to receive the relief agency's aid they have to be classified as refugees, who make up 70 percent of Gaza's 1.4 million people. The increase is largely refugees who work for the government and did not need assistance before.

The World Food Program helps to feed the poorest of the nonrefugees and now has 220,000 beneficiaries, an increase of 25 percent since March, which includes 136,000 people considered to be the "chronic poor," who are not getting previous welfare benefits from the Authority.

"We have a complete deterioration of the economic situation in Gaza," said Kirstie Campbell of the agency. "People can't afford the basic things." Seventy percent of Gazans now depend on the United Nations for food aid.

In northern Gaza, in Beit Lahiya, where Israeli troops fought Palestinian gunmen during July, Atemad Abu Leilah, 33, lives in a hovel with her 11 children and her handicapped husband. He used to get $68 a month from the welfare ministry, but has received nothing for four months, she said.

She is a not a refugee, so is ineligible for refugee aid and like many here, gets by on casual work and the charity of neighbors.

She taps into wires in the street to take electricity illegally, and she has not bought her children school uniforms for the new school year. "I can't afford to buy them notebooks," she said.

She feeds her children greens, herbs, lentils and eggplant, and sometimes gets flour given by the World Food Program. "Forget about meat," she said. "The last time we had chicken was a month ago.''

Her relative, Ghalia Abu Leilah, 60, came by with a pot of yogurt she bought for her husband, who is dying of cancer, with money from a neighbor, she said.

A year ago, when the Israelis left, "We were very happy," Atemad Abu Leilah said. "I voted for Hamas, for reform and change and improvement. But now I look at my kids and I regret my vote."

Nearby, stalls sell flour and sunflower oil given as aid by the refugee agency and the World Food Program, most of it earmarked as gifts of the European Union and the United States, and labeled "not for sale." Iyad Baaker, who works at one stall, said that people needed cash, so sold the aid.

In Khan Yunis, Fatma Abu Reziq seemed distracted and sad, and brushed away a question about her daughter, Aya, 9. Later, she explained.

A week ago, her former husband took Aya away. He said it was easier to feed Aya himself than find the cash for child support.

Israeli Military Studies Hezbollah's Resilience (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, September 14, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israel's military has ordered a series of investigations to examine why its armed forces were unable to crush Hezbollah militants during a month of fighting in Lebanon.

Hezbollah guerrillas proved a resilient foe for Israel's vaunted military, inflicting casualties and firing missiles into Israel despite a punishing air campaign. Even after Israel sent thousands of troops into Lebanon, Israeli military commanders were still surprised by Hezbollah's capabilities.

"This is by far the greatest guerrilla group in the world," said Brig. Gen. Guy Zur, commander of Division 162. His division lost 12 soldiers during an effort by Israel to gain ground days before a United Nations-brokered cease-fire went into effect Aug. 14.

Israel's forces — better armed, better trained and more numerous than Hezbollah fighters — inflicted more casualties than Hezbollah, according to Israel's military. By Israel's tally, the military killed 500 to 700 militants, while losing 118 of its soldiers.

Throughout the 34 days of fighting, Hezbollah was able to continue firing missiles into Israel.

Hezbollah, a Shiite militia backed by Iran and Syria, achieved a strategic victory by appearing to stand up to Israel, says Ephraim Kam of the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies in Tel Aviv and a former colonel in military intelligence.

Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, emerged as a hero in the Arab world. "Israel underestimated the enemy," Kam said. "As a result, Hezbollah achieved a victory and appears by its survival to have emerged victorious."

The Israeli Defense Force is studying the conduct of its air force, navy and ground forces to learn from possible mistakes.

At the top of Israel's concerns is the success Hezbollah militants had in fighting Israel's armored forces. Brig. Gen. Halutsi Rudoy, head of Israel's armored forces, said Hezbollah laid ambushes throughout southern Lebanon's hilly terrain, hitting Israel's tanks with some of the world's most advanced anti-tank missiles.

The military had 400 tanks in Lebanon at the peak of the offensive. More than 50 were hit by Hezbollah-fired anti-tank missiles, killing 30 tank crewmen and disabling 22 tanks. Israel uses the Merkava tank, among the world's best-protected armored vehicles.

"We knew they had the best anti-tank missiles in the world," Rudoy said. "But we were surprised by the amounts, which at times seemed endless."

Militants were equipped with Kornet and Metis anti-tank missiles supplied by Iran and Syria. The weapons don't produce a large dust ball — or "signature" — when fired, making it hard for tank crews to see who is firing at them.

Israel's military has asked the government for $2.5 billion to purchase a system capable of detecting and tracking anti-tank missiles and countering them with a launched projectile.

"We need this system for the next war," said Brig. Gen. Moshe Lipel, the top financial adviser to Israel's chief of staff.

The Israeli offensive was triggered by a cross-border attack July 12 during which militants abducted two Israeli reservists.

Israeli attacks began with a massive air campaign, which knocked out Hezbollah's long-range missiles: None was fired at Israel during the 34 days of fighting.

Israeli warplanes were unable to deal with Hezbollah's short-range Katyusha rockets. The Shiite militia was able to fire up to 200 Katyusha rockets a day into Israel.

In response, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ordered ground forces into Lebanon to locate and destroy guerrilla strongholds. According to some military experts, Olmert's decision to send the ground troops into Lebanon came too late into the war.

"It was a mistake from the beginning to use the air force to hunt and destroy the short-range rockets," said retired major general Uri Saguy, a former head of Israeli military intelligence. He said a ground operation was needed from the outset to hunt and destroy the Katyushas.

Some of the Hezbollah rockets were fired from civilian homes and underground bunkers, he said. "There were thousands of them, and it was impossible to find all of them from the air," he said.

Boaz Ganor, director of the Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Israel, said Hezbollah began the war with nearly 15,000 short-range Katyusha rockets and several hundred long-range Iranian-made Zelzals and Fajrs.

Ganor estimates Hezbollah still had 10,000 short-range rockets at the end of the conflict.

The orders the forces received from their commanders in Israel were confusing, Saguy said, and were sometimes changed on an hourly basis. In some cases, brigades on the ground in Lebanon were told to begin advancing and then as they did they received orders telling them to stop.

Israel, Ganor said, should have waited and prepared its forces before invading Lebanon. A planning period of several months, he claimed, could have limited the confusion and lack of clarity in the orders. He said there was no reason to react immediately to the cross-border raid by Hezbollah militants.

"Israel was dragged not ready into this war by the initial military response," Ganor said.

Israel withdrew from Lebanon in 2000 after an 18-year occupation in the south. Hezbollah used the past six years to build a complex network of tunnels and other fortifications in southern Lebanon. Some of these bunkers were found a couple hundred yards from the border with Israel.

Israeli troops, Saguy said, walked into traps Hezbollah had been preparing for six years.

Hezbollah is rearming after Israel lifted the sea and air blockade of Lebanon, allowing the group to get smuggled weapons, some experts say.

"Hezbollah is working to recover its arsenal and will be in several months where it was before the war," Ganor said.

Survivor Of Attack On U.S. Embassy Dies In Syria (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

DAMASCUS, Sept. 13 — The sole survivor of the four-man team that attacked the American embassy here Tuesday died of his wounds without being questioned, Syria's official news agency reported.

The assailant's death left Syrian authorities with only the physical evidence to piece together the origins and motivations of the attack. The country said all four men were Syrian citizens. It gave no other details and both the Syrian government and the United States embassy here declined to comment on the investigation.

No group has yet claimed responsibility for the attack, in which the four men apparently planned to strike both the front and the rear of the embassy compound simultaneously. As three of the men stormed an employee entrance at the rear of the compound, the fourth left a pickup truck laden with improvised explosives at the embassy's front gate. He was wounded while running to the aid of the other attackers, and the explosives in the truck failed to detonate. One Syrian security official died and 13 people were injured in the ensuing gun battle.

Syria's news agency said that the fourth assailant was critically injured and did not respond to any questions before he died. That information appeared to contradict comments from the State Department late Tuesday, which said that the man was cooperating with Syrian authorities.

Syrian officials said Tuesday that they believed Islamic extremists were to blame for the attack.

Syria was quick to emphasize its security forces' role in foiling the assault before the attackers could break into the embassy compound. The country appeared eager to use the incident as an opening for improving Syria's already poor relations with the United States, which have worsened in recent weeks as a result of the Israeli-Lebanese war. Syria is a staunch supporter of Hezbollah, the Shiite militant group whose militia set off the war with a cross-border attack on Israeli soldiers.

Syria's ambassador to Washington, Imad Mostafa, said his government was ready to talk.

"There is a chance to improve these relations because Syria has always believed in dialogue as a means to solving all problems and pending issues," Mr. Mostafa told the official Ath-Thawra newspaper. "The ball is in the American court."

A political analyst in Damascus said today that Washington's past efforts to isolate Syria diplomatically had only hardened the country's resolve. "As long as the Syrian regime feels that its head is on the block, it will play the nasty guy," said the analyst, who asked not to be quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the subject in the country.

He said that Washington had more to gain from political engagement with Damascus.

Meanwhile, the United States embassy remained closed today, an embassy spokesman said. He said it would reopen with all normal services on Thursday. Washington withdrew its ambassador to Syria in early 2005 after the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri. The United States believes Syria was behind the killing, and preliminary results of a United Nations investigation have suggested as much.

Many people in Syria say that they expect the United Nations investigator, Serge Brammertz, to conclude that Islamic extremists linked to Al Qaeda were responsible for the assassination. His final report is due by the end of the month.

Syrian Dies Of Wounds After Embassy Raid (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, September 13, 2006

The bold attack on the U.S. Embassy has thrown new light on what President Bashar Assad calls the growing threat in Syria from Islamic extremists. But some critics say the regime is exaggerating the problem for its own political gain.

With questions still unanswered about the assault, the only attacker captured in the gunbattle died from his wounds before police could question him, officials said Wednesday, leaving the investigation's future unclear.

The state-run Syrian Arab News Agency said the dead man and three other gunmen killed during Tuesday's attempt to storm the embassy compound were all Syrian citizens.

Only a few years ago, such attacks were almost unthinkable in Syria, whose secular regime led a tough crackdown on Muslim fundamentalists in 1982 that killed thousands of people in the city of Hama. For that reason, Sunni Muslim extremist groups like al-Qaida despise Assad's regime.

Syrian officials often say they long ago recognized the danger of Muslim radicals and dealt with them — a reference to the assault on Hama.

Syria's four strong security agencies keep a firm grip on the country, with the power to detain suspects without warrants under emergency laws in place since the Baath Party took power in 1963. Membership in the Muslim Brotherhood, which was targeted in Hama, can be punished by execution.

Still, attacks by Muslim extremists and clashes with security forces have become more common the past three years. One of the most serious battles came in June, when anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Defense Ministry in central Damascus in a clash that killed five people.

There was no claim of responsibility for the embassy attack, but suspicion immediately fell on an al-Qaida offshoot called Jund al-Sham, Arabic for Soldiers of Syria, which has been suspected in previous violence.

Syrian officials say the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq turned many Arabs into hard-liners who want to fight America and fueled Islamic extremists who have turned their weapons on the government in Damascus.

DOJ_NMG_0062973

"Fanatical groups are present now, in great part thanks to America, which turned Iraq into a reservoir for international terrorism," said Mohammed Habash, head of the Islamic Studies Center in Damascus and a Syrian legislator.

"Now that authorities have crushed the attackers (at the embassy) we might find that an extremist group will hit a government institution in retaliation," he said.

But some critics say the real threat from extremism is hard to judge since Syrian security agencies rarely give information — and suspect the government may be playing up the danger for political reasons.

Human rights activist Haitham Maleh said Syria is a country "with no transparency."

"The government might say that we are being subjected to terrorism and for that reason persecute some groups," said al-Maleh, former head of the Human Rights Association in Syria, the country's oldest non-governmental rights organization.

Dissidents in exile contend Assad's regime exaggerates militant activity in hopes of easing pressure from the United States or providing a pretext to try to reassert influence in neighboring Lebanon.

Assad warned earlier this year that al-Qaida militants were finding refuge in Lebanon, suggesting they were taking advantage of the absence of Syrian troops, which withdrew last year under international and Lebanese pressure after a nearly three-decade occupation.

Washington accuses Syria of supporting terrorism because of its backing for the Lebanese Shiite guerrilla group Hezbollah and Palestinian militants, including Hamas.

The United States and the Iraqi government have also accused Syria of not doing enough to stop insurgents crossing its border into Iraq to fight U.S. troops. Syria denies that, saying it is impossible to fully control the long desert border.

Habash said that because of Syria's anti-U.S. stance, al-Qaida and other extremists may not focus as much on Syria.

"It is impossible for any group to defeat the government through violence. Still there might be attacks on Western interests or Syrian security interests," Habash said.

On Wednesday, traffic was normal near the U.S. Embassy, but plainclothes security agents were seen around the compound as well as in the streets leading to it. The street was cleaned but two slightly damaged four-wheel-drive vehicles were still there.

A closed bulletproof door to the embassy and the wall around it were riddled with bullet holes.

Rebels Say They May Abandon Darfur Pact (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

GRAI Commanders from the only rebel group that signed a peace accord in May for Sudan's Darfur region are prepared to resume fighting if African Union peacekeeping troops leave as scheduled at month's end and are not replaced by a United Nations force, according to more than a dozen senior rebel officials interviewed Wednesday.

Rebel commanders predicted that such a resumption of combat would spell the end of Darfur's tattered peace agreement and quickly escalate fighting to an intensity not seen since the early days of the conflict in 2003 and 2004.

Their comments came as the African Union force of 7,000 is preparing to depart and as Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir is vigorously resisting pressure to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force of up to 22,500 to enter the country, threatening to attack them if they try. At a meeting scheduled for Sept. 18, officials of the 53-country African Union are to reconsider their decision to withdraw their soldiers

Abdulrahaman Abdallah, a commander of the rebel group's military police, said that without a strong international force here, "the government will go back to its strategy, which is genocide, and inevitably we will go back to the bush."

Since the fighting began in 2003, war and disease have killed as many as 450,000 people in Darfur and driven more than 2 million from their homes. Sudan's impoverished western flank has become a patchwork of military positions and ragged camps for families displaced by war.

The peace deal, brokered in part by U.S. officials in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, was supposed to end the fighting between the Sudanese government and the three rebel groups active here. But only one group, led by Minni Minnawi, signed. Those that did not complained that the government provided insufficient restitution and that the agreement did not provide a reliable means to enforce its terms.

The government vowed to end the conflict through the use of nearly 30,000 soldiers and police officers, who are gradually augmenting the government-backed militias known as the Janjaweed that have been terrorizing civilians in Darfur.

Since the peace accord was signed, rebel forces allied with Minnawi have been assisting in some government military operations, often providing crucial on-the-ground intelligence, but his commanders are increasingly reluctant to help.

The commanders interviewed Wednesday said they were so angry about recent attacks on civilians, including the bombing of villages by Antonov planes and rocket attacks by Mi-24 helicopter gunships, that they were prepared to abandon the peace deal. They said they would not be swayed even if Minnawi decided to keep his senior job with the government in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum.

His group, while having less political support than the most popular rebel group in Darfur, was widely regarded as the most potent fighting force among the rebels. It remains strong in Darfur's southern and western areas.

"It's not our desire to go back to the bush, but if there is no choice, we will go," said rebel Gen. Ali Marmar, speaking in Graida, a rebel stronghold in South Darfur. Marmar said Minnawi would be replaced if he broke with the will of his commanders: "We have thousands like Minni."

The conflict began with attacks on police and military outposts by mostly non-Arab rebels who claimed discrimination by the Arab-dominated government. At issue are ancient disputes over grazing rights and land claims but, more broadly, the political and economic dispossession of a poor and nearly roadless region the size of Texas.

The ferocity of the government response provoked an international outcry. The U.S. government and many other observers have labeled it genocide.

Combat has escalated sharply in recent days, with heavy bombing and clashes near the North Darfur town of Kutum and in an area north of El Fasher where, according to African Union reports, government forces sustained heavy losses this week.

The African Union mission has been widely criticized by rebels, civilians and analysts as lethargic. The Janjaweed and government forces have repeatedly broken the cease-fire with impunity, even waving their guns at A.U. troops.

This week, the government seized a tanker full of African Union jet fuel in El Fasher and used it to fill its own military aircraft, African Union sources said, speaking on condition their names not be published.

Investigations of major breaches of the cease-fire, meanwhile, have been stymied. That includes an incident Saturday in which villagers who had been attacked by Janjaweed militiamen two weeks earlier gathered near the ruins of their homes in South Darfur to speak to A.U. investigators set to arrive by helicopter.

But the helicopter turned back because of severe rain, and the Janjaweed attacked again, killing 18 of the survivors of the earlier assault and dispersing as many as 25,000 into a remote southern region far from humanitarian assistance or military protection, rebel leaders here said.

Minnawi complained to top African Union officials about the incident, and the group's cease-fire commission twice scheduled investigative trips to the site of the atrocities, only to cancel them as commission members quarreled over the importance of the journey.

"The African Union is too weak to act," Abdallah said.

Adoma Ahmed Haggar, a rebel field commander based here, said, "There are no signs of peace on the ground. The A.U. is not able. Our only hope is pinned on the United Nations."

The U.N. Security Council approved the peacekeeping force for Darfur on Aug. 31, and intensive diplomatic pressure continues from the United States and other governments to persuade the Sudanese government to allow the force to enter the region.

Sudanese officials have called the U.N. proposal a violation of national sovereignty and an impediment to peace. Many outside analysts contend that the government wants to remove all outside observers from Darfur so it can pursue a military solution, including stepped-up attacks on civilians in areas where the rebels have popular support.

The government has also issued new restrictions against aid groups and journalists. Many humanitarian organizations have curbed their operations in the face of rising violence that has led to the deaths of 12 aid workers since the peace deal was signed. The U.N. World Food Program has reported that 355,000 residents of Darfur are going without food because it is not safe to reach them.

Rebel commanders say they will not tolerate such attacks and deprivations much longer. Minnawi's group has about 50 senior commanders. Asked how many would resume fighting if an effective international force did not arrive soon, Marmar said, "All of them."

California Vs. Sudan (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

THE GOONS WHO RUN SUDAN have proved deaf to appeals from the Western world that they stop slaughtering tribespeople in Darfur. The only change in attitude produced by years of diplomacy has been a shift from sullen foot-dragging to open defiance. The best response, short of intervention, is to hit them harder in a place that will really hurt: their wallets. The state of California is poised to do just that.

On Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk is a bill patterned on a divestment program approved this year by the University of California. It directs the boards of the two large state retirement funds to identify companies in their investment portfolios that do significant business with the government of Sudan or sell it the weapons used to cut a bloody swath through Darfur. The boards then must notify these companies that they have 90 days to end their involvement with Sudan. If they don't, or fail to respond, the pension funds must divest.

Five states have passed similar divestment plans, two more have nonbinding resolutions and about 15 others have legislation pending. Not all have handled the matter well. First off the divestment block was Illinois, which passed an absurdly broad law forbidding state investment in any company with ties to Sudan, no matter how remote. The law is so all-encompassing that it applies to U.S. companies such as Coca-Cola and Xerox, which have no direct business with Sudan. (In fact, Americans have been forbidden to do business directly with Sudan since 1997.)

California's AB 2941 avoids the Illinois law's pitfalls. It applies only to those companies identified as the worst offenders, all of which are foreign — mainly Chinese — and are well known to have deep financial ties to Khartoum while bringing little benefit to the Sudanese people.

The United Nations has been powerless to halt a government-sponsored program of murder and rape in Darfur that President Bush has rightly labeled genocide. Although the Security Council on Aug. 31 approved a resolution calling for a U.N. peacekeeping force for Darfur, it can't be deployed without permission from the Sudanese government, which refuses to grant it. The crisis is coming to a head because the only peacekeeping force now in the country — 7,000 troops from the African Union — will see its mandate expire at the end of this month.

It's unknown how much money California stands to divest under AB 2941, but it's thought to be in the hundreds of millions of dollars. That might be enough to make Khartoum, and the Chinese interests that do business there, stand up and take notice.

Paulson Calls On China To Reform Economy (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, September 13, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson urged China to undertake a broad range of economic reforms and said the country's failure to overhaul its currency system could raise the threat of a protectionist backlash.

But Paulson let it be known that the Bush administration would firmly oppose any efforts by Congress to erect trade barriers in response to America's large and growing trade deficit with China, which last year hit a record $202 billion.

"Protectionist policies do not work and the collateral damage from these policies is high," he said Wednesday in a speech in Treasury's ornate Cash Room. "We will not heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism."

Paulson sought to lower expectations that he will achieve any major breakthroughs when he visits Beijing for two days of talks with Chinese officials next week.

While former Treasury Secretary John Snow, Paulson's predecessor, pursued an increasingly tough line that China needed to move more quickly on the currency issue, Paulson, who took over from Snow in July, adopted a less confrontational approach.

He mentioned the currency issue as one of a number of economic reforms that China needed to pursue along with modernizing its farm economy, opening up its financial system and pursuing domestic-led growth rather than relying so much on exports.

"These changes will help create the millions of jobs that China needs to generate annually and will help create markets for U.S. exports of goods and services," Paulson said.

Analysts said they believed Paulson, who gained his expertise on China from the 70 trips he made to the country as head of investment giant Goldman Sachs, was dialing down the rhetoric in hopes of achieving better results.

"The Chinese never want to be in a position where they are seen as moving in response to external pressure," said Nicholas Lardy, a China expert at the Institute for International Economics.

Paulson sought to put the need for a more flexible currency in the context of a move that would help the Chinese government prevent a "boom and bust" economic cycle in its own country as well as dampening protectionist pressures around the world.

"To be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition," Paulson said.

Democratic critics have charged the administration has not done enough to deal with the soaring trade deficits, which they blame as a major contributing factor in the loss of nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs since President Bush took office.

One bill being pushed by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., would impose 27.5 percent tariffs on all Chinese imports unless China does more to allow its currency to rise in value against the dollar as a way of boosting U.S. exports to China and reducing Chinese imports to this country.

Schumer said that he was not concerned by Paulson's apparent change of tone, saying he had been effective at Goldman Sachs in dealing with the Chinese.

"But if he comes up empty-handed, we will be disappointed," Schumer said, saying he still intended to push for a vote on his legislation by the end of this month if there is not more movement on the currency issue.

American manufacturers contend that China's currency is undervalued by as much as 40 percent against the dollar, making Chinese goods cheaper in the United States and American products more expensive in China.

Frank Vargo, vice president for international affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers, said he was not worried that Paulson was downgrading the currency issue.

"Paulson is putting his own style on this," Vargo said. "His way is not to get out a big baseball bat and start beating them."

To underscore the importance of the Beijing talks, Paulson will be accompanied by Allan Hubbard, chairman of President Bush's National Economic Council.

Treasury officials said that Paulson spent the past several weeks working on the speech, including receiving briefings from China experts from both parties and holding a number of staff meetings at his home.

Paulson said the United States has nothing to fear from China's emergence as a global economic power, one that is expected to overtake the United States as the world's largest economy at some point in the coming decades.

He said the message he will deliver next week will be, "We want you to succeed."

He will travel to Beijing for talks on Thursday and Friday after first attending the annual meetings of the 184-nation International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Singapore.

Paulson Says China Hurts Itself With Economic Policies (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — In the administration's toughest warning yet to China on economic issues, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said on Wednesday that Chinese leaders were imperiling their nation's future by engaging in policies that Americans and others see as unfair.

Speaking as he prepared for his first trip to Beijing since taking office this summer, and one day after China's monthly trade surplus set another record, Mr. Paulson said that the United States had "a huge stake in a prosperous, stable China" and that "we are not afraid of Chinese competition."

But he used forceful language in saying that China had kept the value of its currency artificially low in relation to the dollar, which a growing number of economic analysts say is making China's exports cheaper and its imports more expensive.

Mr. Paulson also repeated longstanding administration demands for China to loosen regulations and controls on foreign investment and the activities of its banks.

"Maintaining and relying on an overly rigid exchange rate and outdated administrative controls increases the risk of boom and bust cycles," Mr. Paulson said. Also, he added, China's "currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

Mr. Paulson did not say so, but aides said he was referring to legislation that would place tariffs on imports from China if its government did not act to let the yuan rise in relation to the dollar.

The sponsors of the measure, Senators Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, have held back pending Mr. Paulson's trip. But they vow to press for its passage this fall if Mr. Paulson fails to get action from the Chinese.

Treasury officials say that in his few months as secretary, Mr. Paulson, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs who made scores of trips to China as a business executive, has been surprised by the growing protectionist sentiment in Congress toward China, abetted by anti-Chinese sentiment on several issues.

Leaders of both political parties accuse China of not cooperating on American efforts to prevent North Korea and Iran from amassing nuclear weapons and to stop the civil war in Darfur. The administration has also deplored China's military buildup.

Mr. Paulson's speech was unusual for a Treasury secretary in that it embodied an extensive analysis of China's economic policies and structure. He repeatedly praised China for liberalizing its economy even as he implored its leadership to do more.

Mr. Paulson said he learned in 32 years at Goldman Sachs that "those nations that reform their economies and open themselves to competition benefit their citizens greatly" and "have better jobs, improved living standards and greater opportunity."

But he said that protectionist sentiment was preventing China from doing more to open itself up to competition, and was in turn breeding protectionist sentiment in America.

"Ironically," he said, "this protectionist sentiment comes from many quarters in those nations — including in the United States and China — which have benefited the most from the economic growth generated by global competition."

Mr. Paulson said the United States would not "heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism," but that China had to do its part by changing its heavily subsidized industries and farms, allowing capital to flow freely and guiding Chinese to spend more and save less — a step that economists say would increase imports.

Before going to China, Mr. Paulson plans a stop in Singapore to meet with the world's finance ministers and to press for giving China more of a voice in the international agency that oversees the global economy and rescues countries whose economies collapse.

The administration's proposal to expand the role of China and other developing countries at the agency, the International Monetary Fund, has run into some difficulties. Brazil, India, Indonesia and some other countries oppose the change out of fear of being left out.

The administration needs 85 percent of the votes, which are assigned in a complex quota system to 184 countries, to have the change enacted at the fund. Treasury officials say there are some "rumbles" of protest but they predict success.

Although Mr. Paulson was in Vietnam last weekend for a meeting of Asia-Pacific nations, the trip to Singapore and China represents what some officials call his debut on the international scene. Accordingly, it was notable that he began the trip with a warning.

"I believe that if China doesn't move quickly to continue reforming its economy," he said, "it will face a backlash from other economic stakeholders. This backlash would not benefit any of us."

In an interview after his 35-minute speech, Mr. Paulson cautioned against expectations that his trip to China would produce immediate results.

The best policy in advance of this trip, he said, was to "diminish expectations" for any quick move by China to allow the value of its currency to appreciate.

"I believe that most things that are worthwhile take a period of time," Mr. Paulson said.

It's Showtime For Paulson In Meetings With Chinese (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Can the Bush administration's new Treasury secretary pull off a feat in China that eluded his predecessor -- and save American jobs in the process?

Henry M. Paulson Jr., leaves today on a trip to Asia that is to include his first visit to China since taking the helm in July. Hopes are high, in Congress and in the business world, that the former Wall Street titan can use his powers of persuasion to secure changes in Chinese policies that critics view as unfair.

U.S.-China economic relations is an area where Paulson seeks to make an impact, based on his long experience doing business with the Chinese when he headed the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs.

His predecessor, John W. Snow, tried and largely failed to get China to adjust the value of its currency enough to help American manufacturers. Many members of Congress, U.S. business executives and economists have long complained that the Chinese yuan is kept at an artificially low level -- about 8 per dollar -- that makes the nation's exports too cheap, to the detriment of American workers in competing industries.

The first big rollout of Paulson's message to the Chinese came yesterday in a speech he delivered amid much pomp in the Treasury's ornate Cash Room.

In substantive terms, his remarks echoed the themes that Snow used to stress. While vowing to resist protectionism, he exhorted China to embrace market-oriented policies, an approach he said was in China's interest as well as that of the United States and the global economy.

"When I visit China in coming days I will discuss these issues with the Chinese leadership, and I will use a Chinese saying indicating that it is for the good of both of our economies that they undertake these changes," he said. "I will say . . . 'We want you to succeed,' " attempting the phrase in Chinese.

Specifically, he said, Beijing must take steps to combat piracy of patented products, shift its economy away from dependence on exports and toward greater consumer spending, and open its financial system to foreign competition. As for the currency issue, he called it one of "several critical, immediate challenges" that China faces.

"Maintaining and relying on an overly rigid exchange rate and outdated administrative controls increases the risk of boom-and-bust cycles," he said. "Also to be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

None of that was a departure from Snow's arguments, Treasury officials acknowledged. But they cited one difference: The speaker was Paulson, who boasts close ties with Chinese leaders and deep knowledge of the country's financial system, not Snow, the former railroad executive reputed to have had little clout at the White House.

"You're right, we have said in the past that these reforms are in China's interest," a senior Treasury official said at a briefing for reporters. "But that may be interpreted one way when it comes from someone who is relatively unfamiliar to them. Having Hank Paulson say to them, 'These things are in your interest' carries a different level of meaning to the Chinese." The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of concern for keeping the focus on Paulson's comments.

Asked whether this meant the Chinese would be more likely to act, another senior official said: "Relationships matter, and he matters. I don't think tomorrow the situation is going to change. But to have someone of his experience and stature make the case -- it will make a difference."

The Chinese are known for brushing off demands for change from outsiders and viewing themselves as the best judges of their own interests. Few experts believe China will change its currency policy during Paulson's trip or even soon after, for fear of appearing to cave to foreign pressure. But even some of the most prominent agitators for a higher yuan said they were pleased with the Treasury chief's approach.

"I can't second-guess him. He knows everybody in China; they trust him," said Franklin J. Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers. "He has an inside track that his predecessors did not."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), the ranking minority member on the House Ways and Means Committee, issued a laudatory press release on the speech with the headline, "Past experience leaves Paulson well-positioned for results on currency reform."

Paulson also drew encouraging words from Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who has co-sponsored legislation that would impose punitive tariffs on Chinese goods if Beijing fails to let the yuan rise significantly. The Treasury chief has maintained the department's staunch opposition to Schumer's bill. But the threat of congressional passage has helped prod the Chinese toward concessions, some analysts assert.

"When I spoke to Hank Paulson last night, we discussed how important his trip is in the fight to get China to play fair," Schumer said in a statement. "Today in his speech, he said if China does not move, it does so at its own peril. No truer words were spoken. I hope the Chinese were listening."

Paulson Urges Beijing To Reform (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson gave a forceful defense of the benefits of trade even as he issued a tough warning to China, the nation's most controversial trading partner, that it faced "peril" unless it enacted further economic reforms.

Paulson, who visited China more than 70 times while at the helm of Goldman Sachs, is making that country a major focus of his Treasury Department tenure. He praised China for more than a quarter century of ambitious reform, saying it "deserved recognition for what it has become."

But in a passage that won quick praise from China's critics, he warned Beijing that keeping its currency virtually fixed in value against the U.S. dollar invites a political backlash. "To be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition," he said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., one of the authors of legislation that would slap punitive tariffs on Chinese imports unless the yuan is revalued, applauded Paulson's remarks. "That's pretty strong stuff. That made us feel good," he said in a brief telephone interview.

Paulson spoke before his departure for a week-long Asia sojourn. He will stop first in Singapore for meetings with finance ministers from the G-7 nations and the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Then, on Tuesday, he is scheduled to fly to China for three days of talks with Chinese leaders.

Much of Paulson's address Wednesday could only have been welcomed by the Chinese, who explain their failure to more quickly adjust currency policy by citing the danger of undermining job growth.

"The tasks faced by Beijing are so daunting that the biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the U.S., but that China won't move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth and to address the very serious problems facing the nation," Paulson said.

Paulson rejected the idea that China, now growing at an annual rate of more than 10%, can speed ahead indefinitely. The Chinese economy, stuck midway between central planning and the market, is "becoming increasingly difficult to manage," he said.

But, Paulson said, further economic reform is in China's interest because it would encourage more sustainable growth and defuse protectionist sentiment in the United States. Modernizing the financial sector would let the market, not government officials, steer capital to its most productive use. And spurring domestic consumption would increase Chinese consumers' appetite for imports, helping whittle the politically combustible U.S. trade deficit.

Paulson Sets Out New China Strategy (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, on Wednesday laid out the framework for a comprehensive new strategy towards China, emphasising the need to take a "generational" view of the US-China relationship.

In an interview, Mr Paulson told the Financial Times he wanted to "strike a balance" between tackling pressing short-term issues while maintaining a strategic perspective on China's emergence as a leading player in the global economy. "We have a common interest," he said, arguing that many of the steps the US wanted China to take were in its own best interest.

The interview followed a landmark speech by the former Goldman Sachs chairman ahead of his first trip to China as Treasury secretary, in which he said he would tell his counterparts in Beijing: "We want you to succeed."

Mr Paulson said: "The United States has a huge stake in a prosperous, stable China – a China able and willing to play its part as a global economic leader." He said the US and China shared areas of economic interest, highlighting energy and the environment as two specific areas where the two nations should work together.

He added that the US looked to China to be its "co-operative partner" in reviving the Doha trade talks. Officials said Mr Paulson would push hard on Doha in meetings with world finance ministers in Singapore later this week.

"The biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the US but that China will not move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth," Mr Paulson declared. The Treasury secretary told the FT: "I wanted to put the relationship and these economic issues in a longer-term focus. But I also needed to emphasise how important certain steps were going to be in the short term."

For example, he said, on the currency front "the intermediate-term viewpoint is that it is very, very important to open up their capital markets, to have healthy competition within the domestic financial system, so they can have a currency that is freely tradeable".

But he added: "They also need to show more flexibility in the short term."

His speech did not dwell on the currency as a standalone issue, framing it as part of a necessary shift towards more market-based management of China's economy. But Mr Paulson warned the Beijing authorities that they underestimated "at China's own peril" the extent to which the currency was "viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition".

He called on China to press ahead with liberalisation across a broad front, including financial sector reform, fiscal and regulatory policies to reduce excess savings, market-based macroeconomic management and intellectual property rights. "We are taking a comprehensive approach," he said. "We are collectively pulling it together." Mr Paulson said China had become a lightning rod for fears about globalisation, but insisted: "This is manageable."

In his speech, Mr Paulson praised China's record of economic reform, and said China already "deserves to be recognised as a leader". This, he said, was why the US backed plans to give China and other emerging markets a much bigger say in the International Monetary Fund.

But Mr Paulson said: "With leadership comes responsibility." He urged China to abide by the "spirit and letter" of the rules of the IMF and promote free trade. And he suggested these responsibilities "go beyond the economic arena" to include human rights and non-proliferation. The speech positions Mr Paulson in the role of honest broker between China and its critics in Congress. He characterised the fundamental division as not one between the US and China, but between liberalisers in both the US and China, and their protectionist opponents.

He defended open markets, saying: "Globalisation and interdependence are here to stay. No nation can turn back the clock." But he warned: "If China does not move quickly to continue reforming its economy it will face a backlash from other international economic stakeholders."

Mr Paulson will stop en route to Beijing in Hangzhou to meet Zhejiang provincial party secretary Xi Jingping. US officials said Mr Paulson regarded Mr Xi as a rising star of Chinese politics.

Paulson Takes China To Task Over Its Energy Use, Green Record (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's speech on the global economy yesterday drew notice for its breadth as well as the explicit concern Mr. Paulson expressed about China's energy consumption and its environmental record.

Mr. Paulson, an environmentalist and bird-watcher, focused much of his 40-minute speech on the benefits of globalization and the need for Chinese economic reforms, but devoted several minutes to China's "severe environmental hazards" and the need for that country, along with the U.S., to reduce dependence on foreign oil from unstable regions.

"China's severe environmental hazards not only are harming the health of its people and ecosystems, they are also harming China's long-term economic potential," he said, a week before heading to China. "Economic development without regard for environmental protection is not sustainable."

While those comments drew praise, some observers noted that Mr. Paulson didn't offer any suggestions for what the U.S. should be doing to bolster environmental protection. "He talked about what China needs to do for the environment, which is certainly a horrendous problem, but he was silent on what the U.S. needs to do," said Kenneth Rogoff, an international economist at Harvard University and occasional economic adviser to Republicans. "A problem that the U.S. has had in its dealings with China is this position of 'We're doing everything perfectly, and you need to be more like us,' and that's true in many ways. But maybe the Chinese don't see it that way."

Fred Krupp, president of the advocacy group Environmental Defense, added: "Until the U.S. agrees to cap its own greenhouse-gas emissions, it's hard to imagine that we have much equity to lecture the Chinese." Although China's air-pollution problems are legendary, Mr. Krupp noted that in some areas -- such as energy-efficiency requirements for cars -- China has tougher standards than the U.S. "If the United States would adopt energy-efficiency standards like China, that would be a big advance for us."

Still, the fact that Mr. Paulson spent several minutes talking about the environment -- and that he brought it up even before delving into China's currency -- suggested that he plans to take an active role in international issues beyond finance and economics narrowly defined. "This makes it clear that he's taking lead on a broader agenda," said Daniel Rosen, of China Strategic Advisory, a consulting firm. "He has a longtime personal commitment to the topic of environmental stewardship that he is not going to be shy about bringing to the table."

The speech, delivered in the Treasury Department's historic Cash Room to academics, ambassadors, politicians and business representatives, didn't have much effect on financial markets -- and that almost certainly was what Mr. Paulson and his aides had hoped. While Mr. Paulson didn't talk specifically about the U.S. dollar, he reiterated the administration's position that China needs a more flexible currency and said China's "currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

One of the strongest critics of China's currency, Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.), said Mr. Paulson needs to achieve tangible results on the yuan. "If he comes back empty-handed, we'll be deeply disappointed," said Mr. Schumer, who has proposed a tariff on Chinese imports in response to what he believes is a deliberate attempt by China to increase exports by keeping its currency low. "It's good to care about the Chinese economy as a whole.... It's equally important that they understand their responsibility."

Democratic Rep. Sander Levin of Michigan, a state that has been hard hit by manufacturing-job losses, added that while Mr. Paulson is correct in wanting a stronger U.S. relationship with China, "he also needs to make clear that the inflexible currency has created unfair competition."

Separately, Mr. Paulson has tapped Deborah Lehr, president of China consulting firm Stonebridge Capital, to join him at Treasury where she will personally advise him on China issues. Ms. Lehr is an economist who served as a director of Asian affairs at the National Security Council.

Bombs Fail To Incite As Indian Imams Urge Calm (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

DOJ_NMG_0062982

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

NEW DELHI

The smell of explosives was still lingering in the air when the discussion began. Malegaon's streets had just been seared by three bombs that killed at least 30 people, and as the crowds began to seethe with anger, the city's most revered Muslim leaders gathered to decide what to do.

There was little question about the purpose of last week's attack: Malegaon is one of India's few Muslim-majority cities, and the bombs were planted near a mosque on a holy day when thousands of worshipers would come to pray.

Yet even before police arrived, the imams had made a choice. They used the loudspeakers of their mosques to spread a blanket of audible calm over the frayed city, imploring patience and forbearance. And for the second time in two months, a bombing apparently designed to ignite Hindu-Muslim riots failed.

For a nation whose past has lurched from one riot to another, the response to this summer's bombings in Malegaon and Mumbai (Bombay) is no small shift, suggesting that - at least for the moment - the forces of calm are eclipsing those that would sow chaos.

The balance is a tenuous one at best, and experts do not suggest that India has put its violent past behind it. Even Wednesday, police found an unexploded bomb in Malegaon, though it was not yet clear whether the device was new or had simply failed to go off in the initial attack. But some say that an array of factors - from imams voicing reason in Malegaon to a less divisive political discourse nationwide - has helped India break its cycle of revenge violence in recent years.

"With all these things, the timing has to be right," says Dipankar Gupta, a sociologist at Jawaharlal Nehru University in New Delhi. For anger to kindle into a riot, he adds, "all the pieces have to fit."

Those pieces have not fallen into place since the Gujarat riots of 2002, when more than 1,000 Muslims were killed in response to an attack on a trainload of Hindu religious campaigners. The nationwide revulsion at the atrocities committed there has partly laid the groundwork for today's more inclusive political tone, some say. An improved political climate

Though the extremist elements of the Hindu right are still a potent force in India, "the political climate is much more conducive to tolerance," says Teesta Setalvad, editor of the magazine Communalism Combat.

In the past year alone, terrorists aiming to weaken and divide India have bombed a Hindu temple in Varanasi and preparations for a Hindu festival in New Delhi. The lack of riots points to the fact that, for the time being, the political calculus has changed.

"As much as people like to make out that riots are spontaneous, they are rarely spontaneous," says Ms. Setalvad, agreeing with several other experts. "The parties responsible for hatemongering are on a downward slide." Riots throughout Indian history

In the past, riots have been common enough to become waymarks of Indian history. The birth of India in 1947 brought its separation from Pakistan - and the related riots that killed at least 2 million Indians and Pakistanis. After former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was assassinated by her Sikh bodyguards in 1984, more than 3,000 Sikhs were killed in Delhi alone, according to a government inquiry.

More recently, Mumbai descended into riots in 1992 after the destruction of a Muslim mosque. In 1993, bombs rocked the city, killing 257 people, in an attack that some say was tied to the rioting. An Indian court is expected to deliver sentences Thursday on the first four people to be convicted in the bombing.

Riots also broke out in Malegaon in 2001 after anti-US protests got out of hand.

Now, these two cities in the state of Maharashtra are again linked, with law-enforcement officials hinting that the same terrorists responsible for the Mumbai bombing in July have simply changed their tactics: Now they are targeting Muslims to see if they can provoke a response.

If true, the claim suggests that Muslim terrorists are now willing to attack fellow Muslims in an attempt to destabilize India. With an estimated 145 million Muslims, India is home to the world's third-largest Muslim population.

For his part, Abdul Rehman simply wants those responsible caught - whether Hindu or Muslim.

His father, Maulana Abdul Bari, is the imam of the Hamidiya Mosque that was attacked last weekend in Malegaon. Mr. Rehman watched as the throngs outside seemed to be spiraling toward anarchy. "The situation was out of control," he says. "The people wanted to know ... what the police was doing. This is why they were angry." Tense situation calmed

Indeed, immediately after the bombing, there were several reports of attacks against policemen. Malegaon, it seemed, needed only the smallest spark to ignite. Says Rehman: "If the police had done something [aggressive], then the crowds would have been provoked."

That was when his father took to the mosque's loudspeaker.

"The Ulema [Muslim elders] said, 'The police are conducting their investigation,' " Rehman recalls.

" 'Let the ... investigating team do their job, and after they do their work, we'll certainly put pressure on them to give their report."

It was a decisive moment, and Malegaon's religious leaders - including Mufti Mohammed Ismail, the president of the Ulema council of Malegaon - have won praise for their part in keeping the peace so far, though the situation is still tense.

"The religious leaders in Malegaon played a moderating role," says Maj. Gen. Dipankar Banerjee (ret.), director of the Institute of Peace and Conflict Studies in New Delhi. Indians seeing through the tactic

Yet he also suggests that the Indian people have grown wise to the terrorists' aims. "Because we see this again and again, people begin to see through it," says General Banerjee. "If we respond in a manner that the terrorists are trying to encourage, then we are playing into their hands."

Like many others, Banerjee is wary of making too much of the recent calm. "One cannot take it as a trend," he says. "One must be careful."

But perhaps it is an opportunity for all Indians to examine the thinking that often divides them. "What this gives us is a moment toforge ahead on many issues," says Setalvad. "It is a moment of deep introspection."

Blair Blasts Anti-American 'Madness' (AFP)

AFP, September 13, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair blasted his fellow European politicians for their anti-American "madness" in dangerous times as he urged a complete strategy rethink to defeat extremism.

None of the world's most pressing problems could be fixed "or even contemplated" without US involvement, he wrote in a 37-page document spelling out the challenges facing the world and his answers for dealing with them.

He urged the international community to unite around a shared set of values, tackling climate change and trade justice as well as extremist terrorism in the pamphlet "A Global Alliance For Global Values" for the Foreign Policy Centre, a Blairite think tank.

"The strain of, frankly, anti-American feeling in parts of European politics is madness when set against the long-term interests of the world we believe in," Blair wrote.

"The danger with America today is not that they are too much involved. The danger is if they decide to pull up the drawbridge and disengage.

"We need them involved. We want them engaged. The reality is that none of the problems that press in on us can be resolved or even contemplated without them."

Calling for a global policy overhaul, Blair appealed for an alliance of moderates from all religions in order to defeat extremists and build a future where different societies could live in harmony.

"The situation we face is indeed war, but of a completely unconventional kind. And it can't be won in a conventional way. We will not win the battle against global extremism unless we win it at the level of values as much as force.

"Doing this requires us to change dramatically the focus of our policy. We must commit ourselves to a complete renaissance of our strategy to defeat those that threaten us.

"A great danger is that global politics divides into 'hard' and 'soft': the 'hard' get after the terrorists; the 'soft' campaign against poverty. That divide is dangerous because interdependence makes all these issues just that: interdependent," Blair wrote.

"The answer to terrorism is the universal application of global values. The answer to poverty is the same. That is why the struggle for global values has to be applied not selectively, but to the whole global agenda."

On resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Blair said: "Nothing else is more important to the success of our foreign policy."

DOJ_NMG_0062984

Moderates are not succeeding in conquering the challenges facing them because they are not being bold, consistent and thorough enough in fighting for their values, Blair argued.

He wrote: "This is the moment for reconciliation in the international community around this agenda. It needs passion as well as policy. We are engaged in a struggle which will determine our collective future.

"It is one which, together, we can and must win."

Honoring The 'Iron Lady' (WT)

By Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

On Sept. 12 the "Iron Lady," Margaret Thatcher was honored in the U.S. as she announced the establishment of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, to be administered in the United States by the Heritage Foundation.

During her administration, then-Prime Minister Thatcher and President Ronald Reagan led the free world to vanquish the tyranny of our Cold War enemies. Establishment of the Thatcher Center in the U.S. is an outstanding occasion to reflect on how together the United States, Britain and our freedom-loving allies defeated a common enemy -- an evil empire that threatened our nation's safety and global security and sought to replace freedom and democracy with tyranny and oppression.

In doing so, we can gain a better understanding of the nature of the threat we face today and the commitment that is necessary in our current struggle against Islamic fascism.

It is difficult to derive anything positive from the destruction wreaked on New York and Washington five years ago by adherents of radical Islam. But past experiences often give wisdom for meeting future challenges.

The thwarting of another unspeakable plot last month by British antiterrorism officials in collaboration with our own U.S. intelligence is evidence that allied forces have the capacity to connect the dots to distill some of the important lessons of the September 11 tragedy.

Assimilating seemingly disparate chains of events, wherever they occur, is our best defense against the transnational enemy against whom we fight. This process, both in Britain and in the United States, was driven by the events of September 11 , and the July 7 bombings in London. Just as both nations faced and defeated common enemies in the global conflicts of the last century, so too will we prevail together in the fight against extremism.

So, what are these lessons learned for the United States, for Britain, and for all of those who stand with us against Islamofascism? First, the victory over terrorism that resulted in the foiling of last month's plot to blow up commercial airliners between the United Kingdom and the United States is the supreme example of connecting the dots. Joint intelligence resulting from the synthesis of multi-sourced data and intelligence sharing on both sides of the Atlantic, along with the exemplary skill of British officials, impeded agents of extremism from carrying out a subsequent catastrophic mission.

Second, certainly in the United States and Britain, and with hope that eventually continental Europe will follow suit, there is a realization that threats do not come exclusively from abroad, but that, in the implementation of the jihadist agenda, the threats can come from within and are home grown.

The tentacles of Islamic extremism have slithered unnoticed into our own communities where apprentice suicide bombers train domestically to fly planes and make explosives. At the same time, carnage was being spread by extremists in far-away places in East Asia and Africa, but we did not feel its impact directly. Horrific and regrettable, the September 11 attacks on our nation were a necessary wake-up call alerting us to the nature and reach of the enemy that seeks our destruction and world domination. The response required an intertwining of foreign and domestic policies here in the United States and a similar response in the U.K. that are proving effective in making us safer.

Third, we are now better informed about the true components of our borderless enemy: extremist Muslim fanaticism and its national and organizational components: These include, among others, Iran, Syria, the Taliban, Hezbollah and Hamas. Those who say this is a war between the Arab world and the West get it wrong, for they ignore the many Muslims and moderate Middle East nations who abhor Islamist extremism as much as the United States, Britain and our other Western allies.

As such, our approach has not focused on short-term goals of removing the immediate threat but fomenting freedom and promoting democracy over despotism.

Critics will say we are trying to impose our way of life where it is not welcome. These naysayers should reflect for a moment that no human being, no matter what system he has grown up under, prefers autocracy to liberty. Misguidedly, many in Britain, who are quick to blame Prime Minister Tony Blair, join their voices with the anti-U.S.-apologist crowd.

What will it take for the world to believe that one cannot appease or negotiate with these Islamist extremists or their state sponsors, those fanatics who scream "Death to America" and "Bomb the U.K.", who threaten to wipe entire countries off the map and who incite others to jihad against all those who refuse to bow to their ideology of hatred?

What will it take for all freedom-loving nations to undertake the necessary sacrifices, to join forces and to focus on defeating this enemy? Lady Thatcher recently said in a statement released during her visit accompanying President Bush and the first lady at the September 11 remembrance ceremony: "That heinous attack on America was an attack on us all." Indeed, we are bound together by the extremists' hate of our noble values.

We must be encouraged by and continue to learn from the successes with which we have collaboratively thwarted events like the foiled air plot, and must not waiver in our collective mission to overcome the fanatics. Our very survival depends on it.

Wolfowitz Corruption Drive Rattles World Bank (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — In his first 15 months as president of the World Bank, Paul D. Wolfowitz has made the fight against corruption in poor countries a hallmark issue, waging an aggressive campaign that has led to the suspension of hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and contracts to nations including India, Chad, Kenya, Congo, Ethiopia and Bangladesh.

It is a new incarnation for Mr. Wolfowitz, a neoconservative intellectual who was a primary architect of the Iraq war during four years as deputy secretary of defense.

At the World Bank, Mr. Wolfowitz, 62, has maintained an assertive but soft-spoken style, saying recently that the bank's mission was "to send children to school, to help mothers be healthier, to provide jobs for poor people — not to have resources siphoned off into the hands of the corrupt and greedy."

In recent months, however, his campaign has run into a host of critics, both at the bank and among financial officials outside the United States, who say that developing countries are being threatened with arbitrary punishment in a way that jeopardizes the bank's longtime mission to reduce poverty.

Few here at the World Bank dispute the idea that corruption is a serious problem, but the rift over Mr. Wolfowitz's approach has grown deep and bitter, according to more than a dozen bank officials interviewed recently.

The backlash at the bank against Mr. Wolfowitz's approach centers not on his intentions or goals, but on a widespread fear that countries will be categorized in the future as corrupt or not corrupt, and that lending will be shut off in a selective way.

"Anticorruption efforts are an essential part of development finance," said Roberto Dañino, a senior vice president of the bank until early this year. "But getting rid of corruption is not a silver bullet. The bank should not overemphasize its anticorruption agenda at the expense of other policies required for development."

Mr. Wolfowitz acknowledges that his decisions to suspend or delay loans, contracts and debt relief funds for many countries have provoked outcries, but he says that in almost every case, the funds were restored after safeguards were set up.

He has begun firing back at the critics at internal meetings and in public statements. He notes, for example, that the bank's lending under his leadership actually rose slightly last year, to nearly $23 billion.

Mr. Wolfowitz says he has tried to rebut what he calls the myth that combating fraud is "somehow at odds with development or becomes an excuse not to provide assistance."

While no one knows how much of the bank's resources have been improperly diverted, informal estimates range from 10 percent to the 25 percent that Mr. Wolfowitz says went to corrupt cronies and family members of Indonesia's leadership in the 1990's.

During the Reagan administration, Mr. Wolfowitz served as assistant secretary of state for East Asia, and, in the Clinton years, as dean of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

Some bank officials say that the widespread concern about Mr. Wolfowitz's approach reflects lingering doubts among many international aid specialists about his selection for the bank post by President Bush.

The doubts center on Mr. Wolfowitz's role as a leading advocate of the American invasion of Iraq, with many critics contending that his zeal on corruption reminds them of what they say was his messianic but unrealistic faith that installing democracy by force in Iraq, and by other means through the Middle East, would bring stability to the region.

The criticism has been especially sharp among Europeans at the bank, where many officials say that judgments about what constitutes "good governance" could rupture the bank's delicate relationships with aid recipients, especially if the judgments are based on information gathered from dissidents and other critics in those countries.

"We must not use corruption as an excuse for a massive withdrawal of our help," a senior French finance official involved in discussions with the bank said. The official was among many who agreed to discuss the internal debate only on condition of anonymity.

In recent months, Mr. Wolfowitz and his aides have been negotiating with skeptical members of the bank's board of 24 executive directors from around the world on guidelines for handling corruption issues. Several of the meetings have been contentious, participants say.

This week, the board forwarded a draft of the guidelines and policies for approval by the world's finance ministers at the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which begins Thursday in Singapore. But many officials said they expected the arguments to continue there and into the future.

Several longtime bank officials say they cannot remember when board members wrangled over the wording of a policy paper with a bank president. At recent meetings, directors demanded that Mr. Wolfowitz agree to a greater role for the board in any future decisions on cutting off aid.

In addition, members forced the deletion of language suggesting that the United Nations' goal of reducing world poverty 50 percent by 2015 would have to take second place to the bank's drive against corruption.

Still, Britain and other European and developing countries remain skeptical on what may happen when the document is approved, bank officials said.

"The bank," a board member said, "should not become a world policeman pointing its moral finger and conditioning everything on whether or not a country is believed to be corrupt. The more the bank goes beyond its old mandate of reducing poverty, the more problems will come up."

In an interview, Mr. Wolfowitz acknowledged that the idea of drafting a paper on bank corruption policies had been urged on him out of fear that he would punish countries without consulting the board. He said he did not take the criticism as personally directed at him or his record on Iraq.

"I think some of the board members," Mr. Wolfowitz said, "are legitimately afraid that as soon as you start criticizing, the next thing you're going to do is wag your finger and say, 'You're not going to get money unless you behave.' That's not our objective. Our objective is to make the lending go up."

Past actions taken on behalf of the bank have involved a variety of presumed improprieties. For example, aides to Mr. Wolfowitz said he suspended debt relief talks with Congo because he was dissatisfied with audits of its state oil company. They said he expressed indignation over news reports about extravagant hotel bills incurred by Congo's president during United Nations General Assembly meetings in New York last September.

The bank has looked at, among other things, accusations of corrupt bidding practices for road projects in Bangladesh, kickbacks to politicians in Argentina and the resignation of high officials in Kenya linked to projects there.

By all accounts, a pivotal moment in Mr. Wolfowitz's campaign came last year when the bank suspended $800 million in loans for maternal and children's health in India in response to assertions that illicit payments had been going to officials.

Nancy Boswell, president of Transparency International USA, a nongovernmental monitoring group that strongly supports Mr. Wolfowitz's efforts on corruption, said, "It sent a tremor through the bank that Wolfowitz was serious, that he was going to ask hard questions, look at the track record of countries and make some changes."

But many at the bank complained that the action had been taken without consultation, and protests were lodged by top aides to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, bank officials said.

Few would characterize the bank's 10,000 employees, 70 percent of whom work in Washington, as enthusiastic supporters of the Bush administration. Since taking office, Mr. Wolfowitz has told staff members that he wants to listen to them. He has impressed many with his trips to Africa and advocacy of debt relief for the poorest countries.

But distrust of Mr. Wolfowitz remains high, in part because, according to some, he has not given enough credit to his predecessor, James D. Wolfensohn, who spoke out against corruption and set up the bank's first investigative unit in the late 1990's.

When Mr. Wolfowitz arrived, he acknowledged Mr. Wolfensohn's efforts, but also complained that the fraud unit had more than 300 unresolved cases. He increased its budget nearly 50 percent and appointed a new director. He has also set up a program for companies to disclose bribes they paid in order to avoid sanctions.

Currently, about 330 companies accused of corruption have been barred from bank-financed business or been otherwise penalized. The bank is trying to get nations and other international aid agencies to take similar action.

Mr. Wolfowitz's management style also grates on some bank officials, with a number of them complaining that he has relied on a small coterie of loyal aides. "He presumes," said Mr. Dañino, the former bank senior vice president and once prime minister of Peru, "that anyone who opposes him is either incompetent or corrupt."

But supporters say Mr. Wolfowitz is determined to shake up the bank and was inspired to move on corruption by staff members, especially those posted outside Washington and Europe. They say he has had to battle a mentality that emphasizes loan programs, not crackdowns on corrupt individuals.

"Let's face it, promotion at the World Bank comes from spending money,'' said John Githongo, a onetime campaigner against corruption in Kenya who has fled to safety in Britain and is now an adviser to Mr. Wolfowitz. "If you're in the field, and too many complaints about corruption interrupt the spending, it has an impact on your career trajectory.''

Can Karen Hughes Change America's Image? She's Trying (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke, Roll Call Executive Editor

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

Charlie Wick, the ex-Hollywood agent and producer, took no end of guff when then-President Ronald Reagan appointed him to head the U.S. Information Agency. But Wick proved his critics wrong.

He had Reagan's ear, he had energy, and he understood the importance of communications in Reagan's ideological struggle against communism's "evil empire."

Wick won huge increases in USIA's budget, expanded exchange programs, launched a global satellite television network and founded RadioMarti, which broadcasts to Cuba. Even jaded government bureaucrats ended up cheering his achievements.

Unfortunately, when the Cold War was won and it looked as though ideological struggle was passé, the Clinton administration helped right-wing Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) kill the USIA by folding it into the State Department, where public diplomacy was a backwater.

But now, the Charlie Wick spirit is back in the person of Karen Hughes, President Bush's former White House communications director, who last year became undersecretary of State for public diplomacy.

Critics, as they did with Wick, are laughing at the idea of a presidential crony, an alleged foreign policy naïf, trying to combat an international adversary with images — in this case, fighting terrorists by visiting with Muslim women and getting the president to talk respectfully about Islam.

But, like Wick, Hughes has the president's ear. She has energy. She understands that what people overseas think is a vital part of foreign policy. She's TV-savvy, and she's launched a stream of initiatives designed to improve America's position in what Bush calls "the great ideological struggle of the 21st century."

The initiatives include, for the first time, giving American ambassadors and military commanders overseas a daily, one-page Rapid Response set of talking points on hot topics in the world, encouraging U.S. diplomats to get on television and organizing a top-level interagency committee to combat terrorist ideology.

She also got Bush's former White House personnel chief, Dina Powell, an Egyptian-American, to head up an expanding international exchange program aimed at inviting strategic personalities, such as clerics, teachers and journalists, to visit the United States.

Hughes is planning to launch a large-scale program to foster the teaching of English to children around the world, giving them both a key economic tool and means to access American messaging.

She's in the process of improving U.S. Internet communications, including participation on foreign chat rooms, and has set up three message "hubs" in London, Dubai and Brussels. She's also sending Muslim-Americans on speaking trips abroad.

In a controversial move within the administration, Hughes and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice seem to have persuaded Bush — temporarily, at least — to drop the label "Islamic-fascism" from his speeches; diplomats say that Muslims hear it as an attack on their religion, thereby validating the extremists' false charge that the U.S. is at war with Islam.

Unfortunately, unlike Wick, Hughes is serving as the nation's top propagandist at a time when enemy ideology is ascendant in the world. In Wick's day, communism was headed for the ash heap of history, even if only Reagan recognized the fact at the time.

"I like her and respect her a lot," said one Member of Congress who oversees Hughes' activities. "But what she's doing is like fighting an apartment fire with one hose. In fact, the whole world is on fire."

Bush himself told NBC's Brian Williams last month, "Of course, I worry about America's image. We're great at TV, and yet we are getting crushed on the PR front."

The latest Pew Global Attitudes survey showed that only 21 percent of Jordanians have a favorable attitude toward the U.S., as do 23 percent in Turkey and Pakistan.

A top official at America's two leading broadcasting channels to the Arab world, Radio Sawa and Alhurra television, told me he thinks the U.S. definitely is "losing" the ideological struggle with radical Islam.

For one thing, the U.S. broadcasts no TV to much of the non-Arab Islamic world, relying on radio broadcasts by the Voice of America.

And, even though Sawa and Alhurra are gaining audiences in the Arab world, they are far outdistanced by Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya, which broadcast nonstop anti-U.S. propaganda, much of it almost pornographically drenched in blood and body parts.

A defense contractor, the Braddock Road Group, has given a briefing to various Washington, D.C., officials — the Pentagon says it's classified — showing what jihadist groups broadcast on Arab TV, Islamic Web sites and DVDs.

The message, delivered with continuous scenes of violence, is that the U.S. wants to control Middle East oil, wants to humiliate Muslims and is conducting a "crusade" against Islam.

When I asked Hughes whether she thought the U.S. was losing the ideological war, she said, "I'm an optimistic person. I think we have a long way to go. We have a lot more to do."

Hughes commissioned a huge, 18,000-person poll in 14 countries, which showed high rates of disapproval of the U.S. — but a willingness almost everywhere to change their mind if the U.S. showed respect for their views and values and partnered with them in solving joint problems. Respect for other countries was not a hallmark of Bush's first term. It is becoming more so in the second, thanks in no small part to Rice and Hughes.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House, Senators Bicker Over How To Try Terror Suspects (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0062992

By Margaret Talev And James Rosen
McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush and trio of influential Republican senators appeared headed for a showdown Thursday as they suspended talks on legislation outlining how to try suspected terrorists.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., announced that his panel will meet behind closed doors Thursday to consider legislation that he's sponsoring along with Sens. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and John McCain, R-Ariz. It is opposed by the White House and favored by most Senate Democrats.

Their bill aims to set new rules for military commissions that try detainees; the Bush administration's current approach was invalidated by a June Supreme Court ruling. The administration prefers a competing proposal much like the one the court struck down that's moving through the House of Representatives and is supported by some Senate Republicans.

The biggest point in dispute centers on how to meet U.S. obligations for humane treatment of detainees under the international Geneva Conventions, so that military personnel and intelligence agents who handle detainees will not face potential prosecution for war crimes.

The administration version would give near-blanket legal protection to U.S. officials. The senators insist on setting specific standards governing treatment of detainees to make U.S. law consistent with international law governing treatment of prisoners.

The senators say that the White House proposal gives the impression that the United States is retreating from its treaty commitments, gives the CIA too broad an immunity and sends a message to other nations at war that they can make their own rules.

At an afternoon news conference with Warner and McCain, Graham denounced the White House version in no uncertain terms.

"This whole thing has been just one mess after another," he said. "It started with Abu Ghraib. How many more times do we need to create legislation that's defective, that's going to confuse people, that's got not a snowball's chance in hell of passing Supreme Court muster?" said Graham, a military lawyer.

"Now are we going to start being the first country in the world that changes the Geneva Conventions so the secret police programs of those nations will be OK? I mean, look how that would unravel.

"Every senator and congressman should understand, this is not about November 2006, this is not about your reelection. It's about those who take risks to defend America," said Graham.

Two hours later, in an unusual move that signaled the high stakes at play, intelligence czar John Negroponte held an evening telephone conference call with invited reporters, saying that the senators' legislation would bring his operation to its knees.

"This will not allow for the CIA's high-value terrorist detention program . . . to go forward," Negroponte said. While President Bush said earlier this month that all captives held under the program have been transferred to military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, he also made clear that his administration believes the CIA detainee program is essential to the war on terror and they want license to continue it.

He said the senators' bill fails to clarify U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which he said have vague standards about "cruel, inhumane or degrading" treatment of detainees in U.S. custody.

"Regrettably, the draft legislation that is before the Senate Armed Services Committee at the moment doesn't offer the kind of clarity and clarification that we believe is necessary with regard to these international obligations of ours," Negroponte said.

A senior intelligence official speaking on condition of anonymity said the Bush administration is concerned about protecting CIA interrogators from criminal or civil lawsuits.

"You're putting an additional burden on these people who should be worried about getting critical intelligence to protect America," the official said.

The developments Wednesday followed days of unsuccessful efforts to find middle ground, although both sides have said they thought compromises were within reach on terms of sharing evidence with the accused and on admissibility of hearsay evidence before military tribunals, two early sticking points. Last week top military lawyers, breaking with the administration, said it was imperative defendants hear evidence brought against them.

Warner said he still hopes an agreement can be reached.

Panel In Senate Backs Bush Plan For Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — The White House took a critical step on Wednesday in its effort to get Congressional blessing for President Bush's domestic eavesdropping program, but it ran into increasingly fierce resistance from leading Republicans over its plan to try terror suspects being held in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The mixed results signaled the tough road the White House faces in trying to sell the two key planks in its national security agenda to sometimes skeptical Congressional Republicans less than two months before the midterm elections.

Democrats have allowed Republicans to fight among themselves over the issues, and appear willing to allow the issues to come to a vote rather than risk charges of political obstructionism in an election season.

The White House has turned its focus to Capitol Hill as part of a broad push to shift the public debate toward national security and away from Iraq. After kicking off the campaign in a series of recent speeches, Mr. Bush is scheduled to visit Capitol Hill on Thursday morning to rally support for his proposals.

On the domestic eavesdropping program, strong White House lobbying began to pay dividends on Wednesday as the Senate Judiciary Committee approved on a party-line vote two legislative approaches favored by the White House, along with a third the Bush administration opposes. The program would allow the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without a warrant on the international phone calls and e-mail of people in the United States.

But negotiations between Capitol Hill and the White House broke down as three Republican senators crucial to passage of the legislation hardened their stance against a White House plan that would reinterpret a main provision of the Geneva Conventions.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said the committee would vote Thursday in a closed session on an alternative that he and his two chief allies — Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona — have championed, even if the White House refuses to go along with them. The senators have said changes to the American interpretation of the provision of the Geneva Conventions, known as Common Article 3, would undermine the nation's international credibility and open the way for other countries to treat captured American troops at their whim.

"This is not about November 2006. It is not about your election. It is about those who take risks to defend America," Mr. Graham said.

The administration pushed back, convening a conference call in which John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, described the Senate alternative as unacceptable. Mr. Negroponte said the plan would impose intolerable limits on any interrogation methods American intelligence officers might use against future terror suspects held by the Central Intelligence Agency in secret overseas prisons.

Dan Bartlett, a senior aide to Mr. Bush, said the dispute with the Senate Republicans "may require us to go our different ways for now and try to come back in conference."

The House appears on track to endorse the White House proposal, with the House Armed Services Committee voting overwhelmingly on Wednesday in favor of a bill that looks much like the president's.

The White House political strategy in the past week has been twofold: first, putting Mr. Bush in the public spotlight with a string of national security speeches, and now, trying to put Democrats in a box by forcing them to take a stand and vote on Mr. Bush's authority to run two of his most controversial antiterror programs.

But Senators Warner, McCain and Graham appeared to be providing cover for the Democrats, allowing them to stay on the sidelines while the three senators, respected Republicans with distinguished military records, take on the White House.

"We think that this is a sincere effort, based on principle, by Senators Warner, McCain and Graham, to come up with the best legislation they can," said Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island and a member of the Armed Services Committee.

Asked whether Democrats were worried that the Republicans might yield to the White House, Mr. Reed said: "I haven't seen any evidence of that yet. What I've seen is that they're approaching this looking at the substance, not just over weeks and months, but what's in the best interests of the United States, what's in the best interests of American military personnel who might years from now be held."

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, has been pushing the administration's point of view, and Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, has said he may bring the president's legislation to the floor, rather than the one backed by the three senators.

Mr. Warner and his allies have warned that if that happens, they will introduce amendments to make the president's legislation look like theirs. The senators have military leaders on their side, and in a letter sent to the Armed Services Committee on Thursday, 27 retired military leaders urged Congress to reject the White House proposal to reinterpret the definition of Common Article 3.

The letter said the proposal "poses a grave threat to American service members, now and in future wars," noting that American troops are now deployed in areas where the article is their only source of protection if they are captured.

"If degradation, humiliation, physical and mental brutalization of prisoners is decriminalized or considered permissible under a restrictive interpretation of Common Article 3,'' the letter warned, "we will forfeit all credible objections should such barbaric practices be inflicted upon American prisoners."

The administration had also faced resistance over the N.S.A. wiretapping program. The Democrats had bottled up the administration's proposals, saying Congress was being forced to legislate "in the dark" about a secret program that few members had been briefed on. They have repeatedly used procedural maneuvers to block the proposals from coming to a vote in the Judiciary Committee, drawing accusations of obstructionism from Republicans.

But Democrats, who appeared to realize the risk of being accused of thwarting debate on national security matters, did not stand in the way of the committee vote on Wednesday.

With Republicans united in support, the panel approved on a 10-to-8 vote a hotly debated plan drawn in negotiations with the White House by Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the committee chairman. The plan would allow a secret court to rule on the constitutionality of the wiretapping program. It would also implicitly recognize the president's constitutional authority to gather foreign intelligence, a concession Democrats and civil rights advocates contend would expand the president's authority to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant.

The panel also approved a proposal by Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, that would require the administration to notify Congress when it conducted wiretaps without a warrant.

Democrats claimed a partial victory on the wiretapping issue when they won Judiciary Committee approval of another measure that could effectively ban the security agency's eavesdropping program.

That plan, drafted by Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, would affirm that the foreign intelligence law passed by Congress in 1978, requiring court approval for eavesdropping, as the "exclusive" means of authorizing wiretaps in the United States against suspected terrorists and spies.

Democrats succeeded in getting two Republican moderates, Mr. Specter and Mr. Graham, both of whom had voiced concerns over the legal aspects of the wiretapping program, to vote in favor of the proposal and send it to the full Senate.

That set the stage for the unusual spectacle of the Judiciary Committee — and its chairman — supporting two proposals that many lawmakers said would effectively nullify each other if passed.

Negotiations On Terror Bill Snag (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 13, 2006

The White House and three powerful GOP senators reached an impasse Wednesday over a Bush administration plan to allow tough CIA interrogations, underscoring election-season divisions among Republicans on the high profile issue of security.

In a direct challenge to President Bush, Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said his panel would meet Thursday to finalize an alternative to the White House plan to prosecute terror suspects and redefine acts that constitute war crimes. Warner, R-Va., said the administration proposal would lower the standard for the treatment of prisoners, potentially putting U.S. troops at risk should other countries retaliate.

The White House said Warner's proposal would undermine the nation's ability to interrogate prisoners and arranged an extraordinary conference call with reporters in which the nation's top intelligence official criticized Warner's plan.

"If this draft legislation were passed in its present form, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency has told me that he did not believe that the (interrogation) program could go forward," National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said.

GOP In Standoff On Gitmo Rights (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Senate Republicans appear hopelessly deadlocked over President Bush's proposal for handling terrorism suspects detained at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Three Republicans -- Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- remain holed up with Democrats, who are adamant that the prisoners be given broader civil rights than are included in the administration's proposed bill. Most Senate Republicans support the administration's view that the requested changes would limit intelligence gathering and expose classified information to terrorists.

The Senate Armed Services Committee, which is chaired by Mr. Warner and includes Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham, will take up the bill behind closed doors today and likely make the modifications that Mr. Bush and other Republicans find unacceptable.

Late yesterday, White House officials began calling Republicans on Capitol Hill to say that they have offered to negotiate about as far as they can. The White House is expected to issue some sort of official statement sometime today on where it stands.

If the committee alters the original bill today, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is expected to bypass the committee and introduce the administration's proposed bill in the coming days and move it directly to the floor. There, amendments will be offered and public votes recorded.

In addition to advancing their campaign against terrorism, Republicans had expected the legislation to create political headaches for Democrats, who could be tarred in the final 7½ weeks before November's elections as soft on terrorism for wanting to grant terror suspects greater civil rights. But Mr. Warner, Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham have muddied the issue, and Democrats have largely stayed out of the fight.

The trio also has aided Democrats in another of the year's biggest political fights, over illegal immigration.

But for a handful of Republicans -- led by Mr. McCain and including Mr. Warner and Mr. Graham -- the Republican Congress would likely have long ago approved tough border-security legislation over the objections of most Democrats. This would have been a tremendous boon to Republicans since illegal immigration has proved to be among their most effective campaign issues.

Instead, the Republican Senate approved a bill that would create a path to citizenship for some 10 million illegal aliens and authorize hundreds of thousands of new foreign laborers through a new guest-worker program. The Republican House, meanwhile, has approved tough border-security legislation. And since neither side has budged, the Republican-controlled Congress has failed to enact tough legislation against illegal immigration.

Senators To Challenge Bush Plan For Terror Trials (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And David Jackson

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A trio of influential Republican senators today plans to challenge President Bush's proposal to put terror suspects on trial, a day after a House panel approved the administrative initiative.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said Wednesday his panel will consider legislation to provide more legal rights for detainees than the White House proposal. He and his allies contend that denying those rights will put U.S. troops at risk if they are captured overseas and diminish the nation's moral authority.

“I have lost friends in this war. I do want to bring these people to justice,” Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., told USA TODAY and Gannett News Service reporters. “But I can't say it enough. If we start acting like our enemy, we're going to lose.”

Warner's announcement that his panel would begin drafting a rival bill came after marathon talks between the GOP senators and the White House produced no deal. Warner said he still hopes to avoid a confrontation on the Senate floor. “I still think we can work it through,” he said. “I do not think negotiations have broken down.”

The senator's decision to go forward puts the president at odds with key members of his party. They are Warner, a former Navy secretary; Graham, a military lawyer and Air Force reservist; and Sen. John McCain, an ex-naval aviator who spent nearly six years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam.

The House Armed Services Committee approved Bush's plan Wednesday and rejected a proposal similar to Warner's on a party-line vote. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has scheduled a House vote for next week.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino expressed hope that “we'll be able to reach resolution” with Bush's Senate critics.

At issue is the timing and procedure for trials of terror suspects, including 14 “high-value” detainees such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the 9/11 attacks. Mohammed and other 9/11 suspects are being held at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Bush confirmed last week that they had been interrogated by the CIA at secret prisons.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that an earlier administration plan did not give defendants the legal protections required by the U.S. military code and international law.

The three “problem areas,” Graham said, are proposals to deny defendants' access to classified information, a proposal that would permit the use of evidence obtained through coercion or other methods, and setting rules for CIA interrogations consistent with international law.

Graham and other critics said the Bush plan would weaken international treaties protecting the rights of military prisoners. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte said the senators' plan would prevent the CIA from interrogating terror suspects.

The debate is dividing Republicans. “The American people are not going to provide terrorists with the same kinds of access to justice that American citizens are provided,” Boehner said.

Graham argued Bush's plan would send a defendant to death row with the declaration, “we can't tell you what you did, but trust us, it was bad.”

Senate-Panel Republicans Break With Bush Over A Tribunal Bill (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Breaking with the White House, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner will move ahead with military-tribunal legislation that denies President Bush's request to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

The director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, said the proposal would force the Central Intelligence Agency to halt its "high value" detainee program focused on collecting intelligence from captured al Qaeda leaders. But Mr. Warner predicted his panel will report the bill today, posing a serious challenge to Mr. Bush's pre-election national-security agenda.

The action came as the House Armed Services Committee voted to approve a tribunal bill more to the liking of the CIA. But on a second front, warrantless wiretapping, the administration faced difficulties in both chambers. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.) abruptly postponed a markup until next week; the Senate Judiciary Committee approved not just a Bush-backed bill, but two separate and sometimes contradictory, proposals.

Mr. Bush comes to Capitol Hill today to meet with Republicans on his agenda, and a new Wall Street Journal/NBC poll suggests his rhetoric has succeeded in lifting voters' preference for Republicans over Democrats on handling terrorism. (See the story1.) But having raised the bar, his party must now deliver legislation or risk the perception that, as with a proposed overhaul of immigration laws, it isn't effective in power.

The dispute over military tribunals follows the Supreme Court's June ruling striking down Bush administration rules to prosecute suspected terrorists without granting them traditional rights found in courts-martial. The court said the tribunals violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and Geneva Conventions, and lawmakers are clearly troubled by what exemptions they should permit, now that the White House has come to Congress asking for the legal authority to proceed.

Chairman Warner, supported by Sens. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), said it was crucial to avoid a second adverse court ruling that would hurt the "credibility of this country." He has begun to reach out to the State Department in an apparent effort to soften the opposition from CIA Director Michael Hayden. And Mr. Graham said Congress must view the legislation as "a chance to start over and reassert ourselves as a rule-of-law nation in the eyes of the world."

Mr. Negroponte said the administration's only goal was to clarify U.S. obligations under the Geneva prisoner-protection accords. Mr. Graham said the language sought by the White House "goes too far" and would be seen by other countries as "reneging" on treaty obligations and thereby endangering U.S. personnel who may be held prisoner overseas.

"If they prevail, we could end up with a decent bill," said Senate Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois, who is sympathetic with Mr. Warner and his Republican allies. But Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) is sure to use his floor powers to make passage harder -- and potentially meld the tribunal issue with a grant of broad wiretapping authority.

That would put Senate Democrats back in an awkward spot, forced to either filibuster or accept the package to avoid political blame before the election. "There's our Faustian choice," Mr. Durbin says.

But for Republicans, too, the warrantless-wiretapping issue is thorny, as seen yesterday in the House. Responding to the White House, Rep. Heather Wilson (R., N.M.), a chief sponsor, said she was prepared to give the administration more latitude to carry out wiretaps if there should be a threat of "imminent attack." But yesterday, it was the more libertarian conservatives on the Judiciary Committee who were most restless, saying the bill already goes too far.

"You have to have a balance here," Ms. Wilson said. "You can't just say the executive will take care of us. You have to set what the parameters are."

Warrantless Wiretapping Bill Stalls In House (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Judiciary Committee, with one eye on the midterm elections, abruptly canceled a session today to enact a bill giving President Bush board authority for his warrantless domestic wiretapping program — even as Republicans in the Senate pushed a similar eavesdropping bill toward a vote on the floor.

Bush plans a personal and rare visit to the Hill on Thursday to confer with House Republicans, who are feeling political pressure to distance themselves from an unpopular president and an unpopular war in Iraq.

Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), one of the GOP incumbents facing stiff opposition from an antiwar challenger, is sponsoring a bill that would require the president to wait until an attack has occurred to initiate wiretapping without warrants — a provision the Bush administration argues would hamper the government's ability to thwart terrorist attacks.

The argument between the president and his beleaguered fellow Republicans in the House comes less than two months before the midterm elections, when many observers believe that Democrats have a chance to topple House Republicans from power for the first time in 12 years.

"We need to use our intelligence tools to listen to our enemies," said Wilson, whose bill has been endorsed by House GOP leaders. "We also need to make sure checks are in place to prevent those tools from being used inappropriately against Americans."

With politicians in both parties eager not to appear to be giving the president a blank check, behind-the-scenes negotiations remain intense.

In the Senate Judiciary Committee today, several amendments were offered to curb a president's powers, including a one-year expiration date on the bill and a demand that the National Security Agency report more often to Congress on how and why it selects domestic surveillance targets.

The White House argues that warrantless wiretaps are needed to stay one step ahead of terrorists, who have become more sophisticated about using disposable cellphones and other technologies that defy detection.

"If Al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, we need to know why, in order to stop attacks," Bush said in a speech this week.

But administration officials parading to the Hill this week have encountered resistance from politically vulnerable Republicans under pressure from war-weary voters to put limits on domestic surveillance without court warrants.

"It is popular to have bills that are not White House bills," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee that today passed a version of the president's proposal without amendments.

Reflecting how members are hedging their bets, the Judiciary Committee approved three FISA-related bills, including the one that Specter worked out with the White House.

A competing bill sponsored by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) — and also sponsored by Specter — was endorsed by the committee. It would largely keep the 1978 law creating the FISA court intact, but give the administration more time to prepare emergency warrants.

"We just don't want to see Americans' rights abused for the next 50 or 60 years because of an oversight on our part," Feinstein said.

The bills are expected to come to the Senate floor next week.

A Self-Inflicted Defeat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

President Bush did a public service last week by finally explaining the importance of interrogation as an intelligence tool against terrorists. But we also wish he would have been more candid with Americans about the restrictions that have been put on interrogating even the very worst terrorists.

A major reason is an amendment pushed through Congress last year by John McCain. The Senator's amendment, which Mr. Bush agreed to over Vice President Dick Cheney's objections, established the Army Field Manual as the first and last word on Defense Department interrogations; it also banned "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment." We appreciate Mr. McCain's moral authority on the subject, and this policy may sound innocuous.

But it was based on false premises amid the firestorm over Abu Ghraib, and it may well harm our ability to break the next Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. The central falsehood was the assertion that detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib resulted from "confusion" about the rules of interrogation -- never mind that nine courts martial and multiple investigations found the abuses weren't related to interrogations at all.

Equally erroneous was the suggestion that internal Administration debates on handling high-level al Qaeda detainees like KSM contributed to the alleged confusion. The idea, apparently, was that U.S. officials and commanders were too dense to distinguish -- as the Geneva Conventions do -- between legitimate prisoners of war (who may not be aggressively interrogated) and unlawful combatants (who can be). So the only way to prevent "torture" was to establish uniform rules for all. * * *

A year later we're sorry to report that the McCain Amendment is creating obstacles to getting actionable intelligence via interrogation. The Army has released a new version of its Field Manual, which is available on the Internet for all to see. And the Manual makes it plain that Iraqi and Afghan insurgents can expect gentler treatment than common criminals get from American police.

In only one respect does the Field Manual recognize any difference between lawful and unlawful combatants: The latter may be separated from their compatriots. Otherwise, terrorists who have violated the rules of war by targeting civilians and fighting out of uniform are to be treated exactly like POWs and considered honorable fighters who have a right to keep their secrets.

So Iraqi and Afghan insurgents won't even face the prospect of your average good cop/bad cop routine. The manual allows for a watered down version called "Mutt and Jeff" in which interrogators can affect different personalities. But the Manual admonishes strongly that the intelligence "collector must be extremely careful that he does not threaten or coerce a source. Conveying a threat may be a violation of the UCMJ [Uniform Code of Military Justice]." We kid you not. "Mutt and Jeff" is the worst that Abu Musab al Zarqawi could have expected from the Pentagon had he been captured alive.

And what if he had been turned over to the CIA? The permissible methods for the spy agency remain classified, and on a visit to our offices last week Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would say only that the CIA would engage in no conduct that "shocks the conscience." He added that this concept was context-dependent, since the "shock" threshold may be higher with the likes of KSM -- who planned 9/11 -- than for ordinary detainees. At least we hope it is.

In theory, this means there's still room to employ some of the aggressive techniques -- such as stress positions, sleep deprivation, temperature extremes -- that have been used successfully against al Qaeda bigwigs. But in practice we fear those approaches are a thing of the past. Reports that CIA interrogators have been buying legal insurance in the expectation of future prosecution are another way of saying that they will no longer use aggressive methods that could be second-guessed on Capitol Hill. (See John Kerry's revealing letter nearby.)

Like any careful bureaucracy, the CIA will also now be asking for constant legal guidance from the Justice Department. Few Justice attorneys will be eager to offer robust advice after watching a fine lawyer like John Yoo run out of polite society for authoring the so-called "torture memos" that allowed us to break KSM.

All of this has to be counted a severe setback for the war effort if Mr. Bush is right that interrogations have played a key role in the antiterror fight and that "tough" methods are sometimes necessary. Last year ABC news reported that 11 top al Qaeda figures broke only after "waterboarding," which induces a feeling of suffocation and is the most controversial of the known techniques employed.

There's a legitimate debate to be had over waterboarding and other tactics. But part of our problem with the McCain Amendment was that Congressmen refused to engage in an honest debate lest they be accused of approving "torture," which no one sanctions but is a word used to slur anyone who wants aggressive interrogation.

The result was legislation that may have made everyone feel better after Abu Ghraib, but that also probably undermines our ability to get vital information from the next KSM we capture. That ability will be further damaged if the Administration's interrogation flexibility is again limited during current negotiations on Capitol Hill over the treatment of detainees. We hope the next "9/11" commission doesn't have to explain why the U.S. stopped employing interrogation methods that were both lawful and successful.

A Crucial Choice (WP)

The Senate must decide whether to ratify the president's abuse of human rights law -- or restore decency.

IN DECIDING BETWEEN the two main proposals for handling and trying accused terrorists, the Senate confronts a fateful choice: Will it send President Bush, as he demands, legislation that would authorize the CIA to engage in interrogation tactics the world understands as torture, rewrite America's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, and authorize trials whose fairness many people at home and abroad will question? Or will the Senate approve a bill that ensures justice for foreign detainees and ends the CIA's secret detentions and harsh interrogations? The White House is pulling out all the stops to get the former. The question now is whether the group of Republicans who have courageously pushed a competing bill -- John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.) -- will be able to team up with other moderate Republicans and Democrats to stop the excesses that have so damaged America's standing in the world.

The senators' latest draft has changed a bit over the past several days -- in some respects for the better, in one big respect for the worse. It now includes a provision stripping the federal courts of jurisdiction over lawsuits -- including pending suits -- involving detainees. This is a bad measure that would reduce badly needed oversight and judicial review of detentions and trials. But any backsliding in the Senate bill pales in comparison with what Mr. Bush is seeking. The Senate's bill would still require compliance with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions -- which prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees and, as the administration has acknowledged, cannot be reconciled with holding inmates in secret prisons and interrogating them using techniques that cause severe pain or extreme fear and humiliation. The senators would also require military trials to proceed under rules that preserve rights democracies have recognized for centuries -- such as the ability of defendants to be present at trial and to know and confront the evidence against them.

By contrast, the administration is still seeking a bill that would define Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in such a way as to permit the CIA to continue abusive practices that in the past have included induced hypothermia and "waterboarding," or simulated drowning. The administration bill would also authorize commission trials in which the defendant, under certain circumstances, might not see evidence on which his life may depend and could be convicted by statements extracted in highly coercive interrogations.

It is essential that this not pass. For Congress to "interpret" the Geneva Conventions in such a way as to authorize something they clearly forbid would be to invite other countries to do the same -- to American troops. To authorize trials that needlessly depart from international norms will only invite skepticism about the convictions they deliver, further degrade the United States in the eyes of the world, and make martyrs of those condemned to prison or death. Cooperation with allies, vital to stopping future terrorist attacks, will be seriously impeded.

Having finally been forced by the Supreme Court to take responsibility for writing law to govern the war on terrorism, Congress will now decide whether it simply means to sign off on the administration's past abuses, or reaffirm fundamental American values.

The Stranger In The Mirror (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

We had elections in New York and around the country on Tuesday. But it seems to me that the biggest issue of our time is getting very short shrift from the politicians, and that's the fact that the very character of the United States is changing, and not for the better.

One of the things that stands out in my mind amid the memories of the carnage and chaos of Sept. 11, 2001, is the eerie quiet — an almost prayerful quiet — that hovered over a scene on the western edge of Manhattan that afternoon.

I stood for a long time outside the triage center that had been set up at the Chelsea Piers sports and entertainment complex. Sunlight glistened off the roofs of ambulances lined up in military fashion on the West Side Highway. Doctors, nurses and other medical personnel were standing by, waiting for what they thought would be the arrival of legions of seriously wounded victims in need of emergency care.

There seemed to be very little talking. As I recall, most of the people maintained a kind of stunned, awed silence.

The expected onslaught of victims never came. As the afternoon faded, I headed east, along with others, toward the morgue at Bellevue Hospital.

What I thought was the greatest expression of the American character in my lifetime occurred in the immediate aftermath of those catastrophic attacks. The country came together in the kind of resolute unity that I imagined was similar to the feeling most Americans felt after Pearl Harbor. We soon knew who the enemy was, and there was remarkable agreement on what needed to be done. Americans were united and the world was with us.

For a brief moment.

The invasion of Iraq marked the beginning of the change in the American character. During the Cuban missile crisis, when the hawks were hot for bombing — or an invasion — Robert Kennedy counseled against a U.S. first strike. That's not something the U.S. would do, he said.

Fast-forward 40 years or so and not only does the U.S. launch an unprovoked invasion and occupation of a small nation — Iraq — but it does so in response to an attack inside the U.S. that the small nation had nothing to do with.

Who are we?

Another example: There was a time, I thought, when there was general agreement among Americans that torture was beyond the pale. But when people are frightened enough, nothing is beyond the pale. And we're in an era in which the highest leaders in the land stoke — rather than attempt to allay — the fears of ordinary citizens. Islamic terrorists are equated with Nazi Germany. We're told that we're in a clash of civilizations.

If, as President Bush says, we're engaged in "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century," why isn't the entire nation mobilizing to meet this dire threat?

The president put us on this path away from the better angels of our nature, and he has shown no inclination to turn back. Lately he has touted legislation to try terror suspects in a way that would make a mockery of the American ideals of justice and fairness. To get a sense of just how far out the administration's approach has been, consider the comments of Brig. Gen. James Walker, the top uniformed lawyer for the Marines. Speaking at a Congressional hearing last week, he said no civilized country denies defendants the right to see the evidence against them. The United States, he said, "should not be the first."

DOJ_NMG_0063000

And Senator Lindsey Graham, a conservative South Carolina Republican who is a former military judge, said, “It would be unacceptable, legally, in my opinion, to give someone the death penalty in a trial where they never heard the evidence against them.”

How weird is it that this possibility could even be considered?

The character of the U.S. has changed. We’re in danger of being completely ruled by fear. Most Americans have not shared the burden of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Very few Americans are aware, as the Center for Constitutional Rights tells us, that of the hundreds of men held by the U.S. in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, many “have never been charged and will never be charged because there is no evidence justifying their detention.”

Even fewer care.

We could benefit from looking in a mirror, and absorbing the shock of not recognizing what we’ve become.

GOP Leaders Back Bush On Wiretapping, Tribunals (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Congress's Republican leadership yesterday threw its weight behind two of President Bush's most controversial national security programs, warrantless wiretapping and extrajudicial military tribunals.

But the party leaders are having trouble getting all their members on board, including the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. And by backing the president's legislative demands, the leadership risks being labeled by Democrats as a rubber stamp for an unpopular president.

With prodding from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10 to 8 along party lines to approve a bill negotiated with the White House to allow -- but not require -- Bush to submit the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program to a secret court for constitutional review.

That bill, which could come before the Senate next week, is considered by many to be a ratification of the administration's current surveillance program, which monitors the overseas phone calls and e-mails of some Americans when one party is suspected of links to terrorism. The program has been attacked by Democrats and civil liberties advocates as an excessive encroachment on Americans' privacy.

"The committee took the important step of acknowledging the president's constitutional authority to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), an ardent Bush ally.

At the same time, the House Armed Services Committee voted 52 to 8 to ratify the White House's version of legislation creating military commissions for trying terrorism suspects. The measure would give Bush the authority he seeks to withhold classified evidence from defendants, admit testimony that defendants might maintain was coerced, and protect U.S. intelligence agents from legal action over their interrogation methods. House Republican leaders plan to bring the tribunal bill to a vote next week.

Committee action and the scheduling of floor time represented tangible progress for the administration and turned what had been essentially a heated policy debate into a legislative showdown. But if GOP leaders intended to use the bills to distinguish Republicans from Democrats on the conduct of the fight against terrorism, they had their share of problems.

Frist and other GOP leaders remain at odds with many of their rank-and-file members over their military commission bill.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) are holding firm against the White House and Frist in their support of an alternative tribunal bill that would limit the use of classified evidence and coerced testimony in terrorism prosecutions while maintaining broader protections for detainees against cruel and inhumane treatment. They said they will press ahead with their bill, despite the political sensitivity of the controversy in a key election year.

"Every senator and congressman should understand this is not about November 2006. This is not about your reelection," Graham said. "This is about those who take risks to defend America."

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, in an unusual conference call with reporters yesterday evening to express opposition to the dissident Senate bill, said the CIA had told him that, if that bill passes, the agency will not be able to continue its "high-value terrorist detention program."

The existence of that program, known unofficially as the CIA's secret prison system, was confirmed last week by Bush, but all its prisoners were transferred to military custody. Negroponte said that under the Senate's proposed rules, the program's effectiveness would be so curtailed that continuing it would not make sense.

McCain expressed bewilderment at an administration stand that he said would tamper with interpretations of the Geneva Conventions on the conduct of war. That stand is firmly opposed by top military lawyers. "The overwhelming majority of retired military people are weighing in on this issue and saying, 'Don't amend Common Article 3 [of the Geneva Conventions] because then you are allowing other nations' " to conclude that they, too, can change the conventions, McCain said.

McCain and his allies were unable to persuade White House negotiators to agree that an alleged enemy combatant could not be convicted on the basis of classified information that is not shared in some form with the defendant. "We're still gridlocked on that," McCain said. "They want to turn 200 years of criminal procedure on its head."

In the House, the Judiciary Committee was forced to scrap a planned drafting of a warrantless surveillance bill, in part because nearly half a dozen Republican conservatives were in open rebellion against GOP leaders' efforts to weaken controls on the eavesdropping program.

"There are enough Republicans with concerns," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who was pushing bipartisan legislation that would all but scuttle the warrantless surveillance program. "Once you basically give the president this authority, it's very difficult to pull it back. That's very shortsighted just to point out the differences between Republicans and Democrats."

Such internal dissension did not sit well with an orchestrated push to elevate the profile of the national security debate ahead of the Nov. 7 midterm elections. GOP leaders seized on week-old comments by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that suggested that the capture of Osama bin Laden would not "make us safer." Republicans launched a blizzard of e-mailed statements condemning the comments, culminating in a news conference yesterday.

Democrats noted that Pelosi's comments mirrored sentiments expressed by Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and even Vice President Cheney last weekend, when he told Tim Russert on NBC's "Meet the Press": "He's not the only source of the problem, obviously, Tim. If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda."

The second GOP track is to label military commissions "terrorist tribunals" and attack Democrats for opposing them. House Republican leadership aides acknowledged that the biggest roadblock to the president's military commissions is coming from Senate Republicans.

Democrats used the GOP's allegiance to the Bush security agenda to redouble efforts to tie vulnerable Republicans to the president.

"The role of Congress is to bring to bear its own independent judgment, to represent the American people and to forge policy, not to simply be a complacent rubber stamp for the president of the United States," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

NSA Court Review Bill Is Sent To Full Senate (USAT)

USA Today, September 14, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved President Bush's proposal to enable a secret court created in 1978 to review a program in which the National Security Agency conducts warrantless surveillance of international calls and e-mails of people in the USA when one party to the conversation may be linked to terrorists. All 10 Republicans voted to send the bill to the full Senate; all eight Democrats opposed it.

Republicans defeated Democratic amendments to insert a one-year expiration date and require the NSA to report more often to Congress on the program.

Port security bill advances in Senate

The Senate rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of provisions to legislation intended to protect seaports from terrorist attack. The proposals are part of a Democratic security plan that includes improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, called them a “hodgepodge of provisions that are irrelevant” to port security. The additions could have stalled the overall port security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. The devices are designed to detect materials used in nuclear arms or dirty bombs, which use conventional explosives to strew radioactive waste.

Bill to curb Indian casinos fails in House

A Republican proposal to curb the growth of Indian gambling operations failed in the House. The bill would prohibit tribes from building casinos away from their reservations. The vote was 247-171 in favor of the measure, but the expedited rules under which it was considered require a two-thirds majority for passage.

Gambling operations by the nation's nearly 225 casino-operating tribes have become a $22 billion-a-year industry, richer than Nevada casinos.

U.S. and Europe disagree on Iran

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iran's cancellation of a meeting planned for today with European officials shows that it is not serious about suspending its nuclear program. At the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, the United States said it's time for the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran for continuing its banned enrichment of uranium. European countries favored more diplomacy. Chief British delegate John McGregor delivered a joint statement with

DOJ_NMG_0063002

France and Germany that asks Iran to comply with its obligations and negotiate an end to the dispute. Enriched uranium can be used to make nuclear weapons or to fuel power plants. Iran says its program is only for electricity.

Plame sues former No. 2 at State Dept.

Former CIA officer Valerie Plame added former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage as a defendant in her lawsuit accusing Bush administration officials of blowing her cover as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence. Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, filed the original suit against Vice President Cheney, his former chief of staff, I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, and White House aide Karl Rove. The new filing says Armitage's disclosure, which he says was inadvertent, was independent of the alleged conspiracy. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has said no one would be charged with knowingly identifying a covert CIA officer, but Libby is charged with lying to Fitzgerald's federal investigators.

Senate Panel Clears Terror Surveillance Legislation (Update2) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, September 14, 2006

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- A Senate panel approved legislation on a party-line vote authorizing President George W. Bush's domestic eavesdropping program with court review.

The measure, approved by a 10-8 vote in the Republican- controlled Senate Judiciary Committee, now goes to the full Senate, where Republican leaders plan to hold a vote before lawmakers leave next month to campaign for the November elections.

The measure would authorize a secret court to rule on the legality of the National Security Agency's program to listen to the international calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and their suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants.

``There has been no one who has asked for the National Security Agency to stop the surveillance of the international terrorists," said Texas Senator John Cornyn, one of 10 Republicans who supported the legislation.

Bush agreed to the measure's wording in negotiations with Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel. By a series of 10-8 votes, the Republican-controlled committee defeated efforts by Democrats to change it.

The panel did approve a competing proposal, backed by Democrats, that would streamline existing law to allow the eavesdropping with warrants. Specter, who voted to send the Democratic proposal to the Senate, predicted that the Republican-backed version he negotiated with the president would win final approval.

Separately, the House Judiciary Committee postponed a vote on a measure sponsored by Representative Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican, that would be in conflict with the Senate legislation.

Secret Court

Specter's legislation wouldn't require Bush to submit the NSA program to a secret court for review. Still, the president agreed to do so if Congress passes the measure in the form approved today in the committee. The president wouldn't have to stop the eavesdropping program even if the court objects.

The measure would also provide for appeals of the secret court's ruling to the Supreme Court.

Democrats such as Wisconsin Senator Russell Feingold voted against the measure, arguing it would legalize Bush's flouting of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the president to seek court approved warrants to wiretap suspected spies and terrorists.

``We are confronted by a president who is breaking the law," Feingold said. ``What we would be doing by this legislation is institutionalizing and legislating the putting into law of the land the president walking all over us," he said.

Democrats also complained that Bush has refused to give lawmakers sufficient information about the program. Bush's refusal forces Congress to legislate ``almost in complete darkness" on the issue, Feingold said.

Inherent Authority

The Bush administration contends that the Constitution gives the president inherent authority as commander of the armed forces to conduct the eavesdropping program without judicial review.

Bush's surveillance program, ordered after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, is merely an exercise of military power to ``conduct intelligence activities and surveillance that has existed in the country since George Washington," Cornyn said.

Specter called his legislation an effort ``to find a way to have judicial review" of the program.

He and South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham joined the panel's eight Democrats in voting to send to the Senate the competing measure that would require the president to seek individual warrants for the surveillance.

Emergency Wiretaps

The measure, sponsored by Senator Dianne Feinstein, would allow the president to conduct emergency wiretaps without warrants for up to seven days before seeking court permission. Current law allows the attorney general to order emergency wiretapping for up to three days.

Feinstein, who has been briefed on the NSA program as a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, argued that the eavesdropping could be conducted within the legal structure Congress set up in 1978 to authorize wiretapping to gather information on enemy agents and spies.

Her measure would streamline the procedures by giving the attorney general authority to empower intelligence officials to initiate emergency wiretapping without warrants. Current law requires the attorney general or his designate to order such eavesdropping.

Preserve

It would also preserve a clause of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act stating that that law is the exclusive authority for such wiretapping.

Congress enacted the law to correct abuses of wiretapping in the 1960s and 1970s uncovered by congressional investigations that found the Federal Bureau of Investigation spied on activists protesting the Vietnam War and other political dissidents who posed no threat to security.

Feinstein said her measure was designed to protect the privacy of Americans' phone calls and e-mails. ``We don't want to see Americans rights abused for the next 50 to 60 years," Feinstein said.

The language Specter negotiated with Bush would repeal that provision and legalize any warrantless wiretapping ordered by a president since Congress enacted the surveillance law 28 years ago.

The committee also approved a measure sponsored by Ohio Republican Mike DeWine that would require the president to explain to Congress why he was continuing to wiretap suspected terrorists without warrants.

DeWine described his measure as ``complementary, not contradictory" to the language Bush negotiated with Specter. Under the measure, the president would be allowed to conduct the surveillance before obtaining evidence sufficient to get warrants.

Trial For 2 Men In Terror Case Begins (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- A defense attorney attacked the credibility of an FBI informant who posed as an arms dealer in a fictitious plot to kill a Pakistani diplomat, as the trial of two men accused of supporting terrorism began Wednesday.

Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner, and Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque where Hossain is a member, are accused of supporting terrorism through a series of financial transactions from 2003-04.

The informant told the suspects he was an arms dealer and asked Hossain to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill the diplomat in New York City, according to the federal complaint.

"He's a convicted felon. He's a con man. He's a failed businessman himself," attorney Kevin Luibrand said of the informant. "They got somebody that lied to the FBI completely and continuously about what was happening."

Specific information on the informant's background was not immediately available to The Associated Press.

Luibrand said the secretly taped meetings will show that his client Hossain, a 51-year-old naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, was shown a missile in November 2003 by the informant, and that the loan transactions began two months later.

But another tape, which the prosecution didn't mention, will show the informant assured Hossain in the interim that he wasn't dealing in weapons or doing anything illegal, Luibrand said.

Attorney Kent Sprotbery said Aref, 36, imam at Masjid as-Salam, was asked by Hossain to witness the loan. Islam prohibits charging or receiving interest, so Muslims often loan money to each other, and clerics serve as witnesses, he said.

Both defendants insisted on writing receipts, showing they had nothing to hide, defense lawyers said.

Aref was never shown any shoulder-fired missile, and testimony will show all three men thought the talk about attacking the diplomat was "a joke," Sprotbery said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said the audiotapes and videotapes will show the informant impersonated an arms dealer in conversations with both Hossain and later Aref, that he told them the $50,000 came from the sale of the missile.

The informant gave them cash, got checks back in return, and those transactions constitute most of the charges.

"A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity was provided by the government," Pericek said.

Prosecutors Weave Tale Of Zeal Gone Wrong (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Federal trial of former Albany imam and pizza shop owner opens

DOJ_NMG_0063004

ALBANY -- Federal prosecutors began laying out their case Wednesday against two Albany men ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting as their attorneys portrayed them as deeply religious Muslims who fell victim to an overzealous government informant.

The first day of testimony was at times disjointed and, in one instance, confusing as prosecutors called a Bangladeshi immigrant to the stand whose English was so poor, numerous court observers said they could not understand what he was saying.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William C. Pericak, who gave the first of three opening statements, outlined an investigation that began in early 2003. It culminated more than a year later with the indictment of an Albany imam and his friend, a pizza shop owner, on charges they took part in a fictitious plot to make money off the sale of shoulder-fired missiles to terrorists.

"A sting is simply a crime of opportunity, where the opportunity is presented by the government," Pericak told the panel. "Belief and intent are critically important ... and turn it into a very, very serious crime."

Yassin M. Aref, 36, the jailed spiritual leader of a Central Avenue mosque, and Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, a city pizza shop owner, face the possibility of life in prison if convicted. Both men have denied knowingly taking part in anything illegal and contend the FBI's informant, former Loudonville businessman Shahed "Malik" Hussain, misled them about the legality of his business dealings.

"We're here to talk to you about a sequence of events that can be viewed in different ways," said Kent B. Sprotbery, who is Aref's co-counsel along with attorney Terence L. Kindlon. "You need to keep in mind that language plays a very important part in this case."

Hossain's attorney, Kevin A. Luibrand, assailed the FBI's informant as a "convict" and "con man" whom he contends misled FBI agents about the context of secretly recorded conversations the men had in Arabic and Urdu.

"He's called an informant," Luibrand said. "I have a few other words for him. ... Malik was giving a different message back to his (FBI) handlers than what was taking place in the room."

Luibrand said one of the most important conversations between his client and the informant took place in early December 2003, when the informant allegedly told Hossain that his business dealings were legal.

Prosecutors had not intended to play that taped conversation for the jury. The defense does, and Luibrand said it shows Hossain believed the money he was getting came from lawful transactions.

But prosecutors wasted no time showing jurors what was at the heart of the scheme.

Their first witness, a Department of Defense official from Alabama, gave the panel a crash course on the destructive capabilities of a 5-foot long, Russian-made missile launcher that he hoisted atop his shoulder.

The weapon was the same device the informant pulled out during a meeting with Hossain on Nov. 20, 2003, after they had met more than seven times. The informant said he'd been importing the weapons from China for about five years and that it was "for destroying airplanes."

Aref was never shown the weapon, although he did see its metal triggering device at a later meeting.

Prosecutors contend the missile launcher shown to Hossain bolsters their allegation that he knew what they were doing was illegal and involved terrorism.

Over several months, Hossain and Aref allegedly accepted $50,000 in cash transactions from the informant. Hossain then wrote checks through his business to the informant, keeping small amounts for himself, according to the charges.

"The process goes on again and again," Pericak said in his opening statement. "It's the checks that come back that are the money laundering ... they complete the washing cycle."

Aref was brought in as a witness to the transactions, under Muslim tradition, and is not accused of profiting from the scheme.

His attorneys contend Aref never knew the money came from the sale of missile launchers, and that Hossain believed the informant was dealing arms legally.

To counter those claims, prosecutors said they intend to play a series of taped conversations in which the informant allegedly warned the pair in January 2004 that the missile launcher was going to be used in a planned terrorist attack in New York City against the visiting Pakistani president.

Five witnesses testified Wednesday, including Abul Kashem, a Bangladeshi immigrant who runs a restaurant next door to Hossain's Central Avenue pizza shop.

Kashem recounted talking to Hossain about Osama bin Laden several years ago, but his account of the conversation was garbled and difficult to understand. At one point, the court reporter put her hands on her head in apparent frustration as Kashem spoke, and several jurors appeared confused by the testimony.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Battles Over 9/11 Resolution (AP-Y)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP, September 13, 2006

House Republicans and Democrats traded accusations of improper politicking Wednesday as they sparred over a resolution commemorating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Democrats criticized the GOP-drafted resolution for praising controversial legislation, including the USA Patriot Act and a border security bill. Some faulted it for stating "the nation is safer than it was on Sept. 11, 2001."

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the resolution "self-congratulatory."

"It praises Congress for some reason. Instead of having the focus on the innocent victims of 9/11, it talked about the accomplishments of this Congress. I can't even imagine why they thought that was a good idea," she said.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., called the criticism "cheap demagoguery."

Republicans defended the inclusion of the GOP-crafted security laws and bills. Without them, said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., "we would not be here today without having suffered another attack on our soil."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., disputed the idea that terrorism dangers had grown. "Five years after 9/11, America is safer and much more alert to the dangers that lurk in the darker corners of our world," he said.

Despite the rhetorical battle, the resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks passed 395-22.

The intensifying quarrel between Republicans and Democrats over national security comes weeks before this fall's midterm elections, which will determine which party controls the House and Senate.

Democrats, flanked by foreign policy experts from Democratic administrations past, argued that President Bush's failures call for a change in congressional leadership. They outlined plans to withdraw some troops from Iraq by the end of this year and improve the security of trains, ports, subways and planes.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who supports an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq, said officials sitting on their "fat backsides in the Oval Office" and elsewhere in Washington should stop making excuses for poor planning in Iraq. He called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, while acknowledging a resolution to remove him would probably never get a vote.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, owed Democrats an apology for questioning Tuesday whether Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., called on Senate Republicans to distance themselves from the statement.

Republicans took issue with something Pelosi told reporters last week about al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden. "He has done more damage the longer he has been out there. But, in fact, the damage that he has done is done. And even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer," she said.

A Pelosi spokesman said her words were no different from those made by some Republicans, who have said that if bin Laden were captured or killed, it wouldn't remove the threat posed by the al-Qaida terrorist network.

Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., said the statements are different. "That quote clearly indicates a misunderstanding of how important and what a symbol Osama bin Laden is," he said.

"I actually thought that the Democrats would pursue a policy of national security almost identical to what the president's proposing of taking the war to the enemy," he said. "But now I understand ... that indeed they would, I believe, cut and run. I believe that they would appease."

House Approves Praise Of 9/11 Measures (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The House of Representatives, despite objections by Democrats, yesterday approved a resolution recognizing those killed in the September 11 terrorist attacks and praising the USA Patriot Act and other Republican-crafted security measures implemented since.

A sharp debate, which raged on most of the day, highlighted the contrast between the two parties over the war on terrorism less than two months before elections that will decide congressional control. Still, the resolution passed 395-22, with just 21 Democrats and Republican Rep. Ron Paul of Texas dissenting.

"To me, and I think to most Americans, after five years of security and success, a lapse in our resolve is unthinkable," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. "Victory is not yet assured, and victory without resolve is impossible."

The Illinois Republican said the resolution sends a signal to America's enemies: "We will never forget, and we will never surrender."

Democratic leaders complained that references to the Patriot Act and the tough 2005 border-security bill did not belong in such a resolution.

Democrats supported previous resolutions since September 11 that affirm Congress will "take whatever actions necessary to identify, intercept and disrupt terrorists and their activities." Those resolutions, passed overwhelmingly in 2002, 2003, 2004 and 2005, and didn't mention any of the nine measures included in this election-year version.

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California urged her Democratic colleagues to vote for the measure in spite of the objections. In her floor speech, she asked Mr. Hastert to bring legislation to the floor that would fully implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and criticized the resolution, saying "instead of having the focus on the innocent victims of 9/11," it "praises Congress for some reason."

Mr. Hastert said the measures demonstrate swift congressional action to protect the American people.

"Five years after 9/11, America is safer and much more alert to the dangers that lurk in the darker corners of our world," Mr. Hastert said.

While many Democrats characterized the Patriot Act as a violation of civil liberties, Republicans said it has broken up terrorist cells.

"It is absolutely essential that those keeping us safe have every tool necessary to do so," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican. "Our homeland has not been attacked again. That seems to be so often forgotten."

Democrats argued the war in Iraq has shifted the focus from terrorists in Afghanistan and has emboldened U.S. enemies.

"Five years later, we are still making promises and America is still not as safe as it should be," said Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. Thompson said Republicans only support "security on the cheap" and said the resolution suggests Congress wants to "pat itself on the back about a few past deeds when we've left the bulk of the work of homeland security unfinished."

"Shame on you for using the memory of 9/11 during a charged political season as a cover-up for Congress' do-nothing approach to homeland security," Mr. Thompson said.

The Democrats said the Republicans should have written something in the spirit of the Senate resolution -- adopted unanimously Monday -- which praises September 11 heroes and "condemns in the strongest possible terms the attacks, the terrorists who perpetrated them and their sponsors."

Both parties agree that terrorists should be the common enemy. The previous resolutions identify al Qaeda as responsible for September 11 and condemn terrorist attacks in Bali, Madrid and London.

The objectionable clauses in yesterday's resolution included a port-security bill, which passed 421-2 and the creation of the Homeland Security department, which passed by a large margin.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican who is chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, noted that Republicans could have included praise of the Bush administration's surveillance program or the CIA program that examines financial records to track terrorist activities.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, criticized the resolution's mentioning the House border-security bill, which he called "a bill that couldn't even pass the Republican Senate and a bill that President Bush doesn't even support."

Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence panel, said the measure is disingenuous.

"The sad, unalterable fact is that five years after 9/11, we have not made as much progress as this resolution claims," she said. "We have not plugged some gaping holes in our homeland defense."

In 2002, lawmakers unanimously passed a resolution lauding "numerous laws providing additional resources for the overseas effort against terrorism, as well as additional tools," and in 2004, the House voted 406-16 to pass a resolution that championed "innovative programs" that have secured the nation and applauded the capture of Saddam Hussein.

Democrats Rebut Soft-on-terror Rap (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Capitol Hill Democrats said yesterday they will not be "swift-boated" by Republicans who accuse them of being soft on national security and coddling terrorists.

"Democrats stand ready to protect and defend the American people," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said. "We will not be swift-boated on the issue of security, and that is what the Republicans are trying to do."

Mrs. Pelosi was referring to the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which was highly critical of John Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004.

Part of national security, said the House's top Democrat, is protecting the environment.

"We are advancing tough and smart national security policies to keep the American people safe," said Mrs. Pelosi, adding that Democrats' national security agenda aims "to fight terrorism and defeat it, stop the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, to stop global warming and any other threats to the safety and security of the American people."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, said the remark reflects a broader national security weakness by Democrats.

"The American people want a strong posture against the global scourge of terrorism and all Democrats can offer is Nancy Pelosi's babble putting that fight on par with global warming," he said.

Republicans continued their assault on Mrs. Pelosi and her fellow Democrats for opposing the efforts they say are crucial to winning the war against terrorism.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, for instance, opposed legislation yesterday that would authorize President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program aimed at collecting communications by foreign terrorists. Democrats, along with a handful of Senate Republicans, also have urged that suspected terrorists held at Guantanamo Bay be granted greater civil rights in their trials.

Such positions prompted Mr. Boehner earlier this week to wonder whether Democrats "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

This brought Mr. Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, to the Senate floor yesterday to scold Mr. Boehner.

"His statement was very clear and equally despicable," Mr. Kerry said.

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, also condemned Mr. Boehner's remarks.

"I come from the state of Joe McCarthy," he said of the infamous anti-Communist. "I know a first-rate McCarthy when I see one and I also know a third-rate McCarthy when I see one, and we saw one yesterday."

Also yesterday, Rep. John P. Murtha introduced a bill formally calling for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to be fired "for the good of the country." He said Mr. Rumsfeld has harmed military readiness and was wrong in his estimates about the cost and length of the Iraq war.

Mr. Murtha said he is sure Republicans won't allow a floor vote on the measure. But he will introduce it anyway, "just for the effect it might have on the secretary leaving."

Republicans Seek To Sow Seeds Of Doubt On Security (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

John Boehner, the Republican majority leader in the House of Representatives, may have given the game away this week when he said, “I wonder if they’re [the Democrats] more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people.”

America’s mid-term congressional elections, which take place on 7 November, are shaping up as one of the most bitter campaigns in recent US history. Although George W. Bush is not expected to play a prominent role on the campaign trail over the next seven weeks, the president has given a series of speeches in the past 10 days that have helped crystalise his party’s att-empts to paint the Democrats as weak on national security.

In a broadcast interview last Sunday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, was more blunt in suggesting a connection between Democratic criticism of the Iraq war and being soft on terrorism. “Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw US forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion [and] validate the strategy of the terrorists,” he said.

While viewed by many as below-the-belt, such pugilism could be a small foretaste of what is to come. Opinion polls suggest that the Democrats are on course to regain the House of Representatives in November for the first time since 1994, which could severely complicate life for Mr Bush in the two remaining years of his second term. The opposition needs to add just 15 seats to its tally in the 435-seat house to regain control. There is also an outside chance the Democrats could recapture the Senate, where 33 seats are being contested: they need to boost their seats by six.

“The national mood remains bleak for Republicans,” said Stuart Rothenberg, the publisher of the Rothenberg political report. “President George W. Bush’s job performance ratings are terrible and the public still gives Congress low marks. A majority of Americans continue to tell pollsters that the country is headed in the wrong direction.

“There is no reason to believe that things will change dramatically between now and election day to improve Republican prospects.”

However, it remains far from clear whether the Democrats can translate widespread voter dissatisfaction into significant gains on the ground. In addition to focusing on national security, the Republicans have sought to reduce the November elections to a series of local contests by focusing on the record of their incumbents or the perceived foibles of their opponents. Even stalwart Republican allies of Mr Bush have asked him to keep a low profile.

The Democrats, meanwhile, are trying to build a unified national campaign that will tap voter disaffection with Mr Bush.

"Essentially, the Republicans are trying to localise this election and the Democrats are trying to nationalise it," said John Green, a political scientist at the Bliss Institute of Applied Politics in Ohio. "History suggests that the Democrats will find it an uphill struggle to turn 435 local races into a national wave."

The Democrats, whose leadership is bitterly divided between Howard Dean, the former presidential hopeful and chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and party leaders in Congress over electoral strategy, also face tough questions on their continuing inability to produce coherent policies. That is particularly difficult over Iraq and the economy.

On the unpopular war in Iraq, the Democrats continue to be divided on whether and how quickly to recommend a US military withdrawal. And on the economy, where there is broad-based voter anxiety, the Dem-ocratic platform amounts to little more than proposing an increase in the minimum wage, stuck at $5.15 (€4.05, £2.74) an hour since 1997, and a reversal of some of the tax cuts Mr Bush has pushed through in the past six years.

The opinion poll gap has begun to narrow sharply. Last month Gallup showed the Democrats' lead over Republicans narrowing to just two percentage points, down from a 15-point lead in April. Although voters remain deeply dissatisfied with the performance of a Republican Congress, their views change when it comes to assessing their local representative.

In what is a frequent peculiarity of American politics, more than half of voters approve of their local representative while fewer than a quarter approve of Congress's performance as a whole.

"The bottom line is that there is still everything to play for," said Mr Green. "The national mood favours the Democrats. But winning the election is still going to prove very tough for them."

Senate Rejects Democratic Plan For Ports (AP)

The AP, September 13, 2006

Senate Republicans on Wednesday rejected a Democratic attempt to attach dozens of national security programs to legislation intended to protect seaports.

The Democrats' proposal had threatened the overall ports security bill, which would install monitors at the 22 largest ports. These devices would screen for materials used to make radiological bombs or nuclear weapons.

The ports bill could come to a final vote on Thursday.

The plan by Democratic leader Harry Reid would have put Republicans in the awkward position of opposing security measures that many people in the United States believe are long overdue. Examples include improving safeguards on trains and buses and at chemical plants.

"Politics won't protect the American people," Reid, D-Nev., said after the GOP-controlled Senate defeated his plan.

Democratic Sens. Bill Nelson of Florida, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mark Pryor of Arkansas voted against Reid's proposal.

"It is an interesting hodgepodge of provisions that are irrelevant to the underlying bill," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. "What it does not include are provisions that have to do with port security."

Port Security Won't Bankrupt Us (NYT)

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, seems determined to outdo his commander in chief in ratcheting up fears of Al Qaeda whenever he wants to score political points. This week, he raised the specter that if the government starts too many expensive antiterrorism programs it could further a plot by Osama bin Laden to "drive us crazy, into bankruptcy" through overspending on homeland defense.

It was particularly ironic that Mr. Chertoff spun this theory while he was fighting off a measure, up for a vote today, that would help protect our ports against the threat that he himself deems most worrisome — a nuclear explosion within our borders — without government spending.

In testifying before a Senate committee on Tuesday, Mr. Chertoff flailed away at straw men of his own concoction. He warned darkly about the dangers of trying to protect the country from "every conceivable threat" — an idea no one has ever espoused. The issue has always been the need to set priorities, and in that respect, Mr. Chertoff's department has become a laughingstock. It compiled one list of possible targets that included a petting zoo and a popcorn factory while the government provided only a pittance for our vulnerable subways.

The White House has been warning that Osama bin Laden enunciated a policy in 2004 of "bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy." But there's no reason to think the terrorist was hatching a plot to force his enemies to buy too many metal detectors or bomb-sniffing dogs. He actually seemed to be gloating about the economic harm wrought by attacks like the one on the World Trade Center, and the costs imposed on America by military adventures. So far, we have not heard anyone from the administration warning that the invasion of Iraq is going to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy.

When it comes to prioritizing our antiterrorism spending, it's hard to understand what Mr. Chertoff dislikes about a measure, introduced by Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, that would require that all cargo containers headed for the United States be scanned at foreign ports to search for a possible nuclear weapon. Mr. Chertoff, after all, put a nuclear bomb at the top of his list of things to worry about, followed by a biological or serious radiological attack. He also agreed that eventually, every container should be screened abroad for radioactive material before it can be loaded into a ship headed for this country.

But he balked at doing it now on the flimsy grounds that some ports might not have enough room to install scanning devices without slowing the flow of traffic and that some foreign governments might not cooperate.

Those sound like the rationalizations of a bureaucrat unwilling to push hard or buck a strong lobbying effort by shippers who don't want any additional hassles or costs. Terminal operators in Hong Kong have been using such scanners effectively and inexpensively without disrupting traffic. The cost of such scanning might reach $20 a container, a small surcharge on shipping costs measured in hundreds if not thousands of dollars.

When it comes to homeland security, the Bush administration has repeatedly allowed corporate profits to trump safety. That seems to be the problem here, just as it has been when it came to the chemical industry's resistance to reforms that would help protect against toxic disasters if terrorists ever attacked their plants. Right now, a port security bill is pending in the Senate that would establish three pilot programs overseas to test the feasibility of scanning all containers. But Mr. Schumer is surely right that delay is dangerous and unnecessary. Virtually all containers destined for the United States should be scanned for nuclear or radiological weapons within the next four years. It is not enough to scan the containers after their arrival here, the current administration policy. That could be too late.

Terror Informant Seeks Sen. Clinton Help (AP-Y)

By Tom Hays

AP, September 13, 2006

An unusual exchange of letters between an undercover informant and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's office has apparently angered authorities and may have complicated the case of a man convicted of plotting to bomb a busy subway station.

Osama Eldawoody — a paid New York Police Department informant who was instrumental in exposing the 2004 subway scheme — told The Associated Press that he wrote to Clinton last month, complaining that his law enforcement handlers misled him with false promises of a better life and asking her to intervene on his behalf.

A written response from Clinton, shared with the AP by Eldawoody, said she had "requested a review of this matter and a written response" from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn. The letter also suggests Eldawoody seek help from Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, where he now lives.

Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines confirmed that her office had received the letter from Eldawoody, but said the senator was not personally involved in the written exchange and was unaware of the issue. He said caseworkers "simply forwarded it to the U.S. Attorney's office, which we informed him of with a standard letter, as we routinely do with any constituent casework."

Eldawoody said in a telephone interview last week that he was summoned to a meeting with investigators and a federal prosecutor and was reprimanded for contacting Clinton and told not to do it again.

"Everybody was mad at me," he said.

Eldawoody, 50, was a key prosecution witness in the federal government's case against Shahawar Matin Siraj, who was convicted in May of plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in Manhattan. Authorities have touted the case as a success story for the NYPD's heightened counterterrorism effort.

U.S. attorney's office spokesman Robert Nardoza would not discuss Eldawoody, but Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly praised his work as an informant.

"He's a hero who did a great service for the people of New York," Kelly said in statement. "We will continue our dedicated efforts to assure the safety and well being of him and his family."

Attorneys for Siraj, arguing for a new trial in court papers filed last week, said prosecutors had turned over a letter "from a witness addressed to a high public official." The letter was not made public but the defense papers said it contained information that could undermine the government's case.

"It's a piece of new evidence we didn't know about," said Martin Stolar, an attorney for Siraj. He would not elaborate.

The NYPD recruited Eldawoody, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Egypt, to monitor radical Muslims at mosques and elsewhere following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He testified that he met Siraj at an Islamic bookstore and secretly recorded conversations over the next several months as his anti-American rants evolved into a plot to bomb the subway station.

Since Siraj's trial, Eldawoody and his family have struggled to get by on a government stipend of $3,200 a month while living in seclusion in rural Pennsylvania, he said.

He said he complained to Clinton in his letter that police promised him "the best quality of life and security ... and all their promises were gone after the arrest" of Siraj.

Eldawoody claimed that authorities also broke a promise to protect his identity. Once his name came out at the trial and was published in news accounts, he was told by friends that he was marked man in some Muslim communities.

Red Tape Undermines State Disaster Preparedness (LAT)

By Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A new state audit warns that California's efforts to prepare for a terrorist attack or natural disaster are being undermined by a morass of red tape.

State Auditor Elaine M. Howle said in the report that the administration of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has let tens of millions of dollars in federal emergency preparedness grants languish unspent and has not adequately tested the ability of California's medical facilities to handle mass casualties.

"We believe the state's organizational structure for ensuring emergency preparedness is not streamlined or well-defined," Howle wrote in a study released Tuesday for the nonpartisan watchdog agency. "If it remains unchanged, this labyrinthine structure could adversely affect emergency response."

By the end of June, the state had spent less than half of the $954 million of federal homeland security grants it had been awarded since 2001, the report said.

That money is supposed to be used to reimburse local governments for equipment purchases, training and other expenses related to disaster preparedness. The state can be so slow in reimbursing these expenses, according to the report, that some cities cannot afford to continue participating in the plan.

"A commander with the city of Santa Ana's Police Department told us the city often runs a deficit from $1.5 million to $4 million because it has not received reimbursements for its homeland security purchases," the report said. "The commander said that, at a certain point, the city will no longer allow the deficits to increase, preventing additional purchases."

Chris Bertelli, a spokesman for the state Office of Homeland Security, said the administration is working with local governments to speed up the process and during the last year has significantly reduced the time it takes to cut checks.

Howle's report further cautions that exercises simulating various threats "have not exerted sufficient stress on medical and health systems to determine how well they can respond to emergencies."

Though there would be as many as 10,000 casualties in a moderate emergency, the report said the exercise the state conducted last year simulated only 550 casualties "and lacked sufficient realism."

Bertelli said the administration would work on improving the exercises. Although officials agree that there are problems with some drills, he said the report overlooks many other "comprehensive and robust" preparedness exercises held in California each year.

Traveler Charged In Disrupting Flight To Va. (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

A professional jujitsu fighter from Brazil sat in a Loudoun County jail yesterday on a felony charge that he tried to open the cabin door of a Dulles-bound airliner as it cruised at 30,000 feet over Tennessee.

Carlos Alberto de Oliveira, 43, missed his appearance in court yesterday morning because he fought with sheriff's deputies who came to escort him, Loudoun authorities said. He is expected to be arraigned today on a state charge of interfering with an aircraft's operations.

Federal and state authorities outlined a potentially terrifying scenario in which de Oliveira walked up and down the aisle of United Airlines Flight 890 from Los Angeles on Tuesday night. He then allegedly yanked the handle of the cabin door before passengers swarmed him and federal air marshals took him into custody. The flight landed at Dulles International Airport at 8:30 p.m.

Although de Oliveira's motivations were unclear, federal officials have ruled out terrorism and concluded after interviewing him that he did not intend any harm.

"He didn't threaten anyone, he didn't hurt anyone. He wasn't intending to open the door, he didn't kick it," said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. "He just pulled a stupid stunt."

DOJ_NMG_0063011

A lawyer had not been appointed for de Oliveira, who was being held at the Loudoun County Adult Detention Center. If convicted, he would face up to five years in prison.

Weierman said de Oliveira is a professional jujitsu competitor, and he listed his occupation on his booking sheet as "professional fighter." Brazilian jujitsu is a form of the ancient martial art that has been gaining popularity in Northern Virginia in recent years.

The United flight took off with 138 passengers and six crew members, said Megan McCarthy, a United spokeswoman. About 3 1/2 hours into the flight, she said, "a passenger, for whatever reason, did attempt to open an exit door" at the rear of the aircraft.

Passenger Ken Wolfenbarger said he noticed a man fiddling with gadgets stashed in his pocket while he stood in the aisle. He then whipped out a long black belt with two metal hooks on either end and wrapped them around his fists, Wolfenbarger said.

Wolfenbarger said the man was dressed in a heavy camouflage jacket, fatigues and dark wraparound glasses, but FBI officials said de Oliveira was not wearing camouflage when he was interviewed.

Suddenly, Wolfenbarger said, the man turned down the aisle toward the plane's rear galley. "I heard a ruckus, and then the airline stewardess started yelling, 'Please help us! Help us! Help us!' " said Wolfenbarger, 44, of Whittier, Calif. "As soon as I heard that, I climbed over the other seat to the aisle. I knew the plane was in trouble, and I said, 'I am not going to die on this flight.' "

Weierman said the door would not open because the cabin is pressurized. Officials concurred that de Oliveira had been acting in an odd manner before the incident, walking up and down the aisle.

"He was strutting his stuff, just sort of checking everyone out," said one law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is ongoing.

Law enforcement officials said de Oliveira at one point walked toward the beverage cart, which was in front of the cockpit door when the door was briefly opened. A flight attendant told him to return to his seat, and he did, law enforcement officials said.

Weierman said de Oliveira "did not mean to harm anyone, and there was no nexis to terrorism. It was just a mindless act with not a lot of thought behind it."

She declined to say whether the FBI supported the passengers' actions but added that "heightened awareness on the part of passengers" during the week of the five-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks may have played a role.

"It's a sign of the times that we live in," she said.

De Oliveira was arrested by the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority Police Department, whose officers met the plane at Dulles.

Loudoun Commonwealth's Attorney James E. Plowman's office took over the case after the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria declined to prosecute. Officials said state charges were more appropriate because federal law requires proving that someone interfered with the flight crew, which did not occur in this case.

The state charge, authorities said, is broader because it requires proving only that someone interfered with the overall operations of an aircraft.

Cost May Kill Travel Program (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A government proposal that would force air travelers to pay up to $200 a year for a fast pass through airport security could kill the program, advocates and lawmakers said Wednesday.

That price — double what was expected — would “severely threaten” the long-delayed Registered Traveler program, said Steven Brill, a Manhattan entrepreneur planning to launch the idea at four airports this year.

Eagerly awaited by travelers and recently touted by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Registered Traveler offers fee-paying fliers expedited airport screening. Travelers in the program would have to pass a background check to rule out ties to terrorism and would get an ID card to speed them through checkpoints.

The Transportation Security Administration said last year that it expected to charge about $30 for a terrorism check. Now it wants to charge another $70 to pay for TSA screeners at Registered Traveler checkpoints, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. It also may charge an additional $20 for a criminal background check. Those costs are in addition to yearly fees of up to $80 that fliers would pay to companies operating the program.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., whose committee oversees Registered Traveler, said $200 “far exceeds anything that's ever been entertained. …You don't know if it's going to succeed now.”

DOJ_NMG_0063012

Larry Zmuda, head of homeland security for Pennsylvania-based Unisys, which also wants to run Registered Traveler, said the heftier price tag "would be a huge blow." It could deter millions from signing up and make Registered Traveler unprofitable at some airports, he said.

The program would operate only at airports that choose to apply and are approved by TSA. About 20 have applied so far.

The TSA says it wants to avoid spending taxpayer dollars on Registered Traveler. "It's a private-sector program, and it's designed to have Registered Traveler customers pay for use of the lane," Howe said.

The agency revealed the $100 fee on its website Monday with no publicity. The fee is based on "preliminary calculations" that could change later, the TSA says.

Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., chairman of a subcommittee overseeing TSA, said the agency "is certainly going to have to justify that ($100) to me."

Registered Traveler advocates are lobbying the TSA against the $70 charge for screeners. Brill said the TSA doesn't have to hire extra screeners to run Registered Traveler checkpoints.

Brill's company, Verified Identity Pass, has said that charging more than $80 creates "significant barriers" to getting enough people to join and make the program a success.

Thompson, the congressman, said a $200 fee might deter travelers who already get shorter security lines through elite flier clubs.

Frequent travelers had mixed views.

Cleveland businessman Mark Taft said $200 is "on the outer edge of what I would pay."

Charlie Massoglia said paying $200 "doesn't make a difference to anyone who travels frequently."

Democrats Ask For Investigation Of Former EPA Director On 9/11 Health Issues (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz, Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON – Democrats from New York and New Jersey asked on Wednesday for an investigation that could lead to criminal charges against former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christie Whitman for breathing problems suffered by thousands after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Whitman told The Associated Press that she and the EPA "agreed then and I reiterate now that the air on the WTC site was not clean – the consequence of millions of tons of burned debris from the most horrific attack in our nation's history.

"We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently."

At hearings last week in New York, Whitman was the most frequent target of lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they worked to clear the pile of toxic debris.

Whitman, a former Republican governor of New Jersey, declared in the days after Sept. 11 that the air in lower Manhattan was safe for workers and residents. But she has said she and the EPA always differentiated between the air quality in lower Manhattan and at ground zero.

Former Sept. 11 Commission chairman Thomas Kean, also a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said it was troubling that the Democratic congressmen "would misuse the heroic service of thousands for their political gain in an election season."

The congressmen – New York Reps. Jerrold Nadler and Anthony Weiner and New Jersey Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. – said the health of their constituents, and not politics, was their concern.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the trio accused Whitman of "endangering the lives of thousands of people."

Weiner said, "Only with the appointment of a special prosecutor with subpoena power can an independent investigation occur and, if necessary, criminal charges be brought against those responsible."

Pascrell said it was "morally incumbent" upon Gonzales to appoint a special counsel. The Democrats want the investigation to look at other government officials as well, but did not specify anyone other than Whitman.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency had not yet received the letter.

Separately, Whitman and the EPA are being sued by residents, workers and others over health issues. Last week, Mount Sinai Medical Center released the results of a study showing nearly seven of every 10 ground zero responders suffered lung problems.

Law Enforcement, American Style (NYT)

By John Miller

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063013

Washington

WITH the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks coming shortly after British authorities disrupted the plot to bomb airliners over the Atlantic, we are seeing another round of calls to break up the F.B.I. or to create a domestic intelligence agency separate from the F.B.I. with no police powers, similar to Britain's MI5.

But these critics, who have been joined by the prominent federal appeals court judge Richard Posner, seem to be unaware of two critical things. One is how far the F.B.I. has come in transforming itself into an intelligence-driven organization in the last five years; the other is how many attacks we have prevented in that span.

Using intelligence and technology — and our authority to make arrests — the F.B.I. has stopped five terrorist plots in progress in roughly the last year alone:

· On Aug. 31, 2005, in Los Angeles, we arrested four members of a group of radicals that had grown out of the prison system and was planning to attack military recruiting centers and synagogues.

· In February, in Toledo, Ohio, we arrested three men who had conspired to travel to Iraq and attack American forces there.

· In a case out of Atlanta, indictments were handed down in March and July against two men who had traveled to Washington to videotape possible targets near the Capitol and then met with other extremists in Canada to compare notes.

· In Miami in June, seven extremists were arrested after being recorded on F.B.I. surveillance tapes swearing allegiance to Al Qaeda and making plans to attack targets in Miami and Chicago, including the Sears Tower.

· In July a plot to attack subways in New York was disrupted with the arrest of the mastermind in Lebanon.

In addition, we worked closely with our law enforcement partners in Canada and Britain to help uncover plots in those countries that made headlines worldwide this summer. This recent record suggests two things: that the operational tempo of Al Qaeda's followers is still high, and that the F.B.I. is doing a good job.

So why tear apart the bureau now and start a new agency? How long would it take this new agency to get rolling? A year? Two? What would it use for a database? How would it address privacy and civil liberties? How long would it take the officers of this new agency to develop trusting relationships with America's 18,000 local law enforcement agencies?

There is a more fundamental question for the "domestic intelligence agency" proponents: Who says the other system is better? When we visit our colleagues at domestic intelligence agencies abroad to compare systems, those without police powers tell us they wish they could make arrests.

Israel and Britain have domestic intelligence agencies staffed by some of the finest operators in the world. Since 9/11, both countries have suffered terrorist attacks on home soil while we have not. That doesn't mean their systems don't work best for them; it simply proves that the domestic-intelligence model is not a magic bullet against our enemies.

The proponents of creating a new agency assume the F.B.I. always makes arrests at the first opportunity, scooping up the little fish while the masterminds get away. They seem unaware of the existence of our intelligence directorate, or the 56 field intelligence groups spread throughout the nation. The critics don't understand how intelligence is leveraged in each investigation.

At any moment, we are involved in joint operations with American and foreign intelligence agencies that go on for months or even years, gathering intelligence and disrupting plots by means other than high-profile arrests. These operations allow the F.B.I. and our partners to continue to follow the thread of intelligence until we have learned the identities of all the players or found the last safe house. In those cases no one takes a bow or holds a press conference, but the work gets done quietly and effectively. When we do make arrests, it is because making arrests was the most effective way to disrupt a plot.

The bureau's director, Robert Mueller, has made a priority of merging our longtime strength of being a premier investigative agency with the new goal of being an intelligence-led agency. We have started a national security branch, with special agents and talented analysts, to control our counterterrorism, intelligence and counterespionage efforts. This branch is now home to about 40 percent of the bureau's employees.

We have added a directorate that handles investigations involving weapons of mass destruction and also conducts research to stay on the cutting edge of terrorist capacities.

We have expanded our partnerships with local law enforcement by increasing the number of joint terrorist task forces to 101 today from 33 before 9/11.

In those squads in cities across the country, local police detectives, our agents and analysts and investigators from other federal agencies work side by side, sharing information and running down leads.

We have also developed a database, called the Investigative Data Warehouse, that can search more than 700 million records from more than a dozen agencies and match them against our own investigative records.

As we break down the structure of Al Qaeda, we see the very shape of the terrorist threat changing and adapting. Our approach has to continually evolve to keep up. Starting over from scratch will only set us back and make America less safe.

Insure CIA Agents Against A Reckless Administration (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Your Sept. 12 editorial "Jack Bauer Insurance" was a disservice not to me or to fictional characters like Jack Bauer, but to the very real CIA agents whose commitment to the truth didn't fit the administration's neoconservative agenda on Iraq, and to agents endangered by reckless administration policies.

It's been reported that CIA officers refused to be trained in the administration's controversial interrogation techniques, and in at least one instance these techniques yielded questionable information aimed at pleasing the interrogators. The Supreme Court, not Democrats, ruled administration detainee policies out of bounds, and it was the outrage of Republican senators that forced the administration to apply the Geneva Convention to enemy prisoners in order to best protect captured Americans.

Iraq has been an endless abuse of the CIA. CIA operative Tyler Drumheller said top White House officials simply brushed off the warning that "reliable intelligence" suggested Saddam Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction, saying they were "no longer interested" in intelligence. Former CIA operative Paul Pillar wrote that "intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made."

Former CIA case officer Jim Marcinkowski argued the Valerie Plame leak hurt "the credibility of our case officers when they try to convince an overseas contact that their safety is of primary importance." Former CIA agent Larry Johnson, a registered Republican, said it "speaks volumes" that President Bush held no one accountable for the leak of an agent's identity. Forgotten is President George H.W. Bush's admonition that those who expose our agents are "the most insidious of traitors." CIA officers don't need Jack Bauer insurance -- they need insurance against the recklessness of this administration.

"These People Want To Kill Us" (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The Washington Times, in a special section commemorating the first anniversary of September 11, profiled three men and two women who survived the attack on the Pentagon. They agreed to update their stories for a series, After the Fire, this week marking the fifth anniversary.

Fourth of five parts

A small white box tucked neatly in the cubbyhole of Pentagon police Officer George E. Clodfelter III's desk contains a dozen or so photographs of things that happened that day.

They look like snapshots from a nightmare.

There's one of a melted telephone. Another shows a clock with brown burn marks, the hands frozen at 9:37, the exact time a hijacked airplane slammed into the Pentagon on September 11, 2001.

The next shot shows Master Patrol Officer Clodfelter standing in the sun giving orders to two persons whose backs are to the camera. There's a dark red splotch on his white uniform shirt.

"That blood," he begins to say, but then stops as if someone has punched him in the throat.

A moment later, he adds: "She died in my arms, and that's her blood."

Five years have passed since Officer Clodfelter and 13 fellow members of the Pentagon Force Protection Agency plunged into the black smoke and flaming debris to save dozens -- some burned beyond recognition -- from the rubble in the moments after the attack.

Four years ago, when The Washington Times first profiled him on the first anniversary of September 11, Officer Clodfelter spoke graphically of pulling bloodied victims from the wreckage where 184 died.

He spoke of the many hours he spent with his wife of 33 years, Linda, at their kitchen table in the aftermath -- talking, crying and trying to cope with the misery of what he and others endured that day.

"I call it the tape," Officer Clodfelter said in 2002. "It runs in my mind. I don't consciously run it."

He described going through phases of fear, remorse and denial, and said at the time -- one year after the attacks -- that he was "in the anger phase."

During follow-up interviews with The Times over the past month, Officer Clodfelter, 52, reflected on his remarks, saying those were phases he went through "in the beginning."

"It levels out over time," he says. "Time heals all wounds to a certain degree."

While the passage of five years brought perspective, Officer Clodfelter says, certain things trigger a rush of painful emotions and memories.

"It's like it happened yesterday when I go toward that side of the building. I can still smell it and the tape runs," he says. "It smells like death."

DOJ_NMG_0063015

When asked to elaborate, Officer Clodfelter becomes quiet, then adds: "Those people that have smelled death know what it smells like. Leave it at that."

Seeking peace

The biggest change for the Clodfelters since September 11 was their move in 2002 from their town house in the Washington suburb of Lake Ridge, Va., to a quaint gated community about 60 miles south in Ruther Glen, Va.

The bucolic road leading to their modest two-story home is manned by uniformed security guards who check every vehicle coming in to the subdivision.

"Our decision to move here was a direct response to 9/11," Officer Clodfelter says. "I resigned myself to the fact that I didn't want [Linda] to get caught up in it if there was another catastrophe up there."

Despite the relative peace they have found in their new home, Mrs. Clodfelter says that she and her husband still keep a "bug-out bag" packed with items such as canned goods and gas masks in case a catastrophe should occur.

Memories of September 11 line the underbelly of other aspects of their lives. A wall inside the home carries mementos that Officer Clodfelter neatly arranged during the past few years: A framed Medal for Valor from the Defense Department. A Cu Chullian award for dedication and valor, presented by the Irish Center of Washington, D.C. A limited-edition commemorative September 11 rifle.

But more personal and more graphic mementos, such as his box of photographs, remain hidden away.

"I've got a lot of it around here in boxes, and I just haven't gotten around to sorting most of it because it's still so painful," Officer Clodfelter says.

He keeps another memento closer to his heart.

With memories fresh on the first anniversary of the attacks, he got a tattoo on his chest bearing the numerals 09-11-01 and depicting a bald eagle, wings spread as an American flag.

"It's right above my heart," Officer Clodfelter says, explaining that September 11 "is my Pearl Harbor" and the tattoo "is my devotion to the memory."

His wife interjects: "I'd say it's your own personal memorial."

Passion, politics

A line from a speech by President Bush, written in elaborate calligraphy, is framed and mounted on a wall in the Clodfelters' basement. The quote, from Oct. 7, 2001, when the president announced U.S. air strikes on Afghanistan, reads: "We will not waver; we will not tire; we will not falter; and we will not fail. Peace and freedom will prevail."

Conversations with Officer Clodfelter four years ago centered on pain and memories; they now veer more easily toward politics.

"I'm very bitter about this," he says, lighting a cigarette -- a pack-a-day habit that hasn't gone away since September 11.

"We're in a time of war and the liberals are not supporting the nation and the troops," Officer Clodfelter says. "George W. Bush has maintained his focus and he's taken the fight to the enemy. What would the non-supporters and liberals be saying now if they're going to their corner cafe to get their lattes and the corner blows up? Or the bus? Or the train? Or the Metro?

"These people want to kill us," he says. "It's not happening here because our people are doing their job."

Pausing to stub out the cigarette in a small ashtray, Officer Clodfelter adds that he's "very bitter about people like Hillary Clinton and this extreme left that has emerged with people like Cindy Sheehan," the anti-war activist whose son was killed in Iraq.

"George W. Bush was gracious enough to meet with her and yet she kept on pounding on it after the left got ahold of her," he says. "I understand a parent grieving and all, the pain of that, but her son signed on the dotted line. He volunteered to go into the military."

'Short memory'

Officer Clodfelter says his own two sons not only served in the military but were deployed to the Persian Gulf.

Navy Chief Petty Officer Michael Clodfelter, 34, served in the first Gulf war. In the aftermath of September 11, he was deployed to Iraq as a Seabee.

"I wouldn't say I was worried," Officer Clodfelter says. "But I was concerned. Any parent would be with their child going to a combat zone."

His younger son, Alec, is a retired Army staff sergeant now working as a military contractor at Fort Bliss in El Paso, Texas.

Officer Clodfelter says he is more politically conservative today than he was four years ago, partially because "that just happens when you get older."

He also becomes more frustrated with the public -- conservatives and liberals alike -- for not taking civic responsibilities seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0063016

"We, as an American people, have a short memory," Officer Clodfelter says. "Half the people don't even know who their state senator is."

He voiced similar sentiments four years ago, when he said "they should run that tape of the Pentagon and the World Trade Center on television channels every day before they go off the air."

He says that view hasn't changed.

"It should be six times a day now, because it's going to happen again. You should put that in bold letters," he says. "I blame the failed foreign policy of appeasement. This is why we're here today. I also blame the terrorists."

Closer to God

When asked whether he forgives the September 11 terrorists, Officer Clodfelter thinks for a long moment before responding: "I forgive them all, but that doesn't mean I like it.

"I have pity for these people. Outright, unadulterated pity because they could be so blind to commit these acts and fall into their Islamic fascist rhetoric," he says. "If you knew anything about the Koran, it says you shall not kill."

During the past four years, Officer Clodfelter adds, he has thought more about religion and a relationship with God. While he doesn't belong to a church, he speaks of an increased sense of faith.

"I don't go to any organized religious environment," Officer Clodfelter says. "I'm in touch with God in my own way. I pray and talk with God every day."

Before September 11, he prayed irregularly. "I was lukewarm," he says.

The years since have brought what Officer Clodfelter describes as intense reflection on morality and the afterlife.

"I think God tailor-makes heaven for each individual," he says. "Now I talk to God every day for an hour on the drive to work. It is my belief that the only thing you need to follow is the Ten Commandments, and that all religions are on the right path."

WAR NEWS:

Discovery Of 65 Bodies In Baghdad Is A Setback For Security Efforts (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick, Huda Ahmed

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Authorities found at least 65 bodies dumped throughout Baghdad on Wednesday, and at least 25 people died in other violence in a setback to the U.S. military's efforts to reduce sectarian violence in Iraq's capital city.

The hands of most of the dumped victims were bound, and they were blindfolded. Most of the dead appeared to have been shot to death, and many showed signs of having been tortured.

The apparent resurgence in execution-style murders, which are often associated with sectarian violence and death squads, came as U.S. and Iraqi patrols have been sweeping Baghdad neighborhoods in search of insurgents and sectarian militiamen.

Since Operation Forward Together began on Aug. 7, U.S. officials have boasted that such killings in Baghdad declined by more than 50 percent in August, compared with July. U.S. officials wouldn't provide specific numbers, however, and have said that their comparison doesn't include victims of car bombings, mortar attacks and other so-called mass-casualty violence.

Statistics released by the Baghdad morgue suggest that the decline in violence from July to August was less than 18 percent, with 1,529 violent deaths in August and 1,855 in July.

Wednesday's deaths, however, clearly fall into the category that the U.S. military is tracking.

The daily total was the highest since the security sweeps began and the second highest so far this year. The most executions - 80 - occurred on Feb. 23, the day after a Shiite mosque was bombed in Samarra, setting off the current round of violence.

The bodies were dumped throughout the city. Ten were found in the Shula neighborhood in western Baghdad and another 10 were found in Sadr City in the east, both Shiite Muslim strongholds of anti-American cleric Muqtada al Sadr. Forty-five of the victims were discovered in predominantly Sunni Arab parts of western Baghdad, including five in the Dora neighborhood, which had already been swept by U.S. and Iraqi forces, police said. Most of the victims were found in groups of four or five.

U.S. officials said they hadn't been able to verify the reports of the bodies.

Police said they'd been unable to determine a pattern in where the bodies were dropped. None was near police or military checkpoints, police said. Shiite Muslim militias have been accused of infiltrating Iraqi police and army units.

An officer from the police station in the Amel neighborhood in north central Baghdad, speaking on the condition that he not be named, said that many of the incidents appeared to involve day laborers, drivers or police officers who may have been abducted as they began their workdays and then were killed shortly afterward. In most cases, police found no identification on the bodies, which were photographed and taken to the morgue.

Such execution-style killings have become more frequent since the Samarra mosque bombing, although bodies bearing signs of torture have turned up almost daily since 2005.

But the spike in executions may signal that U.S. and Iraqi troops have been unable to quell the activities of death squads as operations begin to slow in anticipation of Ramadan, the month that Muslims devote to fasting. Ramadan begins Sept. 24.

Other violence in Baghdad on Wednesday targeted police convoys or stations. At least 14 people were killed and 67 wounded after a car bomb and an improvised explosive device went off near Al Shaab Stadium in east Baghdad at around 10 a.m. The blast appeared to be targeting a police convoy.

Two hours later, a bomb in a parked car exploded near a police patrol from the Zayona police station in east Baghdad. Eight police officers were killed and 19 civilians were wounded.

Two mortar shells landed on al Rashad police station in southeastern Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding two others, police said. Two more policemen were killed when two mortar rounds landed near their station in Baghdad's eastern neighborhood of Mashtal. Three others were injured.

Nearly 100 Killed In Baghdad Over 24 Brutal Hours (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, K.I. Ibrahim

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 13 -- Nearly 100 people were killed or found dead in the Iraqi capital over the past 24 hours, authorities said Wednesday, continuing a wave of sectarian violence that has defied American efforts to thwart the carnage.

Sixty-two bullet-riddled corpses -- some of them beheaded and all bearing signs of torture -- had been found dumped in streets throughout the city since Tuesday night, said Brig. Gen. Abdullah Mahmood of the Interior Ministry. Bombings and mortar attacks targeting Iraqi police killed an additional 26 people Wednesday morning.

In the deadliest attack, a car bomb exploded at 9 a.m. near an indoor stadium in Baghdad, killing 12 traffic policemen and wounding 13, Mahmood said. As a crowd swarmed the scene to aid the wounded, another bomb went off, killing seven civilians and injuring 47.

Mortar shells slammed into a police station in the Mashtal area of eastern Baghdad and a security forces recruiting center near an airfield in the central part of the capital, the Interior Ministry said. Seven people were killed, and 19 were wounded.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of two soldiers, one killed south of Baghdad on Tuesday night when his vehicle was struck by a bomb and the other on Monday during combat in Anbar province.

As the violence flared, leaders of the country's main political parties met to seek agreement on a politically explosive plan to carve the country into a federation of three autonomous regions. The federalism plan would create a Shiite Muslim region in southern Iraq much like the autonomous zone in the north controlled by the Kurds. Sunni Arabs would be left with vast swaths of desert in the middle of the country, an area that lacks the oil reserves in the other regions.

Khalaf Olayan, leader of the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, a Sunni group, said the meeting "focused on the question of time limitations and how we could delay the matter for the time being."

"We believe that a majority of our people do not understand federalism and some believe that if approved, it would lead to the division of the country," he said. "Besides, people now need services first and want things that will help them in their daily lives."

The leaders of all the political blocs will meet again on Saturday to try to resolve the issue, he said.

In Tehran, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki continued his first state visit to Iran by meeting with the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who called on the American military to withdraw from Iraq.

"Once the foreign forces leave Iraq, many of its problems will be solved," Khamenei said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

At the United Nations, Secretary General Kofi Annan said Wednesday that Middle East leaders told him during a recent tour of the region that the U.S. invasion of Iraq has "been a real disaster for them. They believe that it has destabilized the region."

Annan said there were sharp divisions over an extended U.S. military presence in Iraq. He said that while regional leaders want American troops to remain until security improves, Iran has pressed for a swift U.S. withdrawal.

"The U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave," he said. "I believe that if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum, and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence in the region."

Meanwhile, prosecutors demanded that the chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial step down, saying he has shown too much sympathy for the defendants in the case. Chief prosecutor Minqith al-Faroon said the judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, had "allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum."

Hussein, charged with trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish minority during the 1980s Anfal campaign, has sprinkled the court hearings with outbursts accusing various people of being "Zionists" and "agents of Iran." But although the prosecutors criticized the judge, the defendants praised him.

"I swear by Allah, I saw that you were very patient today and listened to what we had to say," one of Hussein's co-defendants, Ali Hassan al-Majeed, known as "Chemical Ali," told the judge Wednesday. "I was pleased that you represent this court."

Kurdish witnesses testified Wednesday about horrific suffering in their villages during the Anfal campaign, in which prosecutors said 182,000 people were killed. The witnesses described an almost visceral urge to tell of the suffering their families and friends endured.

"I am sitting here in this court, with the blind eyes and the burned body, to provide it with scientific and medical evidence," said Omer Othman Mohammed, 42, a former guerrilla fighter from Sulaymaniyah. At one point, he brusquely brushed off a question from the judge and said he needed to tell his story without interruption.

Salah Gader Mohammad Ameen, a 31-year-old Kurd, said his mother, father and two brothers disappeared during the Anfal campaign. He testified that they were discovered only two years ago, when their bodies were found in a mass grave.

"May God have revenge on you!" Ameen shouted at Hussein. "Because of you, I have been deprived of my father."

Death Toll Soars In Baghdad (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD — On a day in which nearly 100 bodies attested to Iraq's unbridled violence, Democrats stepped up their response to President Bush's policies, with former national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski calling the war "unwinnable."

Iraqi officials announced they had found the bodies of 60 men, some of whom had been shot in the head after being tortured, over the previous 24 hours. They said there was no single massacre or mass execution. Rather, the slaughter in two Baghdad neighborhoods was probably the result of multiple roving assassination teams, they said.

In addition to the apparent executions, a pair of car bombs and other violence took at least 35 lives and left scores injured Wednesday, officials said. U.S. authorities reported the deaths of two more American soldiers, one killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad and the other killed in action in Al Anbar province, the hotbed of the Sunni Arab insurgency in western Iraq.

In his televised speech to the nation Monday, Bush said that U.S. security "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," setting a theme that Republicans hope will sustain support for the war and their candidates between now and November's elections.

Democrats, who have been divided in their own policy toward the war, offered a two-pronged response Wednesday. Brzezinski, the national security advisor under President Carter, accused the administration of committing the country to an unachievable goal. The Bush administration's aim of creating "a secular, stable, democratic Iraq" is "simply unreal," Brzezinski said during an appearance on Capitol Hill with retired Gen. Wesley Clark, the commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under President Clinton.

Meantime, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a conservative Democrat and former Marine who has become an outspoken critic of the war, said that Iraq had become a crushing burden on the U.S. Army. The war has created equipment shortages and badly strained soldiers as well as Marines, Murtha said.

Army officials responded in a statement that "we are an Army at war and there is a cost to war."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan seemed to join the debate, saying at a news conference in New York that many leaders he had met with on a recent trip to the Middle East felt that the invasion of Iraq "has been a real disaster" that has destabilized the region. But they were divided on whether a departure of U.S. forces would make matters better or worse, he said.

"In a way, the U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay, and it cannot leave," Annan said.

With the war shaping up as the dominant issue in the fall election, the administration and its critics have sought to shape public perception of what the U.S. ambassador here, Zalmay Khalilzad, has labeled the Battle of Baghdad.

The administration's efforts were notable Wednesday, as U.S. and Iraqi authorities disputed each other's accounts of the day's high death toll.

A U.S. military spokesman said the body count for the 24-hour period in question was actually about half of that reported by Iraqi officials. The dispute underscored how statistics on killings here have become hotly contested, particularly since the U.S. military launched a highly publicized security effort earlier in the summer. The security plan included the deployment of 8,000 additional U.S. troops to patrol with Iraqi forces in an effort to bring order to the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0063019

"We remain confident that these joint operations continue to be effective in reducing the violence in Baghdad," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman here.

On the Iraqi side, Muayed Matrood, an official at the besieged Baghdad morgue, said Wednesday's body count showed that "the phenomenon of a large number of unidentified and tortured corpses has returned back to Baghdad."

The morgue is due to receive two new refrigeration facilities to help handle the onslaught of corpses. "This is the first time in weeks that a number as large as this has been found within a day," Matrood said.

The Baghdad morgue had reported receiving about 17% fewer bodies in August than in July. That figure had created expectations that a downward trend could continue into this month. But violence increased markedly in the last few days of August and has continued unabated since then, sapping hope that the wanton killings would abate.

The large toll caused hardly a ripple in a capital that seems anesthetized to grim tidings. People went about their business, the government convened meetings, and the discovered corpses didn't amount to major news.

The 60 bodies were found scattered in two separate neighborhoods, Karkh, a mostly Sunni Muslim area in western Baghdad, where 43 were discovered, and Rusafa, a mostly Shiite Muslim area in eastern Baghdad, where 17 were found.

Most of the victims had gunshot wounds to the head. Some of the bodies were handcuffed and blindfolded and showed signs of torture.

Death squads stalk the streets of this once-tolerant capital, authorities say, targeting victims because of their sect. Many Iraqis fear leaving their neighborhoods, which are increasingly guarded by sectarian militias.

Shiite militiamen are widely regarded as the capital's principal executioners, evoking deep fear among terrorized Sunni Arabs. Other groups, mostly Sunni, have continued their campaign of bombings and other attacks on government officials, most of whom are Shiite.

On Wednesday, a pair of car bombs apparently targeting police killed at least 19 people and wounded 76 in Baghdad, authorities said. One car bomb detonated in a large square near the main headquarters of Baghdad's traffic police department, and the other exploded near a police patrol in the Zayona district.

More than a dozen other people were reported killed by small-arms fire and mortar rounds in Baghdad and its environs.

Among those killed was Safaa Ismael Enad, 31, a freelance photographer who was accosted by two gunmen in a photo studio. The gunmen asked for him by name, a colleague said, before they opened fire.

In all, 79 journalists and 28 media support workers have been killed in Iraq since the war began, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists, a New York-based advocacy group.

On Another Grim Day, Bodies Lie Everywhere In Baghdad (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 13 — Nearly 90 Iraqis were killed or found dead here on Tuesday and Wednesday, an Interior Ministry official said, making for a particularly grim day even amid the intense sectarian violence.

At least 60 bodies were found throughout Baghdad between 6 a.m. Tuesday and 6 a.m. Wednesday, the ministry official said. Forty victims were unknown; 20 were identified.

Nearly all were shot in the head, had clear signs of torture, or were blindfolded, bound or gagged, and most were discovered in neighborhoods of western Baghdad with heavy Sunni Arab populations, he said. The other deaths reported by the ministry were in bombings and other attacks on Wednesday.

American military officials, who have been more aggressive in challenging body counts if they consider them inaccurate, disputed the number found, saying the actual number was roughly half what the ministry had reported.

According to the Baghdad morgue, whose statistics often prove to be higher than figures reported by news services or the Interior Ministry, the bodies of 1,535 victims of violent deaths, an average of 50 a day, were received in August. In July, the average was 60 a day. A recent study of civilian deaths by the United Nations found that by June, Iraqis across the country were being killed at a rate of more than 100 a day.

As the Iraqi police gathered up the bodies, several car bombs rocked Baghdad, killing or wounding dozens more. Among the attacks was a bomb that detonated shortly after 9 a.m. in southern Baghdad, killing 15 people, including 7 Iraqi police officers, and wounding 25 police officers and civilians, an American military spokeswoman said.

The Interior Ministry also said a bomb planted in an unattended car near a police station in eastern Baghdad exploded about 11:30 a.m., killing eight policemen and wounding 19 civilians.

The United States military also said two American soldiers had been killed. One died Monday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar Province, the largely insurgent-controlled region west of Baghdad. Another was killed Tuesday south of Baghdad when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0063020

In the capital's heavily fortified Green Zone, a prosecutor in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein demanded Wednesday that the judge be removed for showing bias toward the former dictator and for letting him harangue witnesses.

Mr. Hussein is on trial for his role in the so-called Anfal military campaign in 1988 against Kurdish villages in northeastern Iraq. He and his co-defendants are accused of genocide in the killing at least 50,000 Kurds, including many in chemical weapon strikes.

He was tried earlier this year in the killing of 148 men and boys in 1982 in a Shiite village, Dujail, but that verdict is not expected for another month or two.

During the court session on Tuesday, Mr. Hussein called the Kurdish witnesses who had described atrocities at the hands of Mr. Hussein's military "agents of Iran and Zionism." And he warned witnesses that he would "crush your heads," according to an account by The Associated Press.

As the trial resumed Wednesday morning, a prosecutor, Munqith al-Faroon, accused the judge of letting "the defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words," according to a pool report filed by a reporter for The Daily Telegraph of London. Mr. Faroon said the judge had allowed defendants to "treat the chamber as a political forum."

The judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, who was a judge during Mr. Hussein's rule, responded coolly, not raising his voice. "The judge coordinates and makes peace among the people in his presence," he said.

The court heard a powerful and graphic account from Omer Othman Mohammed, who said he was a member of the Kurdish pesh merga militia who was caught in a chemical-weapon strike by Iraqi jets in April 1988 that left him badly burned from his chest to his legs.

"It was so fast, we were shocked," Mr. Mohammed testified, according to The Daily Telegraph's pool report. "The rockets did not explode, but they just broke. One hit close to me. When it broke, the chemical inside, it covered me. It was a liquid, not a gas. I was shocked. I was in pain.

"There was severe pain as if there was a high pressure on me or as if I was touching an electric current, or as if boiling water was being poured on my body. There are feelings you cannot describe to the people around you, even your loved ones."

Mr. Mohammed said he got up after the attack and saw that pieces of the rockets had sliced through some of his comrades.

"I saw people without their heads, I saw legs and arms," he said. "I saw parts of the body of my beloved friends. I called to a friend of mine and he came to me. I asked him for a mirror and asked him to bring me a first aid kit. I looked at my eyes and they were terribly red. I was suffering from terrible pain."

65 Tortured Bodies Found Around Baghdad (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 13, 2006

The leader of Iraq's biggest Sunni Arab group demanded Wednesday that the beleaguered Shiite-led government take steps to disarm militias after police said the bodies of 65 tortured men were dumped in and around Baghdad.

On a violent day even by the standards of Baghdad, car bombs, mortars and other attacks also killed at least 39 people and wounded dozens. Two U.S. soldiers also were killed, one in enemy action in restive Anbar province on Monday and the other in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad on Tuesday, the U.S. military command said.

The attacks have been unrelenting despite a security crackdown around the capital by 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops. The more than 1,500 violent deaths last month at the height of the joint operation speak to the difficulties in restoring any semblance of security to this sprawling city of 6 million people.

Although Sunni Arabs operate some death squads, the vast majority are run by Shiite militias and gangs.

Shiite political groups, including those in power, claim that armed militias have nothing to do with them and that their own military wings were disarmed months ago and turned into social and humanitarian groups. They claim that armed groups and militias are "rogue" elements beyond their control, but many Sunni Arabs contend that they are in fact controlled by Shiite politicians and clerics.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a Sunni who heads the Iraqi Accordance Front political party, called on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, to take a first step by honoring a pledge to disband militias.

"We hope the government carries out what it pledged and disbands militias and considers them terrorist organizations," al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press. His party is Iraq's largest Sunni Arab political bloc and holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament.

"Their presence is deteriorating the situation and bringing more troubles to the political atmosphere," al-Dulaimi said of militias. "We call upon all religious authorities to raise their voices and demand militias be disarmed."

DOJ_NMG_0063021

Police said 60 of the bodies were found overnight around Baghdad, with the majority dumped in predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhoods.

All the bodies were bound, bore signs of torture and had been shot, police said. Such killings are usually the work of death squads who kidnap people and usually torture them with power drills, or beat them, before shooting them execution-style with a bullet to the head.

The U.S. military said it could not confirm all the executions and that their body count so far was lower than that reported by police.

"It is looking like about a 50 percent discrepancy on execution-style killings so far," said Maj. Josslyn Aberle, chief of the media relations division for the Multi-National Corps-Iraq.

The reason for the difference was not immediately clear. The confusion over numbers underscores the difficulty of obtaining accurate death tolls in Iraq, which lacks the reporting and tracking systems of most modern nations. Also, counts by the U.S. military often lag behind those of the police.

According to Iraqi police, 45 of the bodies were discovered in predominantly Sunni Arab parts of western Baghdad. Fifteen were found in predominantly Shiite areas of eastern Baghdad. And five were found floating down the Tigris river in Suwayrah, just south of Baghdad.

In the two bloodiest attacks in the capital, a car bombing killed at least 19 people and wounded more than 62 in a large square used mostly as a parking lot near the main headquarters of Baghdad's traffic police department.

In eastern Baghdad, a parked car bomb exploded next to an Iraqi police patrol in the Zayona neighborhood, killing at least 12 people and wounding 34.

It is believed that some Shiite parties with militias accused of involvement in sectarian killings have support from neighboring Iran. Those parties are also allied with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

Al-Maliki, on a visit to Iran on Wednesday, pressed Tehran to stop interference that is having a "negative" impact on his country's security, his spokesman said in an unusual criticism of an ally with which Baghdad's ties are getting closer.

As al-Maliki met with Iranian leaders for a second day, no public mention was made on the issue of interference. Instead, the Iraqi prime minister and Iranian officials exchanged warm vows of growing friendship.

In Baghdad, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said al-Maliki underlined that "we want the best of relations with Iran and we don't want interference in our internal affairs."

Al-Dabbagh suggested that funding was coming from Iran to groups in Iraq, which he did not identify.

"There is interference coming from neighboring countries and it has negative implications for the situation in Iraq," he told the AP in a telephone interview. "We want to bar financing for certain parties."

"Iran has shown it will help, and we want to see implementation of that," he said.

Sunni Arabs fear more sectarian violence will break out if the largest Shiite political bloc in parliament moves to establish autonomous regions as part of a federal Iraq.

Iraq's parliament speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, urged that a bill drafted by the dominant Shiite United Iraqi Alliance not be submitted until parliament amends the country's new constitution, a process that could drag on for months.

American, British and U.N. officials were also said to be urging a postponement.

Sunni Arabs vehemently oppose the bill, saying it could split the country into three distinct sectarian and ethnic regions that would deprive them of the country's oil wealth.

Federalism is already part of Iraq's new constitution and there is an autonomous Kurdish region in the north. However, special legislation and a referendum would be needed to turn Iraq into a full federation.

Shiite leaders of the United Iraqi Alliance were sending delegations to Najaf to meet with radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and other prominent Shiites who do not fully support the legislation — but for different reasons than the Sunnis'. Al-Sadr, for example, wants the issue to be discussed only after U.S. troops leave Iraq.

Iran Says U.S. Departure Would Calm Iraq (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, September 13, 2006

Supreme Iranian leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told the visiting Iraqi prime minister Wednesday that the way to end instability in Iraq is for U.S. forces to withdraw.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was on the second day of his first visit to Iran since he taking office in May, looking to a close ally of his Shiite-led government for help in calming the violence tearing apart Iraq and in developing Iraq's troubled oil industry.

He told Khamenei the Iranian governments must stop outside influences that are having a "negative" impact on Iraq's security, the Iraqi leader's spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0063022

With Iraq torn by sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Muslims, as well as a Sunni-led insurgency, the United States has frequently accused the Iranian regime of interfering in Iraqi politics and allowing insurgents to cross the border. Tehran denies that.

Khamenei told al-Maliki that Iran "considers it an obligation to support the Iraqi government in practical ways," Iran's state news agency said.

But Khamenei — who holds the final word in all political matters in Iran — made clear Iran wants to see the withdrawal of U.S. troops, which he blamed in part for the turmoil plaguing Iraq.

"Part of (Iraq's) sufferings have been due to the actions of the former regime and part is due to the presence of occupiers in Iraq," Khamenei told al-Maliki, according to the Iranian state news agency and state television.

"We hope a day will come when the Iraqi people reach the stage they deserve and that, by cutting the hands of the foreigners, its wealth will come to serve the Iraqi people," Khamenei said.

State TV quoted al-Maliki as saying instability was Iraq's biggest challenge and he blamed the violence mainly on supporters of Saddam's old regime.

No public mention was made of outside meddling in Iraqi affairs. In Baghdad, however, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said al-Maliki underlined that Iraq wants good relations with Iran, but also that "we don't want interference in our internal affairs."

Al-Dabbagh suggested money was flowing from elements in Iran to groups in Iraq, which he did not identify.

It is believed some Shiite parties with militias accused of involvement in sectarian killings have support from groups in Iran, a predominantly Shiite nation. Those parties are also allied to al-Maliki's government, which has struggled to rein in the militias.

"There is interference coming from neighboring countries and it has negative implications for the situation in Iraq," al-Dabbagh told The Associated Press in a telephone interview from Baghdad. "We want to bar financing for certain parties."

"Iran has shown it will help, and we want to see implementation of that," he added.

The comments reflect the complex relationship between Iran and Iraq, which is backed by the United States — Tehran's top enemy. Al-Maliki's Dawa Party is closely allied with Iran as are other Shiite parties in his government, and al-Maliki lived in Iran for part of his long exile during Saddam's rule.

In a meeting with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, al-Maliki thanked Iran for giving haven to Iraqi leaders opposed to Saddam's rule.

"Iraq is Iran's natural ally," state TV quoted Larijani as telling al-Maliki.

In the latest sign of increasing cooperation, the two countries reached a deal for jointly developing oil fields straddling their border, and eventually Iraq will send crude oil to refineries in Iran for processing, Iraq's Oil Ministry said Wednesday.

Iran is also helping Iraq in its chronic shortages of petroleum products. Under a deal reached last month, Iraq will sell crude oil to its neighbor, which will sell back kerosene, and an Iranian-Turkish company will deliver gasoline, Iraqi Oil Ministry spokesman Assem Jihad told AP.

Middle East Riven Over U.S., Annan Says (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- Washington's options in Iraq are constrained by competing pressures from countries in the region for the U.S. to stay or to leave quickly, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

"The U.S. has found itself in a position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave," he said at a press conference. "And if it has to leave, the timing has to be optimum and it has to be arranged in such a way that it does not lead to even greater disruption or violence."

Pressed by reporters, he declined to offer suggestions. But in his first extended remarks since returning from a two-week, 11-country trip through the Middle East, Mr. Annan said most regional leaders felt the U.S. occupation of Iraq had harmed their countries.

"Honestly, most of the leaders I spoke to felt invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them. They feel it has destabilized the region," Mr. Annan said.

"Actually, there were two schools," he added. "Many leaders who felt the Americans should stay until the situation improves, and that having created the problem, [they] cannot walk away.

"Then you have another school, particularly in Iran, [where authorities believe] the presence of the U.S. is a problem and the U.S. should leave."

DOJ_NMG_0063023

The secretary-general said officials in Tehran told him that "if the U.S. were to decide to leave, they would help them leave." The Iranians did not explain the comment, he said, "but they made it quite clear that the U.S. presence is a problem that must be withdrawn."

The stay-or-go argument has been gathering steam in Washington, where lawmakers are grappling with whether or how to extricate more than 130,000 U.S. troops from an increasingly unpopular war. With November elections looming, politicians from both sides of the aisle are staking out positions for and against a withdrawal.

Iraqi authorities discovered 65 bodies in and around Baghdad yesterday, most of which had been bound and tortured. It was the latest evidence that organized death squads continue to operate in the capital, despite the redeployment of large numbers of American troops to the city.

Also yesterday, car bombings and mortar fire killed 32 persons and wounded 76, according to the Associated Press.

The United Nations has been asked by Iraqi and U.S. officials to take a larger role in the stabilization and rehabilitation of Iraq, a country that sits atop the second-largest oil reserve in the world.

At his press conference, Mr. Annan also praised donor nations and the often-divided U.N. Security Council for acting together to help bring peace and stability to Lebanon after Israel's July invasion, which was prompted by the abduction by Hezbollah militants of two Israeli soldiers.

He also acknowledged frustration with Sudan's refusal to permit an effective international peacekeeping force to enter the western Darfur region and stressed that Iran and the West must work quickly to restore some confidence before negotiations on nuclear uranium enrichment can go forward.

House Dems Review Call For Rumsfeld Resignation (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 14, 2006

Echoing moves in the Senate, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) is calling for the immediate resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Murtha's call comes just as he and Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee, released a new report on the state of U.S. Army readiness.

In his resolution Murtha lists a litany of reasons for Rumsfeld's immediate resignation, ranging from the secretary's insistence that there were weapons of mass in destruction in Iraq to his failure to anticipate the number of troops needed to secure Iraq and to address the flagging readiness of U.S ground troops.

In recent weeks Democrats have intensified their criticism the GOP and Bush administration policies in Iraq and have stepped up their calls for Rumsfeld's resignation.

"The Defense Secretary should return to the private sector," Obey said at a press conference yesterday.

The newly released readiness report, which served in part as a basis for Murtha's resolution, said that the Army's preparedness has eroded to levels not seen since the Vietnam war, and that the service's readiness will continue to decline as troops continue to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan. The reduction in readiness levels will undermine the Pentagon's ability to respond to future conflicts, the report said.

Roughly one-half of the entire U.S. Army is reported to be at the lowest level of military readiness. The situation in the Army National Guard and Reserves is even worse, the report said.

The vast majority of the 16 active-duty, non-deployed combat brigades in the United States managed by the Army's Forces Command are rated at the lowest readiness ratings because of severe equipment shortages, according to the report.

"The lack of national attention paid to the Army's plight is unconscionable," Murtha told reporters yesterday.

The low readiness rates become a concern for the units scheduled for deployment later this year, particularly for the 1st Cavalry Division, which faces equipment shortfalls.

The new report emphasizes that the Army's major short-term challenge is repairing its battle-worn equipment.

The Army needs an additional $17.1 billion in 2007 to spruce up its equipment. The Senate has approved an additional $13.1 billion to the $50 billion emergency bridge fund in the 2007 defense appropriations bill to deal with both Army and Marine Corps equipment repair. House and Senate conferees on the spending bill will decide the final amount that will be added to that bridge fund.

Meanwhile, the chairmen of the House and Senate Armed Services committees agreed to authorize an additional $20 billion for equipment repair.

Why We Can't Send More Troops (WP)

By Lawrence J. Korb And Peter Ogden

DOJ_NMG_0063024

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

In "Reinforce Baghdad" [op-ed, Sept. 12], William Kristol and Rich Lowry argue that the United States needs to deploy "substantially" more troops to Iraq to stabilize the country. Aside from the strategic dubiousness of their proposal -- Kristol and Lowry's piece might alternatively have been titled "Reinforcing Failure" -- there is a practical obstacle to it that they overlook: Sending more troops to Iraq would, at the moment, threaten to break our nation's all-volunteer Army and undermine our national security. This is not a risk our country can afford to take.

In their search for additional troops and equipment for Iraq, the first place that Kristol and Lowry would have to look is the active Army. But even at existing deployment levels, the signs of strain on the active Army are evident. In July an official report revealed that two-thirds of the active U.S. Army was classified as "not ready for combat." When one combines this news with the fact that roughly one-third of the active Army is deployed (and thus presumably ready for combat), the math is simple but the answer alarming: The active Army has close to zero combat-ready brigades in reserve.

The second place to seek new troops and equipment is the Army National Guard and Reserve. But the news here is, if anything, worse. When asked by reporters to comment on the strain that the active Army was under, the head of the National Guard said that his military branch was "in an even more dire situation than the active Army. We both have the same symptoms; I just have a higher fever."

Already, the stress of Iraq and Afghanistan on our soldiers has been significant: Every available active-duty combat brigade has served at least one tour in Iraq or Afghanistan, and many have served two or three. Likewise, the vast majority of Army National Guardsmen and Reservists have been mobilized since Sept. 11, 2001, some more than once.

Thus the simple fact is that the only way for Kristol and Lowry to put their new plan into action anytime soon without resorting to a draft -- and thereby dismantling the all-volunteer Army, which, as the authors themselves would certainly admit, could be strategically disastrous -- is by demanding even more from our soldiers by accelerating their training and rotation schedules. While there is no question that the soldiers would respond to more frequent calls to duty, it is doubtful that they would be supplied with proper equipment and training for their mission in the near term. Moreover, the long-term toll on the cost and quality of our troops would be threatened by the added strain.

First, the equipment shortage that the U.S. Army faces at the moment is making it difficult to train troops even at current levels. The service has been compensating for this $50 billion equipment shortfall by shipping to Iraq some of the equipment that it needs to train nondeployed and reserve units. Increasing the number of deployed troops would compound this readiness problem and leave the Army with little spare capacity to respond to other conflicts around the globe that might demand immediate and urgent action.

Second, the long-term costs of leaning even more heavily on our ground troops to fight what is an unpopular war will take its toll on the quality of our Army. At present the Army is compelled to offer promotions to an unprecedented number of its personnel to retain them. Some 98 percent of captains were promoted to major this year, and the quality of the next generation of military leaders will suffer if this process is not made more selective once again.

In addition, even the quadrupling of recruitment bonuses since 2003 has not been enough to attract adequate numbers of talented men and women to meet the Army's personnel goals. Although the Army has accepted more troops with lower aptitude scores and raised its maximum enlistment age, it still must grant waivers to about 1 out of 5 new recruits and has had to cut in half the number who "wash out" in basic training.

While we disagree with Kristol and Lowry's contention that sending more troops to Iraq would bring peace and stability to the country, the U.S. Army and National Guard and Reserve should nevertheless possess the capacity to respond to such a plan or other deployments without undue strain and long-term costs. The solution is to do two things that the Bush administration has not: permanently increase the number of troops in the active Army and fully fund its equipment needs. Let this, not the expenditure of more blood and treasure in Iraq, be the "courageous act of presidential leadership" that Kristol and Lowry desire.

50 Killed In Widespread Afghan Violence (AP)

By Paul Garwood

AP, September 13, 2006

NATO nations failed to agree on calls by military commanders for 2,500 extra troops to help crush the growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan, where at least 50 people were killed Wednesday in widespread violence.

NATO announced that 173 people — including 151 Afghan civilians — have been killed in suicide bombings across the country since the start of the year. The remaining victims include NATO and U.S.-led coalition forces and Afghan authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0063025

It was the first time NATO released such figures and they indicate the dangerous change in tactics by militants, who have been following the lead of insurgent attacks in Iraq.

The ferocity of the Taliban resurgence since their 2001 ouster has taken U.S. and NATO commanders by surprise, particularly in southern provinces where NATO forces have been clashing daily with militants since taking control of the region on Aug. 1.

"Such blatant disregard for human life and potential undertaken by insurgents who callously ask to be called mujahedeen (holy warriors) cannot be more clear," NATO spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig said.

U.S. officials announced after a Kabul car bombing Friday that killed 16 — including two American troops — that a suicide bombing cell was hunting foreign troops in the capital.

Meanwhile, thousands of Canadian troops reclaimed more contested territory from Taliban fighters in the southern Kandahar province insurgent hotbeds of Panjwayi and Zhari. NATO forces claim to have killed at least 517 militants in both districts since launching a large-scale campaign on Sept. 2 dubbed Operation Medusa.

Purported Taliban spokesmen dispute the death toll and claim in videotapes that they are pushing NATO forces to the limit across the vast deserts and mountain ranges of Helmand and Kandahar provinces.

Some 8,000 Canadian, British and Dutch soldiers — almost half of the 20,000-strong NATO force — are leading the anti-Taliban push in the south. But military chiefs say another 2,500 troops, plus greater air support, would help them crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

In Brussels, Belgium, allied military experts failed Wednesday to commit more troops, planes and helicopters to the NATO mission, despite a plea by the alliance's American commander, Gen. James L. Jones.

"No formal offers were made at the table," said NATO spokesman James Appathurai. He told a news conference some allies had given "positive indications" on the reinforcements, but suggested final decisions may have to wait until a Sept. 28-29 meeting of NATO defense ministers in Slovenia.

In Kabul, another NATO spokesman, Mark Laity, said NATO forces were only at "85 percent of the capabilities we were told we would have" to fight between 4,000 to 7,000 insurgents believed active in the country.

"These extra forces are needed because we are in a particularly intense environment," Laity told The Associated Press. "But Operation Medusa proves that we have considerable capabilities that we can do a considerable amount with."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said all NATO members had a responsibility to back the alliance's Afghan cause.

"NATO is looking at what further requirements there are and NATO and NATO countries have got a duty to respond," he told reporters in London.

In southern Helmand province, police killed 16 Taliban in a mountainous area outside the town of Garmser, which militants recently took over for the second time in two months, before Afghan and NATO forces claimed it again on Monday.

Garmser police chief Ghulam Rassoul said the militants were killed in a four-hour battle that began late Tuesday and continued into Wednesday.

Afghan and U.S.-led coalition forces also killed between 20 and 30 Taliban on Wednesday in raids on three villages in central Ghazni province, Afghan officials said.

In western Farah province, four police and four insurgents were killed after militants ambushed a police convoy, said Farah provincial chief of police, Gen. Sayed Agha Saqeb.

In other violence around Afghanistan:

· A U.N. aid worker was killed Tuesday when militants fired on his car in a remote Farah village.

· A suicide attacker was the sole victim when his bomb exploded inside a Sunni Muslim mosque in Kandahar, police said. The motive for the blast was unclear.

· A roadside bomb killed a border police guard chief and three other officers in eastern Kunar province Wednesday, police said.

· In the eastern Nangarhar province, where al-Qaida militants have long been active, two rockets were fired into the provincial capital of Jalalabad several hours before Afghan President Hamid Karzai and the Pakistani premier opened a new road. No casualties were reported.

NATO Allies Ignore Call For Troops (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

NATO allies failed to answer Washington's call to commit more troops to the escalating battle with Taliban and al Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan yesterday, prompting the Bush administration to rethink its diplomatic strategy ahead of two meetings of alliance ministers later this month.

DOJ_NMG_0063026

U.S. officials said they still hoped that countries would come forward, noting that some interest in providing forces was expressed at the Brussels session, but they also indicated that they would target specific NATO members with capabilities to step up to the task.

"We have some thoughts in mind of countries that might contribute additional forces," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack. "We are going to be having those conversations, obviously, in coordination with the NATO leadership."

Yesterday's urgent meeting at the alliance's headquarters in the Belgian capital was called after NATO commanders issued an appeal last week for up to 2,500 extra troops in southern Afghanistan in the face of surprisingly strong Taliban resistance.

However, "no formal offers were made at the table," said NATO spokesman James Appathurai, even though there were some "positive indications" from several members, which he did not name.

Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that Washington wants "to have more punch" in the Afghan mission "no later than the beginning of October, because this is an essential season before the cold comes in Afghanistan."

But NATO officials said it is not likely that a decision about an expanded force will be made before the end of September, when alliance defense ministers are scheduled to meet in Slovenia, one of the newest members.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to host a meeting of fellow foreign ministers in New York during the opening of the U.N. General Assembly session next week, and U.S. officials said they plan to use the occasion for aggressive diplomacy.

There are about 18,500 NATO troops currently in Afghanistan, but most of them operate in the capital, Kabul, and other regions, rather than in the troublesome south. The force there is led by Britain, which has about 4,500 troops in the entire country. The United States, Canada and the Netherlands have about 2,000 each, while Romania, Denmark and others have smaller contingents.

About 30 NATO soldiers have been killed since the alliance took over the force in Afghanistan earlier this summer.

"It is important that the whole of NATO regards this as their responsibility," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said yesterday. "NATO is looking at what further requirements there are, and NATO and NATO countries have got a duty to respond to that."

But many European governments have said that their forces are stretched too thin with their current deployments in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon, Ivory Coast, Congo and the Balkans.

The German Defense Ministry on Tuesday ruled out sending troops to southern Afghanistan, saying that its existing deployment of 2,900 troops in the country's north has taken it close to a limit of 3,000 set by parliament.

Spain, France and Italy already have contingents in western Afghanistan and in Kabul, and recently committed troops to the expanded U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon. Turkey has ruled out sending any reinforcements.

NATO said yesterday that 173 persons, including 151 Afghan civilians, have been killed in suicide bombings across the country so far this year. At least 50 persons were killed yesterday in widespread violence.

Poland Is Best Hope For Afghan Force (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Stephen Fidler, And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

Poland emerged on Wednesday as Nato's best hope of more troops for Afghanistan, after a formal meeting of the alliance failed to meet an urgent military request for hundreds of extra soldiers.

The Polish defence ministry said Warsaw, which has announced plans to withdraw its 900 soldiers from Iraq, was in talks with its Nato allies about where and when they would be deployed in Afghanistan. Poland, which has about 100 troops in Afghanistan, has already announced it will send about 900 extra soldiers to the country from 2007.

Diplomats said it might be possible to speed up the Polish deployment. One Nato official said: "We are close to getting substantial contributions from at least two European countries not currently in the south [of Afghanistan]." He declined to name them. At present, the fight in the south is being led by troops from Canada, Britain and the Netherlands.

The push for reinforcements, preferably to arrive before the hard Afghan winter sets in, has put the spotlight both on Nato's struggle to help establish a stable government in Afghanistan and on its long-term prospects as a military alliance.

At an emergency meeting yesterday, Nato's 26 member countries came up with no commitments for any new soldiers – in spite of a call last week by General James Jones, Nato's supreme commander, for up to 2,500 troops. But officials believe that the likely offers from the two European countries should meet Gen Jones' most important demand – for a 800-1,000 strong reserve battalion to aid Nato's fight against the Taliban-led insurgency in south Afghanistan.

Nato said: "We have had indications in terms of force generation to fill the outstanding requirement . . . the operation commanders, including Gen Jones, are confident that they have sufficient forces in the theatre to be able to complete the operation successfully." The alliance said it had managed to clear Taliban insurgents from 55 per cent of the area surrounding their former stronghold of Kandahar.

Lord Garden, a former senior air force officer who acts as a defence spokesman for Britain's Liberal Democratic party, said: "Part of the problem . . . is Nato funding. If you volunteer, not only do you provide the troops, you have to provide the money to fund them."

Diplomats sought to emphasise that the Nato mission was a long way from failure. Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, said: "One of the things that is getting lost here is that the operation against the Taliban is a huge success. The extra troops will allow us to win faster and more decisively and to continue reconstruction at the same time."

However, casualties taken by British troops in the southern province of Helmand have increased controversy over the mission.

Military Will Meet '06 Recruiting Goals (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The U.S. Armed Forces will meet wartime recruiting goals for the fiscal year that ends in two weeks, military officials said yesterday.

Despite Washington's heated political debate on the worthiness of the Iraq war, frequent overseas war deployments and daily casualties, officials say a sufficient number of young men and women are signing up with the Army, Air Force, Navy and Marine Corps in fiscal 2006 to maintain an active-duty force of about 1.4 million.

The Army, which has suffered the largest death toll as the chief provider of troops in Afghanistan and Iraq, reports that it has exceeded a goal of 70,200 recruits by signing up 72,997 as of August. Officials say they expect to meet a Sept. 30 goal of 80,000 for the fiscal year.

The Army missed its goal two years ago for the first time since 1999, sparking fears that the stress of the global war on terrorism and daily reports of soldier deaths were discouraging high school graduates from joining.

Hitting the mark in a time of war has cost the Army more money -- and style. In June, it raised the maximum age for recruits from 38 to 42, and says it has attracted scores of veterans. And it relaxed tattoo rules. Now, body art can extend above the neck.

"We learned more and more teenagers have tattoos, so we relaxed the tattoo policy," said Maj. Nathan Banks, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon.

The Army also is offering increased college tuition reimbursement and sign-up bonuses up to $40,000.

Of exceeding the recruiting goal, Maj. Banks said, "It's always better to have more than less. We don't stop."

The Marine Corps, which has troops in the restive and deadly Anbar province in Iraq, also will meet its goal this fiscal year of 32,701 active-duty recruits and 5,930 reservists, said Maj. Wes Hayes, a spokesman for Marine Corps Recruiting Command. He said the Corps has not increased incentives.

"Our success is all attributed to those 2,650 Marine Corps recruiters, their tireless efforts, their professionalism at informing and educating young men and women about the Marine Corps," he said.

The Pentagon reports that the Navy and Air Force also are meeting recruitment goals.

The Army is still encountering shortfalls in Reserve recruiting. It stands at 94 percent of a targeted 33,124 by the end of August. The Army National Guard is a few tenths of a percent below its goal.

Gay Groups Renew Drive Against "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

MADISON, Wis. —The three young men who tried to enlist at an Army recruiting station here appeared to be first-rate military material.

Two were college students, and the other was a college graduate. They had no criminal records. They were fit and eager to serve at a time when wars on two fronts have put a strain on American troops and the need for qualified recruits is great.

But the recruiter was forced to turn them away, for one reason: they are gay and unwilling to conceal it.

"Don't judge me because of my sexuality," said one of the three, Justin Hager, 20, a self-described Republican from a military family who has "a driving desire to join" the armed forces. "Judge me because of my character and drive."

As the Pentagon's search for soldiers grows more urgent, gay rights groups are making the biggest push in nearly a decade to win repeal of a compromise policy, encoded in a 1993 law and dubbed "don't ask, don't tell," that bars openly gay people from serving in the military.

The policy, grounded in a belief that open homosexuality is damaging to unit morale and cohesion, stipulates that gay men and lesbians must serve in silence and refrain from homosexual activity, and that recruiters and commanders may not ask them about their sexual orientation in the absence of compelling evidence that homosexual acts have occurred.

The push for repeal follows years of legal setbacks, as well as discord among gay rights groups about how, or even whether, to address the issue. Now, rather than rely on the courts, advocates are focusing on drumming up support in towns across the nation, spotlighting the personal stories of gay former service members and pushing a Democratic bill in the House that would do away with the policy.

In August the gay rights group Soulforce opened a national campaign by recruiting openly gay people, including the three young men in Madison, who would have enlisted in the military if not for "don't ask, don't tell." [As part of that campaign, two young people who were rejected as applicants on Tuesday at a recruitment center in Chicago returned there on Wednesday and engaged in a sit-in. They were arrested but later released without charges.]

The move to change the policy faces stiff resistance from the Pentagon and Republicans in Congress, who, in a time of war during a tough election year, have no longing for another contentious debate about gay troops. The House bill, introduced last year by Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, has picked up 119 supporters, but only five of them Republicans.

"In the near term, it has zero chance," said Daniel Gouré, a vice president at the centrist Lexington Institute. "It's hard to see how anyone would want to give potential opponents any ammunition to knock them off."

A 2004 report by the Urban Institute concluded that at least 60,000 gay people were serving in the armed forces, including the Reserves and the National Guard. But since 1993, at least 11,000 members have been discharged for being openly gay, among them 800 in highly crucial jobs, according to the Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm.

For all of that, gay rights groups, gay veterans and some analysts say much has changed since the policy was adopted. A Gallup poll in 2004 found that 63 percent of respondents favored allowing gay troops to serve openly, and a similar survey, by the Pew Research Center this year, put the number at 60 percent; those majorities did not exist in 1993. Young people in particular now have more tolerant views about homosexuality.

In addition, 24 foreign armies, most notably those of Britain and Israel, have integrated openly gay people into their ranks with little impact on effectiveness and recruitment. In Britain, where the military was initially forced to accept gay troops by the European Court of Human Rights, gay partners are now afforded full benefits, and the Royal Navy has called on a gay rights group to help recruit gay sailors.

The new debate on "don't ask, don't tell" also coincides with multiple deployments that are being required of many American troops by a military that has lowered its standards to allow more high school dropouts and some convicted criminals to enlist.

"Would you rather have a felon than a gay soldier?" said Capt. Scott Stanford, a heterosexual National Guard commander of a headquarters company who returned from Iraq in June. "I wouldn't."

Lt. Gen. Daniel W. Christman, retired, former superintendent at West Point and onetime assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said both the British experience and the shifts in attitudes at home would cause the American armed forces to change, though slowly.

"It is clear that national attitudes toward this issue have evolved considerably in the last decade," said General Christman, now a senior vice president at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "This has been led by a new generation of service members who take a more relaxed and tolerant view toward homosexuality."

In fact, a growing number of gay service members have told advocacy groups that fewer heterosexual troops are making homosexuality an issue. In some cases, they say, commanders look the other way when someone is suspected of being gay or even avows it, especially if that service member is valuable. Since the war in Afghanistan began in 2001, discharges of openly gay members have fallen by 40 percent.

"People are really blasé about the issue," said Tim Smith, 24, a former marine who was discharged last year after a civilian chaplain, told of Mr. Smith's homosexuality by congregants, alerted his commander.

Mr. Smith, who was married when he entered the Marine Corps in 2001, hopes to dispel a stereotype of the "promiscuous, night-going, street-dancing" gay man by telling his story and sharing the reaction that disclosure of his orientation elicited. That reaction was largely favorable. At the end, he said, his commander even told the commanding general in a letter that Mr. Smith would be impossible to replace.

On the other side of the divide, Elaine Donnelly, president of the conservative Center for Military Readiness, said permitting gay men and lesbians to serve openly would prompt recruitment rates to drop and disrupt unit cohesion, a linchpin in the decision to allow gay troops to serve only in silence.

"People in the military live in conditions of little or no privacy," said Ms. Donnelly, who advocates a full ban on gay troops. "In conditions of forced intimacy, people should not have to expose themselves to other persons who are sexually attracted to them."

Further, the policy lets unhappy troops, straight or gay, ditch the military service to which they have committed. About 85 percent of those discharged under the policy had declared a homosexual orientation, according to the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, a gay rights watchdog; roughly half that number had volunteered the information simply to get out of the military.

"It lets people kind of get out of jail free," said Aaron Belkin, director of the Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military, a research group at the University of California, Santa Barbara, that has sided with the effort to eliminate "don't ask, don't tell."

Mr. Hager, the young man rejected at the recruiting center here in August along with John Alaniz, 25, and Derek House, 19, had expected that outcome. Joining the Soulforce campaign, he said, was about making a point.

He had tried to enlist in the Navy in high school, when his sexual orientation was still hidden, and had scored high in his aptitude test. His father had served in Vietnam, and his grandfather, a concentration camp survivor, had instilled in him a drive to safeguard America. But a broken ankle dashed his plans then.

This time it was his own words that sidelined him.

"I am openly homosexual," he said, "and that opportunity won't be there for me."

The President's Lawyer And Paradigm Change (SCRIPPS)

By Jose De La Isla

Scripps Howard, September 14, 2006

Commentary By JOSE DE LA ISLA

President Bush has finally announced that 14 terrorist suspects will go on trial. He has acknowledged the detainees have been in CIA hands and are now in military custody. Congress still has to authorize court procedures for the trials. This is a pivotal moment. It is a "paradigm change," a time when one conceptual way of understanding could give way to another.

Alberto Gonzales, as Bush's legal counselor in the White House before becoming U.S. attorney general, will continue as a central character. He is without peer in putting the policies together.

Not since Robert F. Kennedy was working for his brother JFK have the White House and Justice Department driven such fundamental change. The enigmatic, secretive Gonzales will have a lasting effect on future presidencies.

Before going to the White House, Gonzales had been Gov. George W. Bush's legal advisor, Texas' secretary of state, and then chief justice on the state Supreme Court.

He was from the beginning a close, trusted member of the Bush team. Although Washington hands did not immediately peg him as intimately associated as Karl Rove, Karen Hughes and Harriet Miers, he was.

According to a new book by Bill Minutaglio, "The President's Counselor: The Rise to Power of Alberto Gonzales" (Rayo Books, 2006), he was the closest, the keeper of family secrets, and the one who understood what Bush wanted to accomplish. Minutaglio's tome is strongest in summarizing mountains of news accounts, providing context and connecting the dots, showing how decisions were made. The account is weakest when he tries to interpret Gonzales' Hispanic and family background. What emerges is Gonzales and Bush virtually joined at the hip.

What Karl Rove has been to Bush's political planning, Gonzales has been to legal strategy. Before 9/11, Gonzales had assembled a group of lawyers, mainly members of the Federalist Society, in the White House's Office of Legal Counsel. The conservative organization holds that the Constitution has a fixed and knowable meaning and they oppose interpretations that cast it as having an evolving significance.

He and his group were leaders on legal policy issues, even over the Justice Department, national security advisor Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell at the State Department, mostly because Gonzales had the president's ear.

From the White House, Timothy Flanigan, Bradford Berenson and Brett Kavanaugh, among others, sought to fast-track, streamline and broaden presidential authority.

The attacks of 9/11 only accelerated that approach, called "forward leaning," to anticipate, detect, detain and prosecute suspects and those who maintained ties to or supported suspected terrorist activities.

These White House lawyers understood that in order for the United States to have the upper hand on the enemy, it needed an ability to get information and take preemptive measures.

Much of what happened next is widely known. The definition of torture was tweaked to make it not torture. The Geneva Convention was considered confining, "quaint," and ignored. Suspects have been held and transported to secret prisons, called "extraordinary rendition." Domestic wiretapping occurred without court authorization and it circumvented oversight.

The fast-tracking, streamlining, and broadening of presidential powers rolled over Congress, which granted broad authority in its resolution of Sept. 14 and the Patriot Act. Otherwise, Congress was not a full partner in granting and overseeing war powers. Now it has to decide whether to go along with the Bush administration's proposal for trying terrorists.

Through it all, Gonzales was there, in the middle of the legal justifications for the hallmarks of this administration. He had a hand in or he could have intervened before ideas reached the president on paper. But to the legal team that worked for him, the assumption all along was Alberto Gonzales represented the direction the president wanted.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

AG Office Says Criminal Charges Possible Within Week As HP Reshuffles Board (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Criminal charges could come within a week in the boardroom spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co., the state Attorney General's Office said Wednesday.

Spokesman Tom Dresslar did not say who would be charged or what the charges would be. He also emphasized that it may take longer for the detailed investigation to produce charges.

"We're not going to confine ourselves to any particular timetable," Dresslar said. "We'll go when we're ready to go, and not a minute before that."

On Tuesday, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he already had enough evidence to charge HP insiders and the private investigators who impersonated board members and journalists in order to access logs of their personal phone calls.

"We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Lockyer told PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer."

He has said HP's internal probe of media leaks violated two California laws governing identity theft and illegal access to computer records.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney for Northern California are also investigating HP for illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. The company also faces inquiries by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee.

On Tuesday, the company announced that Chairwoman Patricia Dunn would step down in January and be replaced by chief executive Mark Hurd.

Dunn has admitted authorizing the investigation into who was leaking boardroom secrets to reporters, but said she was appalled that private investigators hired by the company used Social Security numbers to impersonate HP directors and reporters, then persuaded phone companies to turn over detailed logs of their home phone calls.

The ruse - known as "pretexting" - is commonly used by private investigators but is against the law, according to Lockyer.

Dunn would appear to be the most likely HP insider to be charged in the criminal probe, but legal experts said investigators must prove that she knew the investigators would be engaging in illegal activity.

"If she had no idea that anyone was going to be involved in this type of conduct, then under our system of justice she shouldn't be prosecuted," said Ken Sukhia, a former U.S. attorney in Tallahassee, Florida.

It's unclear who did know that personal phone records were being compromised by the investigators.

One of the firms HP hired to conduct the probe is Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., according to The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal, citing people familiar with authorities' probes.

That business' address and phone number match those of a law firm with an office in downtown Boston, Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata. One staff member who would not identify herself Wednesday told The Associated Press she had never heard of Security Outsourcing Solutions. Another woman referred inquiries to partner John Kiernan, who was not immediately available for comment.

Two other board members who became ensnared in the leaks investigation are unlikely to be charged.

DOJ_NMG_0063031

At a board meeting in May, Dunn identified director George Keyworth III as the source of a January article on CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com. The board asked Keyworth, 66, to resign, but he refused. HP then barred him from seeking re-election.

Keyworth, HP's longest serving board members, resigned Tuesday. He acknowledged speaking to reporters but said he did so with the company's approval.

The attempt to oust Keyworth last spring riled another board member, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, 74, who stormed out of the May 18 meeting. His lawyer later pressed HP to reveal the reason for his resignation, which led to the SEC filing last week in which the company revealed its leaks investigation.

Two lawyers also were allegedly involved in the pretexting scandal.

Larry Sonsini, a noted Silicon Valley legal mind, served as an outside adviser to the HP board during the investigation. In an e-mail exchange with Perkins in June, obtained by The Wall Street Journal, Sonsini said he was not involved in "the design or conduct of the investigation," but that it appeared to be legal.

Sonsini also warned Perkins not to talk to outsiders about confidential board processes and deliberations because that would be a breach of his responsibilities as an HP board member.

In his e-mail, Sonsini says Ann Baskins, HP's general counsel, vetted the leak investigation and believed it to be legal.

California Attorney General Takes H-P Spotlight (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Now that Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board has taken steps to address its investigation of boardroom leaks, attention is firmly fixed on Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general who has made high-profile pledges to bring any lawbreakers to justice.

On Tuesday, Mr. Lockyer said he had enough evidence to indict people inside and outside H-P on charges related to obtaining personal phone records of directors and journalists without authorization. A spokesman for the attorney general said the first criminal charges could be filed within a week.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Lockyer added that he is looking beyond a Boston-area investigation firm linked to the H-P probe to a "complicated chain" of parties in multiple states that may have taken part in a practice called "pretexting," in which private phone records were obtained under false pretenses. (See related article1.) He said he has spoken about the case with Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly, whose office is cooperating.

Mr. Lockyer's remarks indicate that his investigation has expanded well beyond the borders of California. They also raise the profile of a man who many people outside the state have never heard of, a veteran brawler who has shown little hesitation in going after legal scofflaws and political foes.

Since first elected as California's top law-enforcement officer in 1998, Mr. Lockyer has taken on energy companies for price-gouging in California, turned up the heat on sex offenders and launched a high-profile crackdown on abusive nursing homes.

At the same time, he has sued the Bush administration repeatedly to try to block a range of initiatives he considers detrimental to the environment, including increased logging. In 2003, the Democratic Mr. Lockyer locked horns with California's Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, when he suggested the Hollywood action hero submit to a third-party investigation into allegations he had groped a series of women. Mr. Schwarzenegger's staff angrily criticized the attorney general for making public a private conversation with the then governor-elect.

Now, the 65-year-old Mr. Lockyer has thrust himself into once-private matters at H-P that have suddenly become very public.

H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, who pushed for the investigation of board leaks, this week agreed to relinquish her chairmanship to Chief Executive Mark Hurd. George Keyworth, a director whose phone records were improperly obtained and was accused of leaking information, agreed to resign.

New details of the probe continue to emerge. In addition to scrutinizing phone records, people familiar with the matter say human and possibly video surveillance was involved; private investigators attended speeches by at least one of the company's directors and followed this person to see if the board member met any journalists, they say. Ms. Dunn, in an e-mail to employees Tuesday, disclosed that two H-P employees had been investigated, as well as certain directors and "a number of individuals outside the company, including journalists." An H-P spokesman declined to comment on the possible use of human and video surveillance, or to identify any people cited in Ms. Dunn's email.

In May, H-P director Thomas Perkins resigned in anger after the board was presented with results of the investigation. He subsequently complained to Mr. Lockyer's office as well as the Justice Department. The Federal Bureau of Investigation confirmed this week that it is investigating the matter.

Mr. Lockyer said yesterday that three state criminal statutes were involved in the investigation: illegally accessing and using computer data; accessing personal-identification information and using it for illegal purposes; and using deceit to obtain records from a utility, such as a phone company. Any of those crimes could be charged as a misdemeanor or a felony, he said. A misdemeanor would carry a one-year maximum prison sentence, and a felony a three-year maximum term.

Making charges in the case stick could prove fairly straightforward, some lawyers say. Erwin Shustak, managing partner of Shustak & Partners in San Diego, said prosecutors can prove a felony by showing a defendant deliberately obtained someone's phone records or other personal information, used it for an unlawful purpose and did so without the owner's permission.

Such a charge most likely would be filed against the contractor who actually did the pretexting, Mr. Shustak added. Any charges filed against anyone inside H-P more likely would involve the state felonies of aiding and abetting or conspiracy, he said.

"Prosecutors would have to show H-P knew or should have known the contractor acted with malicious intent to get what they wanted," he said.

The company's probe was overseen by the office of H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins, which relied on outside private investigators. Ms. Baskins hasn't been available to comment, and H-P spokesmen have declined to comment on her role in the affair.

Few prosecutors routinely make public comments about charges before they are filed. FBI officials, by contrast, have declined to comment beyond confirming their inquiry. But Mr. Lockyer, in the interview, said he doesn't expect conflicts with federal investigators.

"We try to cooperate and work together," he said. "Sometimes that's effective and sometimes not."

Politics are one reason to keep a high profile: Forced to give up his attorney general's job because he has served a two-term maximum in the post, Mr. Lockyer is running for election in November to be California treasurer. Polls show Mr. Lockyer holding a double-digit lead over his Republican opponent.

But Mr. Lockyer's supporters say he is motivated more by passion for a job they say he is leaving only because he has no choice. "Bill Lockyer is not afraid of taking on a sacred cow, it's in his nature," said Jim Brulte, a political consultant who until 2004 was head of the California Senate's Republican minority.

During the 2000-01 California electricity crisis, Mr. Lockyer sparked a controversy when he told The Wall Street Journal that "I would love to personally escort [Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay] to an 8x10 cell that he could share with a tattooed dude who says 'Hi my name is Spike, honey.'" Earlier this year, Mr. Lay was convicted on federal fraud and conspiracy charges arising from the energy giant's collapse. He subsequently died of heart problems.

Calif. Attorney General May Be HP's Biggest Scandal Hurdle (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard's attempt to quell its boardroom scandal may be stymied by an unexpected source: California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

Lockyer is gathering evidence against employees of Hewlett-Packard and its contractors, his office confirmed Wednesday. His office is being helped by Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly.

Lockyer has repeatedly said HP committed a crime when it used subterfuge to obtain the phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. His office says it's too soon to say when indictments might be handed out.

The Department of Justice, FBI, House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Securities and Exchange Commission also have launched inquiries.

But outspoken Lockyer may be HP's biggest threat. The life-long politician is often “greatly underestimated,” says Los Angeles defense attorney Mark Geragos, who is both Lockyer's friend and rival.

Lockyer has held state office since 1973 without ever losing an election. He earned his law degree while simultaneously serving as a state senator. As attorney general, he has taken on energy giants and the Bush administration. He once left his own wedding reception to appear on television about the Laci Peterson murder trial.

But the HP case will be a challenge, legal experts say. In an attempt to stop leaks to the press, HP hired a detective firm, which hired a subcontractor. Employees of the subcontractor pretended to be HP board members and journalists to get their phone records.

There's no one California law against the practice, called “pretexting.” But Lockyer's staff is considering prosecuting under fraud laws, including those that prohibit identity theft and unauthorized use of computer data.

To do so, they will have to prove that HP staffers knew about the lies, says law professor Jill Fisch at the Fordham University School of Law. That can be difficult, but Fisch says Lockyer wouldn't have been so vocal about the case if he didn't have strong evidence.

Lockyer began examining pretexting long ago. In March, he filed a lawsuit against Data Trace, a company accused of stealing cellphone records and selling the data. The case is pending.

But independent tech analyst Rob Enderle says Lockyer may be going after HP mainly for publicity in an election year.

Lockyer is being forced out of his job by term limits. He considered a run for governor, and raised $10 million. But, in the face of stiff opposition in the form of incumbent Arnold Schwarzenegger, he decided to run for treasurer instead.

Robert Stern, head of the Center for Governmental Studies, says family may be one reason Lockyer changed his mind. (Lockyer, 65, is married to 35-year-old attorney Nadia Davis Lockyer, and has a young son in addition to an adult daughter.)

But Stern says Lockyer still has plenty to prove. "He's very bright, and very ambitious," he says.

Tiny Firm's H.P. Link Scrutinized (NYT)

By Matt Richtel And Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 13 — California prosecutors looking into the Hewlett-Packard spying case are focusing in part on a small private investigation firm in suburban Boston, operating out of a yellow house with black shutters in a quiet neighborhood.

How such a tiny firm ended up handling work for H.P., one of the largest technology companies in the world, as it tried to find out who had leaked company secrets is not clear. But other private investigators said on Wednesday that the situation was not surprising, because corporations in need of such services often end up relying on a chain of subcontractors.

Prosecutors will have to follow that chain as they pursue those responsible for gaining access to the phone records of journalists and company board members.

It is common practice for a company's head of security, its general counsel or its outside law firm to hire a security consulting firm, which often hires smaller firms, like the one prosecutors say was involved in this case, Security Outsourcing Solutions in Needham, Mass.

Those firms then hire freelance investigators to do work like surveillance or the acquisition of phone records.

The H.P. investigation involved the use of a technique known as pretexting — in this case, pretending to be a customer to obtain that customer's records from the phone company.

The small firms provide skills that larger firms may not have, but they also offer another benefit. Using middlemen can insulate the company that has ordered the investigation from any shadowy activities, private investigators said.

"I'd be dumfounded if you could find a corporation the size of H.P. that turned directly to the pretexter," said Rob Douglas, an information security consultant who has testified to Congress about illicit tactics used to obtain telephone records. He added that these investigations "have middlemen and are layered."

Mr. Douglas said it was not clear whether the layering in this case was intended as a way to shield company executives, or was just the way the process worked, with one step leading to another until a specialist in obtaining phone records was needed.

Federal and state prosecutors are continuing to investigate what laws, if any, were broken in Hewlett-Packard's hunt for directors who leaked information to the news media.

Hewlett-Packard has said the investigators it hired, whom it refuses to identify, did succeed in identifying a director as a source of leaks. That director, George A. Keyworth II, resigned Tuesday after the company accused him of giving details of a management meeting to a reporter.

The investigation into the leak resulted earlier this year in the resignation of another director, Thomas J. Perkins, an ally of Mr. Keyworth, over a dispute with Patricia C. Dunn, the board chairwoman who ordered the investigation. The company said on Tuesday that Ms. Dunn would give up her position in January.

"It's a remarkable story because it is such an obvious inappropriate thing to do," said Daniel E. Karson, an executive managing director and counsel at Kroll, the nation's largest investigation and security firm.

People who were briefed on details of the company's internal investigation have said that Security Outsourcing Solutions, which is run by Ronald R. DeLia, was one company involved.

But others who are investigating the company's actions said Wednesday that there were most likely other firms involved. Security Outsourcing acts as a kind of temporary employment agency and rounds up people who can do a particular job, so it is likely that those who got access to the phone records were subcontractors. Legal filings in the California attorney general's investigation show that one of the pretexters gained access to a phone company Web site using Internet service from Cox Communications, a cable company that does not operate in Boston.

DOJ_NMG_0063034

State investigators have not said if there were any other middlemen involved. Several private investigators said one reason to think Security Outsourcing had help was that whoever did the actual work of obtaining the phone records of the H.P. board members and journalists had their Social Security numbers.

Attempts to contact Security Outsourcing on Wednesday by phone and e-mail and in person failed. No one answered the door at Mr. DeLia's residence in Needham, a large home on a tree-lined street.

In addition to listing the Needham home as an address, Security Outsourcing Solutions shares a Boston phone number and address with the law firm of Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, although its name does not appear on a lobby directory. Calls to the firm were referred to a partner, John A. Kiernan, who said he had "a relationship that involves attorney-client privilege" with Mr. DeLia and could not talk about the matter.

Mr. DeLia, 56, is a licensed private detective in Massachusetts who, according to state police, has had no disciplinary actions against him. James Atkinson, a Boston-area private detective who specializes in preventing electronic surveillance and has worked with Mr. DeLia, described him as a "stand-up guy," adding: "I'd be astonished if this involved Ron. This is not the kind of work he does."

At the top of the hierarchy in the corporate investigations industry are firms like Kroll or Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu that work with large corporations. Firms like Secure Source, specializing in security risk assessments, or SafirRosetti, which focuses on financial fraud and computer breaches, offer narrower services. Both are units of the GlobalOptions Group, which has been consolidating a number of small firms to gain influence with corporations.

At the very bottom, investigators say, are the shadowy information brokers, the so-called pretexters, who promote their ability to get phone and credit records.

"There is a huge subdivision of investigative skills," said James Cawood, who runs a corporate investigations firm called Factor One in Oakland, Calif.

Terry Lenzner, the head of the Investigative Group International, a well-known Washington investigations firm, said that for a large company like Hewlett-Packard to contact a small firm directly would be unusual. "I would think it would be unheard-of," he said.

Mr. Lenzner said he had never heard of Security Outsourcing.

Mr. Karson said a company's decision on whom to hire for an internal investigation could sometimes be as casual as the head of security saying, "I know a guy." He added: "That's how a large company can end up working with a small firm."

Mass. Security Firm Part Of Probe Of HP (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

A small security company in suburban Boston has emerged as a subject in the investigation of Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, according to a source familiar with the matter.

Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. was hired as part of a Hewlett-Packard investigation of its board of directors to discover who was leaking information to the news media, the source said on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation.

Hewlett-Packard has come under fire for the methods used to identify the board member who was leaking information. Since the scandal surfaced last week, the director behind the leak has resigned and the board chairman has agreed to step down early next year. Another director resigned in May.

HP's investigation involved people posing as directors and journalists in order to gain access to private phone records. It also appeared to include surveillance of directors and review of videotapes to see if any directors were meeting with reporters, the source said.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer opened a criminal investigation of HP, which is based in Palo Alto, outside San Francisco. Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly is assisting Lockyer, Meredith Baumann, a spokeswoman for Reilly, said yesterday.

According to the Web site for Security Outsourcing Solutions, it provides support services to in-house security departments and evaluates and addresses corporate security risks.

It caters to small- and medium-size companies and those that do not have full-time security departments. The Web site says the company has a "global network of over 40 affiliated professional investigative firms."

The firm, founded in 1998, has 10 employees and reports annual sales of $990,000, according to Dun & Bradstreet Inc.

Calls to the number listed as the firm's Needham, Mass., office were not answered yesterday. Managing Director Ronald R. DeLia could not be reached for comment.

HP Faces Criminal Investigations With Help Of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 14, 2006

It only looks like Larry Sonsini is doing all of Hewlett-Packard's legal work.

In fact, the troubled tech company has hired Morgan, Lewis & Bockius as it tries to fend off various criminal investigations into whether its board of directors broke the law by having an investigator lie to gain access to board member phone records.

On Monday, Morgan Lewis lawyers sat down with San Francisco federal prosecutors in hopes of forestalling federal criminal charges.

The Monday meeting involved a "proffer" -- a normal step these days in white-collar investigations, in which a company under scrutiny offers up information to the government with certain conditions, as a means of showing good-faith cooperation with investigators.

John Hemann, a Morgan Lewis partner who was at the meeting -- and who was until last year a white-collar prosecutor with the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office -- didn't want to talk about HP on Tuesday.

"I have no comment," he said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Krotoski, the chief of the office's criminal division, is the lead prosecutor handling the investigation. He referred questions to a spokesman, Luke Macaulay, who confirmed the investigation but would not discuss its details.

On Tuesday afternoon, meanwhile, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer told PBS' "NewsHour" anchor Jim Lehrer that "we currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as outside."

According to a search warrant, Lockyer's office has been looking into the matter since at least Aug. 16, when a state prosecutor met with investigators for AT&T, the phone company that was duped into handing phone records over to the board's investigator. Sources familiar with the federal investigation said the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office has known for at least as long about the allegations that board members' phone records were accessed through suspect means.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for AT&T had little to say. "We really can't talk about it," said Walt Sharp.

However, he did point to a suit that the company filed in August in San Francisco federal court seeking to find out the identities of several people who improperly accessed phone records, but would not say whether it was directly related to the HP case.

The focus of the federal query remains unclear, but the fast-multiplying probes into the matter have Silicon Valley lawyers abuzz with the possibility that attorneys, either at HP or at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, could be ensnared.

Spokespersons for the firm and HP did not return calls by press time. On Tuesday, the Wall Street Journal reported that Sonsini, who played a role in both the board's initial leak investigation and its attempt to contain the crisis, ran emergency meetings of HP's board this week. The firm has denied it was involved in the portion of the investigation that involved pretexting.

On Tuesday, HP announced that director Patricia Dunn, who had initiated the leak investigation, would step down as chair at the end of the year.

A week ago, it was publicly revealed that ex-director Thomas Perkins had quit the board in May to protest the leak investigation. Since then, what started as a boardroom disagreement has careened into chaos.

It isn't clear when, or how, the various investigations will culminate. Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar wouldn't comment on when the state might file charges, or whether it is working with the U.S. attorney's office.

"We are focused on completing our investigation into crimes we believe were committed," he said.

Silicon Valley's Golden Past Tarnished By Latest Probes (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Silicon Valley has long been the stuff of dreams, a place where gawky entrepreneurs create billion-dollar companies in their garages, their innovations sometimes bending the rules but forever changing the way we listen to music or chat with friends.

But lately, it seems, the valley has shifted from a shiny beacon of capitalism's promise into a shadowy target for investigators.

Last week Securities and Exchange Commission officials told Congress that they were investigating 100 companies for possibly rigging their compensation systems to guarantee lucrative payments to executives and favored employees. That figure includes many technology firms whose volatile stock prices sweetened the incentive to engage in improprieties.

Even Hewlett-Packard Co., the standard bearer for ethics among Silicon Valley's home-grown technology community, is hustling to move forward after the resignation Monday of its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, amid investigations by prosecutors and federal lawmakers over whether directors' phone records were illegally accessed. Prompted by concerns that a board member leaked information to the press, the HP debacle is shedding light on the valley's insular culture, where secrets are prized and key players have multiple and sometimes conflicting obligations.

No industry has been immune to executive greed or governance lapses in recent years. The era's most disastrous collapses, of Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc., occurred far from Silicon Valley. But the same mind-set that inspired so many technology entrepreneurs probably contributed to a breakdown in sound business practices, regulators said.

"You have industries where their whole thought process is to think outside the box," said Charles D. Niemeier, a former top accountant in the SEC's enforcement division who now oversees the accounting industry. "That works really well -- except when it comes to compliance with the securities laws."

A generation ago, Silicon Valley was a backwater, thousands of miles from the nation's financial center on Wall Street and serviced by a few investment banks, law firms and private investors with enough cash to fuel start-up ventures. But the technology boom of the 1990s changed everything. It drew billions of dollars west and made millionaires of young inventors and salespeople, many of whom had virtually no experience running a business.

Regulators later uncovered financial improprieties from that period, including "round-trip" deals where technology firms entered into agreements with each other to give investors the appearance that they were winning customers and gaining traction in the market. What mattered at the time was not reality, but the illusion of success, which often triggered a rise in the stock price, Niemeier said.

This year, investigators have focused anew on the technology sector and the apparently common practice of backdating stock options. A popular method of attracting employees, options give workers the chance to buy stock at a set price and within a specific time frame. Employees profit from the difference between the share price at the time of the grant and the price on the day the stock is sold. In backdating cases, executives have selected award dates after the fact that marked low points in the company's stock price, increasing the likelihood of a windfall. Backdating violates the law if it is not properly disclosed to investors and tax authorities, prosecutors and securities regulators have said.

Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc. and Macrovision Corp. are among the Silicon Valley businesses that have announced that they received subpoenas from Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, over their options practices, according to securities filings. Apple Computer Inc. also has disclosed irregularities in its option grants.

"I don't think greed has any special place in Silicon Valley," said Bill Burnham, a former investment analyst who founded Inductive Capital L.P. in Menlo Park, Calif. "There're greedy people everywhere. . . . I've seen a lot of people take very principled stands here where a lot of money is at stake."

Yet the latest round of investigations underscores how Silicon Valley's freewheeling culture is, sometimes painfully, making way for a more mature and formal system, where companies now public are required to abide by their obligations to investors, business and legal analysts said.

"Ten years ago, a lot of these companies were private," Burnham said. "That kind of culture and ethos remains. Some people may have lost sight of, hey, you're public, you have to change the rules now."

Moreover, the rapidly growing businesses often lacked in-house accounting and legal expertise, said Matthew J. Jacobs, a former prosecutor who leads the white collar defense practice at McDermott Will & Emery LLP in Northern California. "You're dealing with young companies that . . . do not necessarily have a long tradition of corporate governance," he said, "and part of it is learning on the job."

For advice and financing, companies often turned to the same core group of professionals, including lawyer Larry W. Sonsini and investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, who guided them at the beginning of the era. Sonsini and Quattrone spent years cultivating important relationships and achieved unusual prominence in a subculture that makes celebrities out of businessmen.

After Quattrone struck a deal last month with federal prosecutors, who agreed to dismiss criminal obstruction of justice charges against him after an appeals court threw out his conviction, Silicon Valley executives warmly applauded his return. During the technology boom, Quattrone earned $100 million in a single year and spread more wealth to his friends and associates, who through a program known as "Friends of Frank" got the opportunity to buy stock at low prices before hotly anticipated public offerings.

Sonsini founded a Palo Alto law firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, and has advised numerous chief executives, shepherded such companies as Google Inc. and Netscape Communications through lucrative stock offerings, and often persuaded clients to pay their bills not in cash but by giving up even more valuable stock in their companies. Ethics experts say the practice is acceptable but can raise questions about a lawyer's incentive to protect management interests.

In a nod to its ubiquity in Silicon Valley, Sonsini's firm has advised both HP and its former board member Thomas J. Perkins, a venture capitalist who pushed the company to disclose questionable methods used by a subcontractor to monitor directors' phone calls. Sonsini, who did not employ or supervise the subcontractor, apparently contacted HP lawyers and ultimately assured Perkins that it appeared that the process was "well done and within legal limits" in a June 28 e-mail message. Yesterday a spokesman for California Attorney General Bill Lockyer told reporters that the office might bring criminal charges over the call monitoring within a week, but the spokesman declined to name targets of the probe.

The HP board again turned to Sonsini to lead a Sunday conference call to discuss the fate of Dunn, the board's chairman, even though, legal analysts said, Sonsini will be an important witness in federal and state investigations.

"Boy, this turns into a mess," said Wayne State University law professor Peter J. Henning, who co-founded a popular Internet blog on white-collar crime issues, as he contemplated Sonsini's role at HP and how it affected the issue of attorney-client privilege.

Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University, said that he lacked enough information about Sonsini's role to determine whether he may have run afoul of conflict of interest rules. But Gillers said that simultaneously comforting a former board member and protecting HP's interests do not in and of themselves sound alarms. State ethics boards rarely police conflict violations and clients themselves have the power to waive conflicts, he said.

Lockyer's 'Crimes' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Let's stipulate that Hewlett-Packard's wild leaker chase was one of the dumber corporate decisions of recent times. But that hardly justifies California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's decision to go on national TV and publicly allege that crimes were committed before any charges have been filed. Mr. Lockyer went on PBS's "NewsHour" Tuesday to claim that "crimes have been committed" and that his office has "sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside."

Even assuming crimes were committed, it is irresponsible for any prosecutor to make such bald criminal assertions in public before he makes them in court. Mr. Lockyer is taking a page from Eliot Spitzer's method here, using the airwaves to poison public opinion against future defendants and make it easier to intimidate them into settling. Along the way, he also gets more headlines that make him look like a prosecutor willing to take down the rich and famous. Even rich corporate defendants deserve due process, however, and someone at the California bar should call Mr. Lockyer on his prosecutorial misconduct.

Hurd Instinct (WSJ)

By Michael S. Malone

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

When the story broke about the crisis in the boardroom at Hewlett-Packard last week, the almost universal reaction here in Silicon Valley was: What would Bill and Dave have done?

The answer is: What Mark Hurd just did.

The spirit of Bill Hewlett and Dave Packard still haunts high tech, especially the Valley. A quarter-century after the two men stepped down from the day-to-day management of the company they founded, their business philosophy still stands as the ultimate example of enlightened management -- and as a perpetual rebuke to executives who fall short of their lofty standards.

Nowhere is this more true than at Hewlett-Packard itself. It's one thing to run some semiconductor company on paranoia, or an enterprise software firm on fear. You can always rationalize your abusive management as necessary to succeed in a uniquely competitive market. But violate the precepts of the HP Way -- management by objective, pushing decision-making down through the organization, deep trust in your employees -- at HP and you have to convince the world that your results will outperform what was perhaps the most successful corporate stewardship in U.S. business history.

That's what Carly Fiorina learned during her controversial tenure at HP. Had she tried her superstar CEO/top-down management/big merger style most anywhere else, she might have succeeded. But at Hewlett-Packard all she managed to do was set off an employee mutiny. The company that had once rewritten every known measure of employee loyalty, still found within itself the capacity to pull itself together and repudiate its new leader. By violating the trust of HPers, Ms. Fiorina utterly lost the proxy vote with her own employees and was saved only by institutional investors. In the end, she lost her job when she couldn't put up HP-like numbers to match her radical plans, and Wall Street abandoned her.

This is the clever time bomb that Bill and Dave left as their legacy to high tech, and to HP in particular. It isn't enough to be enlightened, innovative or successful -- you have to be all three, or you will fail by comparison. From beyond the grave, H and P are always saying: Go ahead and break the social contract with your employees, indulge in mass lay-offs and stick with aging but profitable products . . . but if you can't maintain three decades of continuous growth, enjoy the highest employee morale in the industry and create a half-dozen major new industries, don't even think about leaving a legacy as a great manager.

DOJ_NMG_0063038

From the beginning, Ms. Fiorina's successor, Mark Hurd, has seemed to understand this. Word from inside the company is that he is low-key, self-effacing and a bread-and-butter business guy. Best of all, he listens. In other words, he is a classic HP kind of manager. He may not have the culture of trust all the way down, but he is close enough. And the results have been apparent: HP profits and stock are up, its products are improving in quality, and employee morale is the strongest in years. The company is even beginning to win again the old-fashioned way: by remaining consistently strong and waiting for competitors -- in this case Dell Computer -- to stumble.

And then, just when it seemed that the dark days at Hewlett-Packard were finally in the past, along came this body blow of a scandal at the very top of the company.

In case you haven't been following the story closely, it goes like this: In early 2005, troubled by leaks in the media that appeared to have come from the boardroom itself, HP Chairman Patricia Dunn set out to trace and expose their source. She hired private investigators, who then proceeded to contract another company to help with the investigation. This second company gathered phone records not only from HP board members, but also from nine reporters from The Wall Street Journal, CNet, Business Week and the New York Times, among others -- all without the subjects' knowledge. To do so, these investigators engaged in "pretexting": representing themselves as those directors and reporters in order to obtain personal information.

Ms. Dunn claimed that she didn't understand the concept of pretexting until this June. Moreover, she seems to have been supported in this dangerous project by Valley uber-lawyer Larry Sonsini. What is certain is that at the May 13 meeting, Ms. Dunn announced the results of her investigation and "outed" retiring director and former Reagan science adviser George Keyworth II as the leaker. And that was just the beginning. Fellow director Tom Perkins, a legendary venture capitalist and one of the Valley's most powerful people, resigned from the HP board in disgust at Ms. Dunn's tactics.

It was downhill from there. Mr. Perkins publicly stated that he and the rest of the board were kept in the dark about the precise nature of Ms. Dunn's investigation, while she all-but accused him of lying about his involvement. Mr. Hurd, who may or may not have known about the investigation, went before HP's employees last Friday to underscore his support for the search for leakers, but also to promise to investigate the investigation. On Monday, both Congress and the Justice Department announced that they were also looking into the matter. California State California State Attorney General Bill Lockyer stated on Tuesday that there was "sufficient evidence to bring criminal charges against individuals inside Hewlett-Packard as well as outside."

Meanwhile, HP's stock was falling, reversing the gains of the previous months. And HPers everywhere were appalled, disgusted and once more feeling betrayed.

Almost lost in the coverage is that this all began during the tumultuous last days of Ms. Fiorina at HP, when the board was deeply divided over the future of the company and the fate of its high-profile CEO. Indeed, it was a board member, Walter Hewlett, Bill's son, who led the shareholder revolt. He lost his directorship as a result (but not the admiration of HPers). That proxy battle fractured HP's board, creating a schism that apparently never fully healed, and which re-opened over the leak matter.

Tuesday, after two days of emergency board meetings, HP announced that Ms. Dunn would step down, to be replaced by Mr. Hurd, though she herself would remain on the board. "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again," Mr. Hurd announced. "They have no place in HP."

Is this what Bill and Dave would have done?

Hewlett and Packard are no longer in a position to answer for themselves. But we do know that the two men always operated on trust and openness, but also with a strong hand. They would never have allowed the board to sink into civil war. We can also assume that they would have skipped the skullduggery and presented the leak problem to the assembled board at the beginning, and requested a full buy-in on any investigation. That alone would likely have plugged the leak. Given that HP under their leadership was never allowed to speak ill of a competitor to the media, we can also guess that Bill and Dave never, ever would have approved any investigation against reporters. And as men who had grown a company from a garage to a billion-dollar multinational corporation, they were wise enough to know that you can't buy the cloak without getting the dagger.

Finally, Hewlett and Packard firmly believed that you don't fire loyal employees for being beyond their competence; rather, you move them to where they can make the best contribution. In demoting Ms. Dunn, but still keeping her on the board, Mr. Hurd did the right thing. He did what Bill and Dave would have done.

Look next for deep and sincere apologies to everyone involved. That's the HP Way. Mark Hurd is learning fast.

DOJ Reviewing Guidelines For Corporate Investigations (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

DOJ_NMG_0063039

National Law Journal, September 14, 2006

During a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Tuesday, a top U.S. Department of Justice official acknowledged that the so-called Thompson Memo on the attorney-client privilege in corporate investigations has ignited complaints across the legal and business landscapes, but he vigorously defended the current policy as a sound one.

"I've got the [Senate Judiciary] chairman and ranking chairman upset; former department attorneys general and other officials complaining. Everyone is complaining," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. "But I believe the perception of how this works is different from the reality.

"I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described by groups."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and ranking minority leader Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both former prosecutors, questioned McNulty and a panel of critics of the Thompson Memo on how that memorandum -- the department's internal policy guideline on charging corporations -- affects the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in corporate investigations.

The Thompson Memo tells a prosecutor to consider nine factors in determining whether to charge a corporation for criminal wrongdoing. One of those factors is whether the corporation has cooperated in the investigation. In assessing cooperation, the memo says, one consideration is whether the corporation waived attorney-client and work-product protections.

A 'CULTURE OF WAIVER'

A coalition of business and legal organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Bar Association, Association of Corporate Counsel and National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, contends that the memo has created a "culture of waiver" in which federal prosecutors now routinely demand waiver of attorney-client and work-product protections even where there are less intrusive means of getting information.

"It's just one part of one factor," insisted McNulty. "It's not an investigative issue; it's a charging issue. If [the corporation] has cooperated, which they almost always do, that's when the issue -- do you have an internal investigation report? -- comes up. The text of the memo itself says this is one factor to be considered. We're giving [prosecutors] the option to consider it."

But Specter countered, "As I read this policy, I think it is coercive and may even rise to the level of being a bludgeon. I would ask you to reconsider the policy."

Former Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese III told the senators that the Thompson Memo should be amended to eliminate any reference to waiver of attorney-client privilege and work-product protections in a charging decision.

"In the same manner and same context, all references in the memorandum to a company's payment of its employee's legal fees should be eliminated," he said.

Meese also recommended that the department's written policies should explicitly state that requests for waiver will only be approved in exceptional circumstances. These requests should be approved only at the national level, and the department should publish its procedures on waivers, as well as collect and publish statistics on how often waivers are requested, how often businesses agree to such requests and how often businesses waive even without a request from prosecutors.

ENRON PROSECUTOR SPEAKS

Former Enron Corp. prosecutor Andrew Weissmann, now a partner at Chicago's Jenner & Block, also urged the committee to consider revising the standard for indictment of a corporation for the acts of its employees. He suggested a more stringent criminal standard tying the acts of the employee more closely to the corporation than is currently used.

Specter said that his committee has the several options before it: making a recommendation for changes in the Thompson Memo to the Justice Department, waiting for the outcome of litigation over the waiver/attorney fees issue in the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the KPMG prosecution or enacting legislation to address concerns with the department's policy. He asked Meese what would be his preference.

"I would hope this hearing would have a salutary effect on the department, including, perhaps, a recommendation from the committee," said Meese. "I would hope legislation would be a last resort."

Ex-SEC Head To Run Adelphia Victims Comp (AP-YBIZ)

Ex-SEC Head to Oversee Adelphia Victims Compensation

NEW YORK (AP) -- Former Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Richard C. Breeden will administer the compensation process for victims of a massive accounting scandal at Adelphia Communications Corp., prosecutors said Wednesday.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan said Breeden, chairman of Richard C. Breeden & Co., has been retained to serve as a special master overseeing the compensation process.

DOJ_NMG_0063040

Last year, Adelphia agreed to pay $715 million in cash and stock to settle Justice Department and SEC charges stemming from an accounting scandal that plunged it into bankruptcy. Prosecutors have called it one of the most extensive financial frauds on record.

In 2004, Adelphia founder John Rigas and his son Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, were convicted of pocketing more than $2 billion from Adelphia for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance.

Last year, John Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison, while Timothy Rigas was sentenced to 20 years. Both men, who remain free on bail, have appealed their sentences.

In March, Michael Rigas, another son and former Adelphia executive, was sentenced to 10 months of home confinement after admitting last November that he filed a Form 13D with the SEC that falsely stated he had conducted an inquiry into the source of funds used for a purchase of Adelphia shares in late 1999. The certification was kept in Adelphia's records.

Michael Rigas was acquitted in 2004 of conspiracy and wire fraud charges, but the jury deadlocked on charges of bank fraud and securities fraud. The bank fraud charges against him were later dismissed by prosecutors.

The Rigas family also has agreed to forfeit assets totaling more than $720 million for victims' compensation.

Adelphia, which is under bankruptcy protection, completed the sale of its cable properties to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. for cash and stock in July.

Breeden previously has served as a corporate monitor for WorldCom Inc. following an $11 billion accounting fraud at the one-time telecommunications giant.

Individuals Involved In Enron Trial Receive Top Award (LAWWC)

Law Week Colorado, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON – More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. The Attorney General's Annual Awards Ceremony provides an opportunity to recognize the extraordinary accomplishments of a number of U.S. Department of Justice employees as well as individuals from outside the Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty joined the Attorney General in presenting the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud. This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions. The team's unparalleled dedication and teamwork over a period of years has made a significant contribution to restoring confidence in the nation's securities markets.

"Today's award recipients make me proud to be their colleague. They make me proud to be an American," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. "Their dedication and achievements remind me why it is an honor to serve at the Department of Justice."

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service from this team include:

From the Northern District of Illinois, Sean M. Berkowitz, Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the District of Columbia, Kathryn H. Ruemmler and Lisa O. Monaco, Assistant U.S. Attorneys; from the Central District of California, John C. Hueston, Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney, Robb C. Adkins and Andrew D. Stolper, Assistant U.S. Attorneys; from Northern District of California, J. Douglas Wilson, Assistant U.S. Attorney and Leslie R. Caldwell, Former Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the Northern District of Texas, Clifford B. Stricklin, Special Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the Eastern District of New York, Benton J. Campbell and Linda A. Lacewell, Assistant U.S. Attorneys, and Andrew Weissmann, former Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the District of Massachusetts, David H. Hennessy, Assistant U.S. Attorney and Samuel W. Buell, Former Assistant U.S. Attorney.

Also part of the team were members of the Criminal Division, including John A. Drennan, Trial Attorney for the Appellate Section; Leo J. Wise, Trial Attorney, and Linda B. Walls, Lead Paralegal Specialist for the Fraud Section; and Matthew W. Friedrich, Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General and Chief of Staff, Office of the Assistant Attorney General. The remaining team members are part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Those being honored from the FBI's Houston Division include Supervisory Special Agent Michael E. Anderson; Special Agents Raju S. Bhatia, David Michael Hays, Kendall L. Hopper, Jeffrey D. Jenson, Jill Odom, and Chad J. Nunez; Financial Analysts Loren P. Feast, Susan K. Ridley, and Tonja K. Rose; and Paralegal Specialist Pamela Joan Jerding. Recipients from the FBI's Washington Field Office include Supervisory Special Agent

David F. Reign and Special Agents Paul E. Holdeman, Paula L. Schanzle, Marc R. Diehl, Brian L. Crews, Jeffrey C. Dutton, and Gregory H. Bristol. Supervisory Special Agent for the FBI's Security Division Anne Hopkins was also honored.

The Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Heroism is given to recognize an extraordinary act of courage and voluntary risk of life during the performance of official duties. William "Buddy"A. Sentner, Special Agent of the Office of Inspector General's Miami Field Office is honored posthumously for the exceptional courage he displayed by saving the lives of several fellow officers. Special Agent Sentner, 44, was shot and killed in the line of duty on June 21, 2006, as he was working as part of a team executing arrest warrants on six correctional officers at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee, Florida. These correctional officers were indicted the previous day on charges of conspiracy to sexually abuse female inmates and introduction of contraband into the correctional facility. During the execution of the arrest warrant, one of the correctional officers, who was a subject of the warrant, opened fire on the arrest team. Acting with extraordinary courage, Special Agent Sentner rushed to aid his fellow agents and returned fire, killing the correctional officer. Tragically, Mr. Sentner was killed and a Federal Bureau of Prisons lieutenant was wounded. Special Agent Sentner's brave actions and quick response under fire saved the lives of others while sacrificing his own life.

The Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award recognizes employees who have served at least 20 years in the Department and have demonstrated high standards of excellence and dedication throughout their careers. This year's Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award went to David Margolis, Associate Deputy Attorney General in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. Mr. Margolis has been a federal prosecutor for over 40 years and has brought decades of experience in the Department to the wide array of responsibilities in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. The contributions that Mr. Margolis has made to the Department are not simply characterized by length of service. His impact on the Department's policy and practices, his integrity and reliability and his dedication to the cause of justice are hallmarks of his character.

The Attorney General's Award for Meritorious Public Service recognizes the most significant contributions of citizens who have assisted the Department in the accomplishment of its mission and objectives. Phillip Nicholas Chapman, Christopher M. Donlan, Amber Marie Deahn, and Linda C. Olson were honored today for their heroic and selfless efforts which led to the rescue of Shasta Groene and the arrest of her abductor, Joseph Edward Duncan, III, in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho on July 2, 2005. At approximately 1:53 A.M. PT, Joseph Duncan and Shasta Groene walked into a Denny's restaurant in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. Duncan had brutally killed members of Groene's family a few months before. Working for Denny's at the time were manager Linda C. Olson and waitress Amber M. Deahn. Ms. Deahn identified the girl from the extensive media coverage the case had received and directed her manager to call 911. Ms. Deahn offered Ms. Groene a milkshake as a delaying tactic. At the same time, Phillip N. Chapman and Christopher M. Donlan, who were patrons seated nearby, also recognized Ms. Groene from media reports and walked outside the restaurant to observe Duncan, who had gone outside to smoke. They identified his vehicle and recorded the license plate number. Responding officers soon arrived and arrested Duncan. As a result of their efforts, a violent killer and child sexual predator was arrested and an abducted child was recovered.

The William French Smith Award for Outstanding Contributions to Cooperative Law Enforcement is an honorary award granted to recognize State and local law enforcement officials who have made significant contributions to cooperative law enforcement endeavors. The Williams French Smith Award is presented this year to the following individuals: Battalion Chief Robert M. Luckett, Fire and Explosives Investigation Unit, Alexandria, Va; Captain William B. Harlowe, Fire and Explosives Investigation Unit, Fairfax County, Va.; Battalion Chief Scott K. Hoglander, Investigator Brian S. Radinsky, and Retired Investigator Tony R. Exline, all of the Fire and Explosives Investigation Unit, Prince George's County, Md.; Sergeant Hank E. Anderson and Detective Brian L. Padgett of the Prince George's County Police Department; Deputy State Fire Marshal Derrick A. Chapman and Corporal Steve W. Dulski of the Maryland State Police; and Detective Todd O. Gray and Investigative Analyst Emanuel U. Ross, Jr. of the Metropolitan Police Department for the District of Columbia

The Attorney General's Award for Distinguished Service is the Department's second highest award for employee performance. The recipients of this award exemplify the highest commitment to the Department's mission. Twelve Distinguished Service Awards were presented this year.

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, many Department employees responded to assist those most impacted. The Award for Distinguished Service was presented to following employees who prioritized the needs of others and service to the public above their personal needs. Recipients include, from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Kevin C. Harrison, Assistant Special Agent in Charge; Joseph Ruggerio, Retired Group Supervisor, New Orleans Field Division; Jack H. Schumacher, Group Supervisor, Houston Field Division; Benjamin F. Hafer, Special Agent Pilot, Aviation Division, South Central Aviation Office; Daniel R. Salter, Assistant Special Agent in Charge, Dallas Field Division. From the U.S. Marshals Service, Roxanna L. Irwin, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Eastern District of Louisiana. From the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Michael J. Wolf, Special Agent in Charge and Todd B. Cox, Supervisory Special Agent, New Orleans Field Office. Also honored at today's ceremony was

Division Counsel Elizabeth D. Chatelain from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives, New Orleans Field Division. Rosemary A. Hart, Special Counsel from the Department's Office of Legal Counsel was also recognized.

U.S. Attorneys James B. Letten and David R. Dugas, both of Louisiana, were also awarded the Attorney General's Medallion for their leadership in support of response and recovery efforts in the aftermath of the storm.

The Distinguished Service Award was also presented to Brain R. Beckwith, Chief, U.S. Marshals Service Training Academy. His career contributions include assistance in the investigations of the first World Trade Center bombing and the Branch Davidians. Chief Beckwith was also called upon to lead a deployment in the aftermath of the September 11th terrorist attacks to secure La Guardia and Kennedy airports. Four days after Hurricane Katrina struck, Chief Beckwith led a team to the Gulf Coast and relieved beleaguered police forces, identified and located registered sex offenders and rounded-up fugitives responsible for the spike in crimes after the storm.

The Distinguished Service Award was also presented to the members of the Southeast Bomb Task Force, who pursued domestic terrorist Eric Rudolph for nine years after he attempted to disrupt the 1996 Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta by detonating one of the largest pipe bombs ever in the United States. The explosion resulted in the death of one individual and the injury of over 100 others. Recipients of the award included: from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, John D. Behnke, John H. Cronier, James W. Cross, Jr., Daniel P. Sindall, and Darin C. Werking, Special Agents, Atlanta Division; Velda L. North, Support Services Technician, Atlanta Division; Linda R. Urheim, Intelligence Analyst, Atlanta Division; Alexander Borzym II, Special Agent, Detroit Field Office; H. Joseph Ronisisvalle, Special Agent, Birmingham Field Office; Todd P. Letcher and Tracey A. North, Special Assistants to the Deputy Director, Office of the Deputy Director; and Thomas J. Mohnal, Supervisory Special Agent, Laboratory Division. Also awarded, from the Federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives, was Joseph R. Kennedy, Supervisory Special Agent, Chattanooga Field Office.

Distinguished Service Awards were presented to John J. Connors, Senior Attorney, Office of Intelligence Policy and Review, for his exceptional dedication and efforts involving the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court; Nora R. Dannehy, Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney, District of Connecticut, for her prosecution of significant public corruption matters, including Connecticut Governor John Rowland and Treasurer Paul Silvester; and Blane K. Dessy, Director, Library Staff, Justice Management Division for advancing the Department's library system.

Additional Awards for Distinguished Service went to Assistant U.S. Trustees: John P. Fitzgerald, Region 1; Henry G. Hobbs, Jr., Region 7; Mark A. Neal, Region 4; Cynthia A. Burnette, Region 21; and Patricia D. Fahey, Region 13. All five successfully and swiftly implemented, on a national basis, the new credit counseling and financial education requirements contained in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

Other Distinguished Service Awards were received by employees that spearheaded the Department's efforts in the appellate courts and Supreme Court in successfully defending the constitutionality of the Solomon Amendment, Rumsfeld v. FAIR. Award recipients from the Solicitor General's Office include Edwin S. Kneedler, Deputy Solicitor General, and Irving L. Gornstein, Assistant to the Solicitor General. Award recipients from the Civil Division include Douglas N. Letter, Appellate Litigation Counsel; Scott R. McIntosh, Special Counsel, Appellate Staff; Joseph H. Hunt, Director, Federal Programs Branch; Vincent M. Garvey, Deputy Director, Federal Programs Branch; and Gregory G. Katsas, Deputy Assistant Attorney General. Also awarded was Mark T. Quinlivan, Assistant U.S. Attorney, District of Massachusetts.

Three trial attorneys from the San Francisco Field Office of the Antitrust Division were also presented with Distinguished Service Awards. Niall E. Lynch, Assistant Chief; Nathanael M. Cousins and May Y. Lee, Trial Attorneys. These recipients, through their leadership, dedication, and exceptional investigation and negotiation efforts, are responsible for significant criminal antitrust cartel prosecutions. These cases have broken up an international price-fixing cartel involving a crucial component, dynamic random access memory–DRAM–in a huge, critically important, U.S. high-technology industry.

From the Justice Management Division's Finance Staff, Melinda B. Morgan, Director, and Marcia K. Paul, Deputy Director, were awarded for providing effective leadership and direction to the Department's financial audit community.

Award recipient Barbara Rowland, Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, resolved two significant civil fraud cases in the pharmaceutical arena, recapturing $261.5 million for federal health care programs.

Another honored recipient, Bryan Sierra, Public Affairs Specialist for the Office of Public Affairs, has expertly managed media relations for complex and high profile cases, including the Padilla case, Enron and the Moussaoui trial. His extraordinary efforts to explain to the public the important work of the Department go beyond the call of duty, even accepting the dangerous mission of traveling with the Attorney General to Iraq in July 2005.

In recognition of outstanding professional achievements by law enforcement officers, four Excellence in Law Enforcement Awards were presented this year. Special Agents David P. Biddiscombe and James Langtry, New York Division, Federal Bureau of Investigation and Detective Robert J. Brzeski, Nassau County Police Department, New York, were honored for dismantling the Velt Gangsta Lanes set of the Bloods gang in Roosevelt, New York, as part of the joint federal and local Operation

Streetsweeper. Their efforts resulted in the apprehension and conviction of 22 Bloods gang members on racketeering charges involving narcotics trafficking, assaults with firearms and incendiary devices, murder and attempted murder.

The Award for Excellence in Law Enforcement was also presented to Christopher M. Garay, an emergency medical technician from the Federal Correctional Complex in Tucson, Az., of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who fought his way out of a housing unit overtaken by inmates. Mr. Garay was assaulted with homemade weapons, receiving numerous puncture wounds, scrapes, contusions and a laceration to his head. Immediately upon being released from the hospital, Mr. Garay returned to the prison to assist with the investigation and prosecution of the inmates involved.

Another distinguished group was awarded for their contributions in the investigation of former New York City Police Department detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, who exploited their law enforcement positions to perpetrate a broad range of racketeering acts on behalf of the Luchese organized crime family. Honorees include, from the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York Field Division, Assistant Special Agent in Charge John M. Peluso and Special Agents Mark Z. Manko, John E. Perfetti, John P. Francolla. Recipients from the FBI's New York Field Division include Special Agents Geraldine A. Hart and David J. Wolf.

The Award for Excellence in Law Enforcement was also presented to members of an agency task force who conducted a 22 month investigation to catch a serial arsonist. The arsonist was responsible for the deaths of two people within the Washington Metropolitan Area. Individuals honored who serve in the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives' Baltimore Field Division include: Theresa R. Stoop, Special Agent in Charge; David L. McCain, Assistant Special Agent in Charge; William J. Stringer, Group Supervisor; and Thomas R. Daley, Scott R. Fulkerson, Tijuana N. Patty, Special Agents. Joseph M. Riehl, Chief of the Arson and Explosives Programs Division, was also awarded.

The Attorney General's Award for Excellence in Furthering the Interests of U.S. National Security was presented to the trial team involved with the Moussaoui case. Members of the team overcame numerous obstacles in what was an extremely complex and extended national security case. Ultimately, they were able to uphold the Department's goal–the prevention of terrorist attacks and the protection of national security–by securing the guilty plea of an avowed al Qaeda terrorist, and seeing that he spends the rest of his days in prison.

Members of the Moussaoui trial team include, from the Criminal Division, John W. Van Lonkhuyzen, Trial Attorney; Gregory A. Miller, Counterterrorism Support Specialist and Security Officer; Suzette R. Buttram, Former Paralegal Specialist, Counterterrorism Section. Feds May Sue Former Fannie Mae Execs (AP)

Federal Regulator Says Litigation Likely Against Former Fannie Mae Executives

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The two executives who led Fannie Mae to an $11 billion accounting scandal can expect federal regulators to file lawsuits against them, the head of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said Wednesday.

"We will more than likely be filing litigation against them," OFHEO director James Lockhart said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute.

When later asked by reporters if legal action was likely against Fannie Mae's former chief financial officer Timothy Howard and the mortgage finance giant's former chairman and chief executive Franklin Raines -- who was White House budget director under President Clinton -- Lockhart did not name names but did say "they are the top two."

Last month Fannie Mae announced -- and the Justice Department confirmed -- that the criminal investigation against it had ended after two years. Fannie Mae, whose accounting scandal came to light in September 2004, has been ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission to restate its earnings back to 2001 -- a correction expected to reach around $11 billion.

Fannie Mae reached a civil settlement in May with the SEC and the OFHEO, agreeing to pay a record $400 million fine after OFHEO found serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation by the company.

Earlier this week, Freddie Mac -- Fannie Mae's smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market -- said it would not face criminal charges in connection with its own multibillion-dollar accounting scandal.

The Justice Department began investigating the accounting of Freddie Mac, which is the second-largest financer of home loans in the country, after it disclosed in June 2003 that it had misstated earnings by some $5 billion -- mostly underreported -- for 2000-2002.

Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae were created by Congress to pump money into the home-mortgage market by buying home loans from banks and other lenders, to keep interest rates low and make home ownership affordable for low- and moderate-income people. They bundle the mortgages into securities for sale on Wall Street.

Shares of Fannie Mae added 20 cents to close at $53, while Freddie Mac gained 20 cents to end at $64.10, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Regulator Says Civil Suit Likely For Raines (WP)

By Terence O'hara, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Fannie Mae's top regulator yesterday said it is "more than likely" the federal government will sue former chief executive Franklin D. Raines and other former company officers, seeking to recover bonuses and salary and perhaps impose fines for the mortgage finance company's accounting debacle.

While Fannie Mae paid a $400 million government fine in May for violating myriad accounting rules and overstating its profit by more than $10 billion from 2000 to 2004, as yet no action has been taken against Raines and his former chief financial officer, J. Timothy Howard.

"We will more than likely be filing litigation against them," Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight Director James Lockhart told reporters after delivering a speech at the American Enterprise Institute. It was the strongest statement yet of the regulatory agency's intent to seek financial penalties against former Fannie Mae officials or try to claw back tens of millions of dollars in bonuses paid to the two men on the basis of what turned out to be inaccurate information about company earnings.

When asked if action was likely against Raines or Howard, Lockhart said, "They are the top two," according to an account by the Associated Press.

Lockhart declined to comment on his remarks, though a spokesman yesterday confirmed their accuracy.

Lawyers for Raines and Howard yesterday declined to comment. In past statements, lawyers for the two men have said they did nothing improper.

Lockhart's agency has power to lodge only civil or administrative complaints. The Securities and Exchange Commission is also weighing civil action against former Fannie Mae executives. The Justice Department last month said it had closed its criminal investigation of the company's accounting scandal, though it is looking at whether Raines and Howard committed perjury in congressional testimony about Fannie's accounting practices.

One lawyer with knowledge of the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to publicly speculate on OFHEO's intentions, said the agency could file a lawsuit before the end of the year. One thing OFHEO may be waiting on: the completion of a mandatory investigation by Fannie's independent directors to determine whether the company itself should sue Raines, Howard or others. The results of that investigation are due at the end of next month.

Such strong statements from Lockhart are not new. In May, after his agency and the announced the $400 million fine against Fannie Mae, Lockhart took aim at the $52.8 million in bonuses Raines received during the six years the company used improper accounting.

In addition, since neither Raines nor Howard were technically fired by the company when the accounting improprieties came to light in 2004, both men took home millions of dollars in severance payments, and Raines received retirement pay of $114,000 a month for the rest of his life.

Fannie Mae, based in the District, is a congressionally chartered private company that provides ready cash to the home mortgage market by purchasing mortgages from lenders. Fannie Mae keeps some loans on its own books but sells most to investors in the form of securities. It is one of the country's biggest financial institutions.

Grasso Asks Presiding Judge To Recuse Himself In Compensation Case (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 14, 2006

The battle over former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's multi-million dollar compensation package continues to heat up.

Grasso's attorneys have filed a motion asking Justice Charles Edward Ramos, the presiding judge in the case, to reassign the matter to a different judge.

"Throughout this lengthy case, the Court has steadfastly expressed its desire that this significant case be handled in a way that engenders public confidence in the justice system," attorneys for Grasso said in papers filed with the court last week. "At this time, reassignment of the case would best serve that important goal."

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has challenged Grasso's total compensation under New York's not-for-profit laws.

Gerson A. Zweifach of Williams & Connolly who represents Grasso, laid out three grounds for recusal in the motion. The first stems from ex parte settlement talks with Ramos, which Grasso entered into based on the court's "advance agreement not to serve as trial judge should Mr. Grasso object."

After the judge decided to conduct a bench trial to address the separate issue of whether Grasso's compensation of more than $139 million was reasonable, Grasso sent a letter to Ramos expressing concerns over his continued involvement with the case.

"Having obtained Mr. Grasso's and his counsel's consent to participate in an ex parte conference based on this commitment, it would be improper, to say the least, for the Court now to try the case over Mr. Grasso's objection."

The second grounds for recusal, Zweifach said, were that Ramos, during the course of the settlement discussions, expressed views on "factual and legal issues that lie at the heart of any upcoming trial."

"The Court's statements could reasonably be interpreted as impairing Mr. Grasso's right to have his case resolved in a fair and impartial manner," Zweifach said.

The attorney claims that Ramos "candidly" expressed his views regarding whether Grasso ought to return some portion of his compensation to the stock exchange; whether Grasso played an improper role in receiving compensation; whether Kenneth Langone, a co-defendant in the case, acted improperly in his duties as chairman of the NYSE's compensation committee; whether Grasso was properly advised to accept the contractual payout from the stock exchange; and whether Grasso's compensation was too high.

The third ground for recusal involved the claim that Ramos twice sought a position, unsuccessfully, as a member of the board of the directors of the New York Stock Exchange.

In October 2002, an executive search firm working on Ramos' behalf approached Grasso about the judge's possible employment at the stock exchange. Grasso later leaned that in October 2003, Ramos also sent a letter to John S. Reed, Grasso's successor as chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0063048

This letter, Grasso's attorneys say, specifically cited a tobacco class action settlement with the state of New York in which Ramos had objected to the reasonableness of certain attorney fees. Spitzer did not oppose those fees. The judge's objection was subsequently reversed by Appellate Division, First Department in New York v. Phillip Morris Inc., 30 A.D.2d 57.

Zweifach said the development was "deeply troubling" because Ramos had failed to disclose that he had again sought a position on the stock exchange board weeks after Grasso's termination and seven months before the filing of the government's suit, and because the second letter, addressed to Reed, "specifically focused on the Court's willingness, sua sponte, to set aside agreed-upon compensation where the Court questioned its reasonableness."

The fact that Ramos had specifically called attention to his decision in the tobacco case is seen as evidence by Grasso and his attorneys that Ramos is "offended by high levels of compensation."

Zweifach said the fact that Ramos is set to decide in a bench trial the issue of whether Grasso's pay was reasonable raises "substantial public questions about the fairness of such a proceeding" giving his endorsement of his opinion in the tobacco case.

In addition to Zweifach, Grasso is represented by Mark C. Zauderer, a partner at Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. Zauderer declined to comment.

A spokesperson for Spitzer's office said the government expected to file a response later today to Grasso's motion.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Says Year-old Task Force Is Deterring Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales credited a task force he established a year ago with deterring fraud in the Hurricane Katrina relief effort, citing as evidence money returned to the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Gonzales addressed members of the Hurricane Katrina Task Force Wednesday, the first anniversary of its creation, during an appearance in New Orleans, where the hurricane flooded 80 percent of the city on Aug. 29, 2005.

"People need to know that they will not get away with these crimes," Gonzales said.

The report released at the meeting said that by Oct. 17, 2005, the task force had charged 36 people in 17 cases with hurricane-related fraud. By Sept. 6, 2006, Gonzales said that number had grown to more than 400 people charged in more than 30 federal judicial districts around the nation.

Most task force prosecutions in the past year involved fraud in obtaining individual assistance benefits from FEMA and the Red Cross, the report said.

Between them, the agencies had more than $18.2 million returned by recipients individual aid, the report said, calling it a "sign that our prosecutions are deterring fraud."

The report identified trends in post-disasters, including charity-fraud schemes and emergency-assistance schemes that begin as soon as the public is informed of assistance available for disaster victims.

Criminals learn to exploit systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls of disaster relief programs, the report said.

"In short, when these criminals find a weak spot - a short cut to the money - they tend to return to it," Gonzales said.

Gonzales promised a crackdown on individuals who use their positions with governmental agencies and disaster relief programs to line their pockets.

"Our goal is that every dollar be used in the affected counties to rebuild, not to pat the bank accounts of criminals," Gonzales said.

Fraud cases have been made in 16 states ranging from Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida to California and Oregon, the report said.

Attorney General Gonzales Promises "Zero Tolerance"

NEW ORLEANS, LA — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spent Wednesday in New Orleans getting a one-year report from his National Katrina Fraud Task force.

He predicts fraud cases will rise as more and more federal recovery dollars reach the Gulf Region.

DOJ_NMG_0063049

"Billions of dollars are headed to the Gulf Coast region for the rebuilding effort," said Gonzales. "We know that fraud, sadly follows dollars."

Gonzales a group of prosecutors and law enforcers meeting at the Downtown Sheraton, so far his Katrina Fraud Task force is responsible for 400 arrests nationwide, half of them in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"It is disturbing to see not only the volume of fraud, but the lengths to which people will go to take advantage of others sufferings," said Gonzales.

The cases include two FEMA workers who pleaded guilty to soliciting bribes at a disaster recovery center in the Algiers neighborhood of New Orleans.

The task force also accused St. Tammany Parish Council Member Joe Impastato of trying to get money from a debris removal contractor.

That case is expected to go to trial early next year.

"I will tell you we have a lot of important investigation that are going on right now, some very significant, involving various public officials of course I can't go into the details," said New Orleans U.S. Attorney Jim Letten.

The Attorney General is also sending re-enforcements to protect the new round of federal dollars.

"We have petitioned Washington and Washington is sending down another squad of investigators which will be devoted solely to Katrina fraud," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazanni.

"I think as long as you have that kind of money, going into an effected area, there are going to be people who want to take advantage of it," said Attorney General Gonzales. "I think it's important to send a very clear message that we're watching this very closely and we're not going to tolerate fraud."

Fraud Deterred, Gonzales Says (NOTP)

Victories chalked up, warnings renewed

Thanks to a federal fraud task force created within days after Hurricane Katrina, more than 400 people around the nation have been prosecuted for helping themselves to government and charity money meant for storm victims, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday in New Orleans.

"People need to know that they won't get away with these crimes, and that message is getting out there," said Gonzales, giving some examples cited in a year-to-date report on the task force's work.

There was an Illinois woman who told the Federal Emergency Management Agency that she was displaced by Katrina and had seen her two daughters drown in floodwaters and float away.

She sought FEMA aid to bury the daughters, once their bodies were recovered, and to reimburse her for counseling she got to cope with the loss.

"This woman had no daughters," Gonzales said. The woman was indicted by a federal grand jury in June, according to the report.

Gonzales pointed to another example, a man who got financial help from FEMA by falsely claming it was needed by individuals left homeless and without food or clothing by Katrina.

The man was indicted by a Nevada grand jury last spring after the task force found out he had used the FEMA money to rent seven Las Vegas hotel rooms, which he rerented to other people for purposes investigators think included drug dealing and prostitution.

In Louisiana, a total of 126 individuals -- 23 of them in the New Orleans area -- have been prosecuted on Katrina fraud charges, according to the report Gonzales cited.

Gonzales made his comments to task force members gathered at the Sheraton New Orleans Hotel for a daylong symposium to take stock of their accomplishments in the past year and make plans for future work.

Prosecutions prompted by task force efforts also have caused some would-be lawbreakers to think twice, Gonzales said. More than $15.8 million in FEMA benefits was sent back, while $2.4 million was returned to the American Red Cross.

Despite the task force's success in making Katrina-related fraud cases for everything from public corruption to identity theft, it faces an enormous job ahead: keeping tabs on the billions of dollars of government money now in the pipeline to help rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast region.

"When the criminals find an easy route for money, they tend to return for more, giving law enforcement an opportunity to stop it," Gonzales said.

He devoted his first remarks at the podium to New Orleans' struggle to recover from the hurricane at the same time it is contending with a rising tide of crime.

"This great city cannot return to its former glory if it's being held hostage by criminals," he said, adding that the federal government is doing all it can to help the city's struggling criminal justice system.

Task Force Flooded With Katrina Fraud (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- More than 400 people -- including government and charity workers -- have been charged so far with illegally benefiting from Hurricane Katrina and the ensuing flooding, according to a Justice Department report released Wednesday.

However, the Katrina Fraud Task Force hasn't even begun to skim the waters, and the number could climb into the thousands, the report stated on the first anniversary of the task force.

"Disaster relief agencies have reported to law enforcement that they have identified thousands of questionable or possibly fraudulent payments to purported hurricane victims," the report said.

To date, the multi-agency command center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, has received more than 6,800 complaints or tips for investigators to pursue.

The prosecutions of negligible fraud schemes has had a deterrent effect, as ineligible recipients of aid have voluntarily returned $18.2 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the American Red Cross, the report says.

Most of the cases have involved people trying to obtain assistance from FEMA or the Red Cross, though cases of identity theft, procurement fraud and public corruption are emerging, the report states.

It adds that the task force found a "particularly distressing pattern of criminal activity" involving government and charity insiders. Among those being prosecuted are employees or contractors with FEMA, the Army Corps of Engineers, the Louisiana Department of Labor and the Red Cross.

The report came as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales met with about 170 police and prosecutors investigating and litigating fraud cases surrounding hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

"We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed," Gonzales said.

Of the federal prosecutions thus far, 115 were in Louisiana, 79 in California, 50 in Texas, 48 in Mississippi and 31 in Florida.

Judge Drops Two Charges In Gotti Racketeering Case (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

A federal district court judge dropped two counts against John A. Gotti yesterday involving two of his businesses that prosecutors claimed had been set up and operated with illicit funds.

The charges had been added by the government for Mr. Gotti's third racketeering trial, but Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said prosecutors had not offered sufficient proof to support the charges.

"The facts do not prove that Gotti invested the proceeds from loan sharking and construction industry extortion into" the companies, she said. "No reasonable juror could find Gotti guilty beyond a reasonable doubt" on the charges, she said.

The companies in question are JAG Brokerage and the 216-02 Hempstead Avenue Corporation, which mainly collect rents on property owned by Mr. Gotti in Queens.

Mr. Gotti, known as Junior, still faces five charges related to witness tampering and racketeering, including extorting construction companies, loan sharking, money laundering and ordering the 1992 kidnapping and beating of Curtis Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels and a radio talk show host. Mr. Gotti has twice been tried on similar charges, and in each case a jury was unable to reach a verdict. Also yesterday, in what could prove to be a critical development, Mr. Gotti's lawyers questioned whether Mr. Gotti could be heard saying on a secretly recorded F.B.I. tape that he was angry about being demoted from the top echelon of the Gambino crime family to a captain.

The recordings, made when Mr. Gotti was in Ray Brook federal penitentiary on unrelated racketeering charges from 1999 to 2004, are the centerpiece of the government's case against Mr. Gotti. The tape, which records a conversation between Mr. Gotti and his sister Angel in August 2003, is critical because it appears to show that Mr. Gotti retained a leadership role in the Gambino family as late as 2003.

Mr. Gotti's primary defense against the racketeering counts is that he left the Mafia some time before mid-1999, and is therefore protected from prosecution by the five-year statute of limitation on racketeering charges.

While the words on the tape are difficult to make out, the F.B.I. transcription of the recording reads: "'I'm a captain? What happened? And when I get out, I want to see this kid. He can send me all the love letters he wants, I don't have to answer to him."

But Steven Dobies, who prosecutors say is an associate of the Gambino crime family, testified that he was present during the conversation and never heard the word "captain" used.

"What did you hear?" Mr. Gotti's lead lawyer, Charles Carnesi, asked Mr. Dobies.

"John says, 'Honestly, well, what happened?'" Mr. Dobies said.

"Did you ever hear the word 'captain'?" Mr. Carnesi asked.

"Never," responded Mr. Dobies.

2 Charges Against Gotti Tossed (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

The case against John A. Gotti, son of the late Gambino crime boss, got a little lighter when a federal judge threw out two of the charges he faced in his racketeering trial.

Despite the dismissal of the counts by Manhattan federal judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday, "Junior" Gotti still faces serious racketeering conspiracy and related charges, including allegations he was involved in extortion, loan-sharking and the 1992 beating of radio talk show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

Though she didn't issue a written opinion, Scheindlin essentially agreed with the defense that prosecutors had failed to prove Gotti used a company known as 216-02 Hempstead Avenue to invest funds from construction industry, extortion and loan-sharking activity. Scheindlin also formally dismissed a similar charge related to an inactive brokerage company Gotti ran until 1999, court records show.

James Cohen, a professor at Fordham University Law School, said in a telephone interview that Scheindlin's ruling indicated the evidence on those charges was quite weak.

The judge's action came the day before federal prosecutors were scheduled to begin summations in the trial, the third time Gotti, 42, has had to face a jury on the racketeering charges. Defense summations were expected to begin Friday and jury deliberations could start at that time.

Through his defense attorneys, Gotti maintains that he turned his back on life as a mobster before July 21, 1999, a date that would put the 2004 indictment outside the statute of limitations. Much of the defense case this week was aimed at proving that Gotti not only negated his life in the mob, but also wanted to leave New York and his old gangster cronies for a more peaceful life, possibly in Canada.

Yesterday Gotti's old friend, Steve Dobies, continued on the witness stand. Dobies, a 6-foot-8-inch-tall man dressed in blue jeans and sweatshirt, told the jury Tuesday about Gotti's plans to start a hip-hop magazine while he was in federal prison in 2003. The defense had called Dobies to rebut prosecution claims that he allegedly visited Gotti in prison to relay messages to mobsters on the street.

Under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Dobies insisted that he never passed messages of a criminal nature for Gotti. Dobies also said that Gotti stated a number of times in 2002 and 2003 that he wanted nothing to do with his former mob associates, wanted out of the mob life and wanted to get away from New York.

Questioned about Gotti's anger that his uncle Peter and others had allegedly stolen his father's money, Dobies said that Gotti believed it was money that was due his mother and sisters.

JUDGE WHACKS TWO CHARGES AGAINST GOTTI (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 14, 2006

A federal judge dealt a blow to prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case yesterday, tossing two new racketeering charges after the feds failed to show enough evidence at trial.

It was the second time Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin tossed the charges, which accused Gotti of trying to hide illegal cash from loan-sharking and construction-industry extortion in two businesses.

Prosecutors hoped to show that Gotti continued to live off criminal proceeds right through this year - part of a strategy to combat his claim that he quit the Mafia in 1999.

Scheindlin initially threw out the pair of racketeering counts on the eve of trial, only to flip-flop and immediately reinstate them after prosecutors argued that they would present fresh evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0063052

Yesterday, the judge ruled there was not enough proof to link the illegal cash invested in the businesses to a specific crime - or that additional dirty cash came in during the five-year statute of limitation period beginning in May 2001. This is Gotti's third trial after two previous juries failed to reach a verdict.

He stands accused of several racketeering charges, including the 1992 kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio host allegedly targeted for bad-mouthing Gotti's father, John "Dapper Don" Gotti, on the air.

A towering reputed Gambino associate who was Junior's "gofer" during his imprisonment from 1999 to 2004 testified that he collected up to $5,000 in rental income every month, but denied ever collecting criminal proceeds for Gotti.

Steven Dobies, a 6-foot-8 defense witness, said he was Gotti's most frequent visitor at the upstate Ray Brook prison and used some unusual tactics in helping the former Gambino leader prepare his defense.

During cross-examination by prosecutors, Dobies admitted he planned to wage a smear campaign against Sliwa through a Web site to be called "He's no angel.com"

Judge Throws Out New Racketeering Charges For Gotti, Saying Prosecutors Did Not Prove Claims (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the second time, a judge on Wednesday tossed out new racketeering charges filed against John "Junior" Gotti, finding the evidence introduced at his trial insufficient to support a conviction.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin decided the government had not proven its claims that money invested in several of Gotti's properties stemmed from alleged loansharking or construction industry extortion.

The government filed the new charges several months ago in a bid to boost its case against Gotti, the son of late mobster John Gotti, after two juries in the last year deadlocked on racketeering charges against him. Closing arguments in his retrial could begin as early as Thursday.

A spokeswoman for prosecutors, Lauren McDonough, said the government had no comment on Scheindlin's ruling.

Scheindlin had thrown out the new charges last month before Gotti's retrial started but changed her mind and reinstated them days later.

With the new charges, the government had tried to prove that Gotti continued to benefit from Gambino crime family money even after he said he quit the mob when he pleaded guilty to charges in another racketeering case in 1999.

The government's new strategy did have some benefits because the judge decided that jurors could consider new evidence about Gotti's finances even though they could not use that evidence to convict him on the new racketeering charges.

Gotti is still charged with racketeering related to other alleged crimes, including an allegation that he ordered two 1992 attacks on radio show host and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father.

The elder Gotti died in prison in 2002, 10 years after he was sentenced to life for racketeering.

Last Gambino Holdout Caves, Pleads Guilty To Numbers Charges (WPJN)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR, THE JOURNAL NEWS

White Plains Journal News, September 14, 2006

The last defendant in the massive roundup of the reputed leaders of the Gambino crime family has joined the ranks of his convicted compatriots.

Louis "Little Louie" Natrella, 33, of Yonkers pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to all charges against him. Natrella admitted to conspiring to defraud the United States, conspiring to operate an illegal numbers business, illegal gambling and operating an illegal numbers business.

Natrella was one of 32 reputed leaders, members and associates of the notorious organized-crime family charged in March 2005 in a racketeering indictment.

"We are very pleased with the efforts of the investigative team," said David Velazquez, the senior supervisory resident agent in charge of the FBI's White Plains office, "and the resulting clean sweep of 32 convictions for 32 defendants."

Natrella pleaded guilty after the lunch break yesterday during the first full day of testimony in his trial before U.S. Judge Alvin Hellerstein. Natrella's lawyer, Robert Soloway, could not be reached for comment.

Natrella was accused of operating a thriving Gambino numbers operation in the Bronx that was handed down to him by longtime Gambino associate Leonard Minuto Sr. from Dobbs Ferry.

DOJ_NMG_0063053

Minuto was one of the 32 defendants originally named in the racketeering indictment, but he struck a plea deal with federal prosecutors. In part, Minuto said he turned on the mob after finding out that Natrella and Scarsdale capo Gregory DePalma conspired to steal $20,000 from him.

Minuto said he found out about the plot in government papers turned over to him in preparation for his trial.

Minuto testified during DePalma's trial that Natrella told him that the money was seized by the FBI from a wall safe in his house during a raid on his Yonkers home.

Natrella's guilty plea marks the 31st in the case. DePalma, the sole defendant to place his fate in the hands of a jury, was found guilty in June of racketeering after a trial in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. COMMENT ON THIS STORY IN OUR FORUMS

The Mafia: A 21st-century Cosa Nostra (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 14, 2006

"Anybody who thinks that the Mafia is breathing its last breath is just wrong," says Matt Heron. Heron oughta know--he's just finished running the FBI's Organized Crime Section in New York and is moving down to FBI headquarters in Washington this month to oversee its anti-mob operations nationwide. The Mafia, Heron says, has "had over 100 years in this country, but we didn't start successfully dinging them until the last 20 years. We've still got a lot of work cut out for us."

There's good reason to think the Mafia is down and out. At its height, the American mob wielded influence from labor unions to presidential elections, with big interests in longshoring, trucking, gambling, construction, waste disposal, and garment making. But the wiseguys have been reeling since the 1980s, with one set of indictments after another. Once boasting 26 families nationwide, the mob is down to 11, half of those confined to the New York area. And in recent years, every top boss of those five New York families--the heads of the Bonanno, Colombo, Gambino, Genovese, and Lucchese gangs--has been indicted or imprisoned or has passed away. So scarce are the godfathers that the Commission, the Mafia's ruling council, hasn't met for a decade, investigators say. And, though far from the front pages, the arrests go on. Since 2004, more than 70 members and associates of just the Bonanno family have been prosecuted in New York.

Those kinds of facts make it tempting to ignore the mob in this age of terrorism. But the cases also suggest just how active the Mafia remains. "We've hit them very hard, but they keep adapting and regenerating," says Tom Metz, acting chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Section. There's also a new generation of smarter, more educated mobsters. "They're not like their fathers and grandfathers and uncles," adds Heron. "Some of these people have law degrees, business degrees." Call it the New Mafia--their members tend to avoid thuggish acts like extortion and murder in favor of white-collar crimes, like Internet and stock market frauds. In January, a Gambino Family soldier was sentenced for running sophisticated telephone and Internet porn frauds that investigators say raked in an extraordinary $650 million. "Just when you think you've seen it all, they come up with another scheme," says Metz.

Moreover, the Mafia's influence still extends far beyond New York. There remain active families in Chicago, Detroit, New England, New Jersey, Philadelphia, and Miami. Last year, the feds arrested reputed mob figures in Illinois, Florida, and Arizona for 18 unsolved murders spanning four decades, including that of notorious Las Vegas hitman Tony "the Ant" Spilotro. As part of the indictment, prosecutors offered a fascinating history and description of the entire "Chicago Outfit"--Al Capone's old gang--for the first time formally charging it as a criminal "enterprise" under U.S. antiracketeering laws. The names of those indicted read like an episode of The Sopranos. There's Joey "the Clown" Lombardo, Paul "the Indian" Schiro, and Frank "Gumba" Saladino. (Gumba didn't make it--when the cops arrived to arrest him, they found Saladino dead in a hotel room, with tens of thousands of dollars in checks and cash beside his body.)

The wiseguys may be down, folks, but don't count them out just yet. There's too much money to be made. "It's an organization that's wounded but not dead," says Heron, who's worked Mafia cases for 20 years. "It will never be dead."

Malone Agrees To Plead Guilty On Eve Of His Trial In Las Vegas (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 14, 2006

Deal likely involves 50 months in prison

Lance Malone, a strip club mogul's bagman who was convicted in a San Diego corruption scandal last year, has agreed to plead guilty in the parallel Las Vegas case on the eve of his trial.

Malone pleaded guilty in exchange for a sentence of about 50 months in prison that would run concurrently with a sentence in the San Diego case, said a source close to the defense. The plea agreement is likely to include the requirement that Malone abandon his appeal of the San Diego conviction, the source said.

DOJ_NMG_0063054

Malone is accused of bribing Las Vegas politicians with cash, lap dances and ski-school tuition in exchange for votes that would benefit strip clubs owned by his boss, Michael Galardi.

If a judge approves the agreement, it would avert the trial in Las Vegas, which is set to begin Monday. The specific crime to which Malone would plead guilty could not be confirmed Wednesday.

In San Diego, Malone was convicted July 18, 2005, along with former San Diego Councilmen Michael Zucchet and Ralph Inzunza, of extortion, wire fraud and wire-fraud conspiracy in a scheme to trade campaign contributions for political favors.

Malone worked for Galardi, who wanted the law that prohibits touching between strippers and patrons repealed so the club would make more money. Galardi made a deal with the government and testified against the others.

In November, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey T. Miller threw out a jury's guilty verdicts against Zucchet, acquitting him of seven corruption counts and granting a new trial on the remaining two counts.

During the same hearing, Miller also sentenced Inzunza to 21 months in prison and Malone to 36 months in prison. Inzunza and Malone are free on bond pending a decision on their appeals.

The government has not decided whether it will appeal Zucchet's acquittal. A decision is due by year's end.

In Las Vegas, Malone's trial was severed from that of politicians Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, who were convicted in May and sentenced last month to 50 months and 2½ years in prison, respectively.

Galardi, who at the time owned Cheetahs in San Diego and Cheetahs and Jaguars in Las Vegas, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in the San Diego case in September 2003 and to a count of racketeering in the Las Vegas case a month later. He testified in the San Diego and Las Vegas trials and was scheduled to do so at Malone's trial. Galardi has yet to be sentenced.

Former Clark County Commission Member's Trial Set To Begin Monday (LVRJ)

By Adrienne Packer, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 14, 2006

Former Clark County Commissioner Lance Malone is negotiating with federal prosecutors in a last-ditch effort to avert trial on political corruption charges, a source close to the case said Wednesday.

The government offered Malone an agreement that, in exchange for a guilty plea, would allow him to serve a prison term that will run concurrently with the three-year sentence levied last summer in San Diego in a similar political corruption case. Malone also would agree to abandon the appeal he filed after the San Diego conviction.

Malone is the last of five defendants to go to trial, culminating the 3-year-old public corruption case that centered around Michael Galardi, who admitted bribing politicians to protect the financial viability of his strip clubs in Las Vegas and San Diego.

Galardi and Malone were accused of providing cash bribes to three San Diego councilmen and former Clark County commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. In exchange for the cash, the commissioners voted favorably on Galardi-related matters.

Galardi, the money source, and Kenny pleaded guilty in 2003. Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey, recipients of the bribes, were convicted in May. Malone, the middle-man who is accused of delivering the cash to politicians, had vowed to fight the charges in Las Vegas. But negotiations between Malone's attorney, Dominic Gentile, and federal prosecutors, intensified in the last week, the source said.

Gentile did not return telephone messages Wednesday, but confirmed Tuesday that he was in negotiations with the government.

Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Wednesday, "Plea negotiations are under way, but we're still scheduled to go to trial beginning Monday."

Malone was charged with conspiracy to commit wire fraud, wire fraud and conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

"He was really in a very, very difficult situation," said Douglas McNabb, a Houston defense attorney who specializes in federal criminal cases and has followed the Galardi case closely.

"When you have so many cooperating people and you have those who actually did go to trial and lost, you run the risk of having your sentence stacked. There's a huge amount of pressure to try to work something out."

Although the plea agreement had not been signed as of Wednesday evening, there were several indications that the trial will not proceed Monday.

For example, in the week leading up to the trial of Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera, defense attorneys and prosecutors filed a flurry of motions, submitted proposed questions for jurors and attended a status conference, according to court documents.

Only one motion on behalf of Malone has been filed this month.

Herrera's legal team made repeated visits to the Clark County Government Center to speak with potential witnesses who were later subpoenaed. Clark County Deputy District Attorney Mary-Anne Miller said Gentile has subpoenaed no county employees.

Additionally, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess has not met or briefed Galardi, the government's star witness who testified against Malone in San Diego, according to the source familiar with the case.

Schiess had not subpoenaed Tony Montagna, an undercover informant and head of security for Galardi, whose wiretaps and testimony played a key role in Malone's conviction in San Diego, the source said.

Also, according to another source, FBI Special Agent Chris Byers is out of the country. Byers testified for the prosecution in the trial of Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera and was expected to do so again in Malone's trial.

If Malone lost at trial, he could face a five or six-year sentence on top of the three years he received in San Diego, one source said.

In San Diego last year, Malone was found guilty of paying off San Diego councilmen Michael Zucchet, Charles Lewis and Ralph Inzunza.

Malone, working as Galardi's lobbyist, attempted to reverse an ordinance prohibiting dancers from touching customers at Galardi's club in the San Diego suburb of Kearney Mesa.

In May, jurors in Las Vegas returned a guilty verdict against Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey. During the eight-week trial, the jury heard hours of recorded telephone conversations between Malone and the defendants setting up meetings.

They also heard conversations in which Malone and Galardi use language that prosecutors said should be interpreted as code phrases for payoffs.

Malone's trial was severed from that of his two co-defendants because his two former colleagues on the commission planned to -- and did -- attack his credibility.

Herrera's attorneys suggested that Malone pocketed bribes Galardi intended to be delivered to the elected officials.

"I have never received a payment from Mr. Galardi or Mr. Malone, anywhere," Herrera testified on April 20.

Malone was captured on a recording of an intercepted telephone call telling Kincaid-Chauncey he planned to "supply" her.

But Kincaid-Chauncey testified she often ignored Malone's ramblings, saying, "Lance would talk a lot and not always say a lot."

Kincaid-Chauncey testified she often found herself concerned for her friend, who was floundering as Galardi's lobbyist. Kincaid-Chauncey said she bowed to Malone's requests to call Galardi and thank him. She explained that Malone wanted to prove to his boss he had a close relationship with commissioners.

Jurors didn't buy it.

During the San Diego trial, Gentile attempted to convince jurors that Malone was simply fulfilling his duties as a lobbyist when he kept in close touch with the council members and flushed them with campaign contributions.

Malone was convicted of one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, 33 counts of wire fraud and three counts of extortion.

In all, Malone delivered between $35,000 and $40,000 to the councilmen. Most of the payments were bundled. Malone solicited individuals to make contributions, then reimbursed them. The limit on donations in San Diego is $250.

The amount of money changing hands in Las Vegas was far greater, according to testimony during Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey's trial.

Galardi, a government witness expected to take the stand in Malone's trial, testified against his two co-defendants. Galardi said he paid Herrera between $150,000 and $200,000 and Kincaid-Chauncey about $80,000. Galardi told FBI agents all the payments were delivered by Malone.

ETHICS INQUIRY: FBI Investigation Involves KC Councilwoman (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2006

An attorney representing Saundra McFadden-Weaver acknowledged Tuesday that there was an ongoing FBI investigation involving the Kansas City councilwoman.

Attorney Ron Partee confirmed the FBI investigation the same day the city's ethics commission launched its own investigation into her involvement in $400,000 in mortgages for a Lee's Summit home.

Members of the Municipal Officials Ethics Commission — which had not met in this decade — asked McFadden-Weaver to answer questions before she testified next month before the panel. They also want her to produce loan and purchase documents, and a list of addresses where she has lived since taking office.

DOJ_NMG_0063056

McFadden-Weaver asked for the ethics investigation after The Kansas City Star reported in August that she obtained the loans, apparently with no money down. Loan documents stated she would occupy the home outside the 3rd District, which she represents. The councilwoman maintains she always has lived in Kansas City.

FBI Joins Police To Arrest 22 Reputed Crips Members (NSL)

By Jonathan Schuppe, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, September 14, 2006

Nearly two-dozen reputed members of the Crips gang have been arrested on federal gun and drug charges in what U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie promised would be the start of a lengthy multi-agency campaign against street gangs and other violent criminals in Essex County.

"Federal law enforcement is getting into the business with our partners in local law enforcement to take on the street gangs who are victimizing the citizens of Essex County," Christie said. "Over the next three years I'm in office, I will be focusing on taking on street thugs like those we're taking on today."

The 22 reputed Crips members -- including the leader of a chapter called 98 Main Street Mafia and ranking members of three other factions -- were arrested by FBI agents and local police in roundups that started Tuesday and continued yesterday morning in East Orange, Irvington and Newark.

Although the gang members claimed allegiance to different chapters, or sets, many of them worked together, authorities said.

In Irvington, for example, members of the Grape Street and Rolling 60s sets plotted to sell crack cocaine in a Crescent Lane public housing complex this summer, according to law enforcement authorities and complaints filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark.

Several of the gang members were caught on videotape selling crack to an undercover informant, authorities said.

In East Orange, members of the Hoover 5-2 and Grape Street sets held a meeting in March in which they discussed selling crack, heroin and Ecstasy, according to the complaints. Over the next few months, they were caught selling the drugs to undercover informants on Park Avenue and surrounding streets.

The sale of illegal firearms took place in Newark and Irvington, where gang members allegedly took thousands of dollars for handguns, assault rifles and a shotgun, authorities said.

"These are the weapons of their trade, and they're using them not only on each other but also on innocent people trying to live their lives in their communities," Christie said.

None of the charges filed yesterday mentioned any violence related to guns sold by the gang. That part of the probe, along with an examination of how the guns got into Essex County, is continuing, authorities said.

Feds Arrest 22 High-level Crips Members (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Capping a year-long investigation into drug and weapons dealing in Essex County, federal authorities arrested 22 members of the Crips street gang Wednesday morning, and said many of them were high-level members.

"These are upper-echelon guys, not just street dealers," said Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI's Newark office.

The suspects were arrested in Newark, Irvington and East Orange, and face charges including possession with intent to distribute heroin, crack cocaine and ecstasy. Several also were charged with illegal sales of weapons, including assault rifles.

Siegel said the arrests were unrelated to raids carried out in Britain and New Jersey Wednesday morning that broke up an arms trafficking operation supplying guns to criminals in London.

More than 100 federal and local agents, including an FBI SWAT team, participated in the early morning street gang arrests.

Federal Jury Convicts KC Gang Member (KMBC-TV)

KMBC-TV, September 14, 2006

Wright Could Face Life In Prison

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- A federal jury convicted the former leader of the 51st Street Crips gang Thursday of three homicides, drug trafficking and firearms violations.

Steve L. "Moody" Wright, 23, of Kansas City, was found guilty on 15 counts contained in a 2004 federal indictment.

Federal authorities said that Wright and other members of the street gang were repeatedly involved in illegal drug trafficking and had guns that they used to protect their drug supplies and drug profits.

"Wright's modus operandi was to rob other drug dealers, often shooting to kill, steal their supply of drugs, then sell them for profit," U.S. Attorney Bradley J. Schlozman said a news release.

DOJ_NMG_0063057

Wright could be subject to sentence of life in prison without parole. A sentencing hearing has not been set.

'Dangerous Gangster' Convicted In 3 Murders (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 14, 2006

It took more than a month of testimony in federal court to chronicle the alleged criminal exploits of Steve L. Wright Jr.

And it took a jury about 15 hours of deliberation over three days to sort through it before finding the 23-year-old Kansas City man guilty of three drug-related killings and other crimes.

Prosecutors portrayed Wright as a key member of a Kansas City street gang involved in drug dealing and fatal and nonfatal shootings during 2000 and 2001, when Wright was a teenager.

The jury convicted him of 15 counts, including two murders related to drug trafficking and one to prevent a witness from cooperating with police. He also was found guilty of conspiracy to distribute drugs, and other drug and firearms counts.

"Wright is a vicious and dangerous gangster, therefore we are asking the court to protect the public by sending him to prison for the rest of his life," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said after the jury verdicts in Kansas City.

In closing arguments Tuesday in U.S. District Court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Ambrose described one incident after another in which police found drugs and weapons after arresting Wright or persons with him.

Ambrose described the pattern that was established when Wright was still a teen: "Vehicle speeding away from police with weapons and drugs on board and Mr. Wright on board."

The defense argued that weapons and drugs that were found in houses, cars or on other persons associated with Wright were not enough to convict him.

Defense attorney William Shull said that every witness who testified about Wright's involvement in murders was facing legal problems and worked out deals with prosecutors. Shull said none was "credible and worthy of belief."

He also noted that none of the wounded persons identified Wright as the triggerman, and that none of the weapons Wright actually possessed was linked to any crime of violence.

But Ambrose said that Wright was part of a conspiracy to distribute drugs and that he was responsible for criminal acts committed by other members of the conspiracy.

Several homicides the jury heard about involved Wright and his associates stealing drugs and shooting the one who was selling them.

"They, like so many others in this case, were paid in lead instead of cash," Ambrose told jurors in closing arguments.

After one of those rip-offs in 2001, one of Wright's associates, Michael L. Birks, was killed because he showed weakness by taking one of the victims to the hospital, Ambrose said. Wright was concerned Birks might also cooperate with police. Birks was on his knees begging for his life when he was killed by another man with a gun Wright provided, according to testimony.

Wright also was convicted for the June 2000 killing of Hector Santos and the June 2001 murder of Alex Clark.

Map Dealer Deserves Stiffer Term, British Say (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn., Sept. 13 — The 486-year-old map, bound for most of its life in a book that helped shape Britain's view of the world, survived the burning at the stake of the archbishop of Canterbury, who owned it, civil war, royal intrigue and the Nazi bombing of London.

Everything, it appears, but the arrival in London in 2005 of Edward Forbes Smiley III, an American dealer in antiquities who specialized in obtaining hard-to-find trophies for his customers.

In June, Mr. Smiley, 50, pleaded guilty in federal court in New Haven to having stolen 97 rare maps from some of the world's leading universities and libraries, a staggering haul estimated at about $3 million.

Targets of his seven-year crime spree included Harvard, Yale and the New York Public Library. Also on the list of items taken was the centuries-old map by Peter Apian that was ripped from a book Mr. Smiley found at the British national library.

Because of that $100,000 map, and three more missing maps that the British Library believes Mr. Smiley may have snatched, the library is arguing that he deserves more than the 57 to 71 months in prison that prosecutors and Mr. Smiley's lawyers backed at the time of the guilty plea.

In a legal brief dated Wednesday, the library's lawyer, Robert E. Goldman, urged Judge Janet Bond Arterton of Federal District Court to impose a harsher sentence — of at least 78 to 97 months — when she revisits the case on Sept. 27. By law, the judge can impose up to 10 years, or 120 months, because the case involves the theft of a major artwork, although sentencing guidelines suggest a lower range.

So far as the British Library is concerned, Mr. Smiley is no ordinary thief, and what he systematically stole transcends monetary loss. It complains in its brief that the sentencing guidelines “substantially understate the seriousness of the offense,’’ and it quotes liberally from Theodore Roosevelt, Robert F. Scott, the Antarctic explorer, and Samuel A. Alito Jr. to bolster its case.

“The case of United States v. Smiley has made painfully clear that Smiley created his marketplace and built his inventory through the systematic looting of the world’s great libraries,’’ the brief says.

As the brief put it, “The Apian world map stolen from the British Library by Smiley tells but one tale of the 97 maps stolen,’’ adding that it was torn from a volume once owned by Thomas Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, who was a key adviser to Henry VIII and was burned at the stake for his beliefs by Mary I in 1556.

The book, which was confiscated, became part of the Royal Library and was eventually given to the British Library at its inception in 1973, according to the brief, where “the volume remained intact until visited by Smiley.’’

But Mr. Smiley’s lawyer, Richard A. Reeve, said: "It’s all very interesting, but the reality is that map has been recovered. It’s going back to the British Library.’’

Mr. Reeve added that Mr. Goldman’s memo “ignores a central part of this case, which is that the libraries are getting back maps that they would never have gotten were it not for Mr. Smiley’s cooperation.’’

Of the 97 maps that Mr. Smiley acknowledged stealing, federal agents have recovered 88 so far, said Thomas Carson, a spokesman for the United States attorney’s office in New Haven.

Map-stealing Collector Robbed Future Generations, Library Says (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps should be severely punished because he systemically looted treasures that told the story of the new world and had survived catastrophic events over the centuries, the British Library argued Wednesday.

The maps that E. Forbes Smiley III stole far transcended their estimated value of $3 million, the British Library said in documents filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court.

"The maps stolen by Smiley created the dreams of the explorer, merchant and powerful," the library wrote. "They charted the paths of national expansion and empire building. They marked the rise of British dominance, the origins of a new nation and the demise of a native population. The maps drew the lines between where knowledge ended and imagination began."

Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted.

"Smiley's actions ripped at the heart of our public institutions which stored, protected and made available to the public over centuries maps which provided a bridge between past and future generations," the library wrote.

One of the stolen maps had survived civil war, royal intrigue, economic depression and the Nazi bombing of London.

"They had been cared for and preserved for centuries until Smiley ripped them from their volumes and slid them into his coat," the library wrote.

Smiley, a 50-year-old resident of Martha's Vineyard, faces up to six years in prison under federal guidelines and restitution when he is sentenced on Sept. 27. The British Library is urging the court to impose a higher sentence, citing similar cases in which courts imposed stiff sentences.

Smiley admitted in June that he stole 97 maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard University library and the British Library in London. The oldest maps dated back to the 1500s and some are the first records of settlements, terrorities and discoveries in America, experts say.

With Smiley's help, prosecutors said most of the maps have been recovered from dealers and galleries. Prosecutors said four maps have not been returned by those who have them and five others are lost.

Smiley's attorney, Richard Reeve, called the British Library's arguments "factually and legally flawed." He said authorities could only prove Smiley stole 18 maps, but his client cooperated with the additional thefts.

"In effect, the libraries are getting back 80 maps that they never would have been able to prove Smiley had taken," Reeve said. "He could have sat back and said, 'Prove it.'"

But that tactic would have exposed Smiley to more prosecutions in other jurisdictions, said Robert Goldman, attorney for the British Library.

Smiley was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. Yale and other top map libraries reviewed their security procedures after Smiley's arrest.

The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps and accused him of "selective cooperation" with authorities. They said prosecutors denied their request to look at Smiley's statements to them, while Smiley has refused to let them examine whatever records the government may have obtained from him.

Prosecutors said they disagreed with some of the arguments by the British Library, but declined to elaborate.

Reeve said the British Library lacked proof of additional thefts.

The British Library said one of the stolen maps was torn from a volume owned by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury who precipitated England's break with Rome by marrying King Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn in 1533. The map, which has been recovered but the library says was altered, shows Cranmer believed America was a separate continent and not part of Asia as many believed at the time.

"Like a drop of oil on a still pond, the number of his victims spreads with time," the library wrote. "Smiley's victims include students, scholars, academics, the general public and individuals yet to be born who will not have the opportunity to sit at a desk, open a leather bound volume and see the world as Archbishop Cranmer and others saw it in the 16th century."

Moroccan Court Jails Two Men For Internet Worm Last Year (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-low

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Authorities in Morocco sentenced two individuals for their role in unleashing an Internet worm dubbed Zotob that infected computer networks at hundreds of companies last year.

A court in the Moroccan capital of Rabat on Tuesday sentenced Farid Essebar, a 19-year-old student and a Moroccan national born in Russia, to two years in prison. Another student, Achraf Bahloul, 21, received a one-year prison sentence. Both men were convicted of charges relating to virus-writing, illegal access to computers and conspiracy to commit credit-card fraud.

The Zotob worm affected machines at a number of media companies, including Time Warner Inc.'s CNN unit, New York Times Co. and ABC, a unit of Walt Disney Co. Among other companies that suffered from infected computers were Kraft Foods Inc. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group. The virus, which took advantage of a flaw in the "plug-and-play" feature of Microsoft Corp.'s Windows 2000 software, emerged just days after Microsoft warned of a security flaw and released a software fix for it. That left customers little time to patch their systems.

The case, which U.S. and Moroccan authorities say they believe is connected to a credit-card theft group in Turkey, illustrates how geographically dispersed cybercriminals have become. Traditionally, much of the online criminal activity has come out of the U.S., Eastern Europe and parts of Asia, security experts say. "It's a global problem now," says Graham Cluley, a technology consultant at antivirus-software company Sophos in the U.K.

Lawyers for Messrs. Essebar and Bahloul plan to appeal the ruling, according to a court official cited by the Associated Press.

Mr. Essebar, who goes by the online moniker "Diabl0," also was connected with a man in Turkey named Atilla Ekici, says the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, which aided the probes in Morocco and Turkey. The case against Mr. Ekici, whom Turkish officials charged with unauthorized access to computers and disseminating a virus, is pending.

Virus Authors Sentenced (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

Two Moroccan men have been sentenced to prison terms for helping write the Zotob computer virus that attacked major U.S. networks last year, a court official said Wednesday. Science student Farid Essebar, 19, and his friend Achraf Bahloul were sentenced Tuesday at the court in Sale, Morocco, near the capital Rabat, a court official said. Essebar was sentenced to two years and Bahloul to one year, the official MAP news agency reported. The Zotob worm and its variations, first unleashed in August 2005, targeted computers that run Microsoft Corp. operating systems, with Windows 2000 users most seriously affected.

California DNA Program Suffers From Lack Of Funding (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

Two years after California set out to create a vast DNA database to help unravel tens of thousands unsolved crimes, the program is being severely hampered by a lack of resources, officials across the state say.

The state crime lab has a backlog of more than a quarter-million DNA samples it is unable to process because of a funding shortfall and a lack of manpower, directors acknowledge. At its current rate of progress, the lab would have to spend 2 1/2 years to clear the backlog -- if it received no more samples, which is hardly likely, since it is currently taking in about 20,000 samples a month, officials said.

State officials, Los Angeles police officers and the director of the Santa Monica Rape Treatment Center say the backlog means that crimes are going unsolved and that criminals who could be nabbed may still be walking the streets.

"There will come a time when we will be sitting on a case where we have the offender profile and we are waiting for a match in (the database) who is among the 300,000 unprocessed samples and this offender will strike again," said Tim Marcia, a veteran detective in the LAPD's cold-case unit who has used DNA to solve rapes and murders.

The problems stem from overly optimistic funding projections when California voters in November 2004 resoundingly passed Proposition 69, designed to make the state the nation's leader in the use of DNA technology as a crime-solving tool.

Prop. 69 requires all convicted felons, certain misdemeanor offenders and those arrested for rape or murder to give up DNA samples. Prison officials swab offenders' mouths with an object called a buccal which looks like a tongue depressor. The samples are subjected to genetic testing, and the results are uploaded into the FBI laboratory's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS. The database can be run against evidence from crime scenes for DNA matches that will help identify new suspects.

More than 285,652 DNA samples have been uploaded into the data base and the program has yielded 2,670 "hits" in some long-languishing cases. But despite those successes, the funding problems have resulted in a backlog of 287,294 unprocessed DNA samples.

"Proposition 69 is the gold standard model for the world, but full and robust implementation is currently hamstrung," said Bruce Harrington, the Newport Beach, Calif., home developer who financed the ballot measure in 2004.

Harrington said the primary reason for the backlog is that the state crime lab in Richmond pays dramatically lower salaries than local crime labs, making it difficult to hire young scientists and hang onto more experienced ones.

Lance Gima, director of Forensic Services for the state attorney General, said the starting salary at the Richmond lab is $3,100, compared to $4,600 a month at the Los Angeles Police Department laboratory and $4,200 a month at the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department. Local labs in large Northern California cities also pay more than the state, Gima said.

Although the program was supposed to pay for itself, it has not been fully funded. Under the law, the counties were to turn over $1 of every $10 in misdemeanor fines to a "penalty pot," amassing $25 million a year for the project. Instead, for reasons that are unclear, not all the counties are contributing, and the penalty pot stands at only $7.5 million.

The state legislature just enacted a measure to allocate another $1 for each additional $10 in fines. Harrington and Gima called that a positive step but said that will not ensure that the fines are collected and the money sent to the state.

The problem is likely to get worse at the start of 2009 when officials will start taking samples from all persons arrested as well as convicted of felonies. In 2004, the latest year for which figures were available, there were 522,781 felony arrests in California.

For Gail Abarbanel, director of the Rape Treatment Center at Santa Monica-UCLA Medical Center, the program has been a source of both exhilaration -- some rape cases have been solved very rapidly -- and enormous frustration.

"We have the law, the technology and the voice of public behind Prop. 69, but we also have a lot of valuable DNA evidence waiting to be processed," Abarbanel said.

Prominent criminal defense lawyers also are alarmed by the program's failings.

"It is a loss for prosecutors who want to expeditiously solve crimes before the perpetrators can commit more acts of violence and a loss for innocent suspects who do not want to be wrongly arrested an prosecuted," said Peter Neufeld, co-founder of the Innocence Project at Benjamin Cardozo Law School in New York, which has used DNA evidence to exonerate more than 180 wrongly convicted persons over the past 15 years.

Currently, the state lab, located in a modest office park, has 34 vacant employee spots. At the same time, it faces an onslaught of new work.

Gima complimented state Corrections officials for doing an efficient job of collecting samples . But the Richmond lab simply has been unable to keep up -- even with many staffers working overtime and weekends.

"We are very proud of what we have accomplished but we are not happy with that backlog," Gima emphasized.

The new law provides that if the state lab is unable to process a sample within six months it should be outsourced to a private laboratory. So far, the state has sent 166,000 samples to three private labs. However, the state lab staff has to verify every DNA profile the private lab processes, adding to their workload. Earlier this year, the state had to stop sending out samples because it couldn't pay the private labs, Gima said.

"DNA testing has really outstanding potential in terms of not only helping the police to investigate crimes, and also exonerate people who are innocent. But there are a lot of gaps to get DNA where it needs to go," said Barry Fisher, long time director of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's crime laboratory.

Slaying Suspect Free By Mistake (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Prince William County officials accidentally released a man charged with murder and didn't notice the mistake until five days later, authorities said yesterday.

Authorities said that they have no idea where Christopher T. Broady is and that he is dangerous.

"He is on trial for murder so that should give you an indication of the seriousness of this, of how hard we are trying to get him back," Manassas Detective Christine Perry said. "This is a priority. . . . It is number one."

Broady, 19, is charged with shooting a D.C. man in the head in an apparent drug dispute. He walked out of jail Friday, and the mistake was not noticed until Tuesday.

"He could be anywhere. He could be in Arizona, Mexico, South America," Prince William Commonwealth's Attorney Paul B. Ebert (D) said.

Jail officials and prosecutors said Broady was released in a period of confusion after murder charges against him had been dropped in Prince William Circuit Court but were pending in General District Court.

"I think the breakdown was in the overall process," Jail Superintendent Charles "Skip" Land said. "I think we took the steps to protect the public and verify it and, unfortunately, the jail released him when the courts wanted him held."

Broady is charged with killing Bernard S. Matthews, 22, on Feb. 1. Matthews was shot and left lying near Bruckner Road in the Georgetown South community of Prince William. The slaying made headlines because another man robbed Matthews before police could take him to the hospital. He died the next day.

A week later, authorities found Broady in Danville and charged him with murder in Matthews's slaying and possession of a firearm in the commission of a felony. He told his girlfriend's father that the shooting was over drugs, according to court testimony by the father, James Holmes.

The path to Broady's release began when Holmes did not show up to testify at an Aug. 21 hearing in Circuit Court. That prompted authorities to drop the charges in that court. But simultaneously, prosecutors charged Broady in General District Court. He should have been held pending a preliminary hearing in that court.

Prosecutors also mistakenly sought a second indictment against Broady. When that indictment was returned Sept. 5, prosecutors later dropped it because the case was pending in the lower court.

That's when jail officials saw the paperwork saying Broady should be released. Land said officials called court clerks to check that the charges were dismissed and were told they were.

Broady was allowed to walk out at 11:16 a.m. Friday.

The jail had been facing scrutiny after officials held a Manassas man in custody two months after he should have been released. Court and jail officials blamed a combination of human error and cultural differences on the incident, but the problem also came down to a miscommunication between two branches of the criminal justice system. The courts had listed him as Fernando Antonio Antonio Cruz and the jail had him as Fernando Antonio Cruz.

Cruz was supposed to be released Dec. 12 but wasn't let out until Feb. 15.

"I think of course this is again an unfortunate case," Land said. "We are crowded, but I feel we run a safe agency, and I think the community is safe. I apologize for this happening.

"I just hope we can get Mr. Broady back without incident," he said. "The quicker the better."

Police have launched a nationwide search for Broady. They have interviewed Broady's family, friends and associates and said they have no leads. They are asking anyone with information to call 703-330-0330 and are offering a $1,000 reward if it leads to his arrest.

Ebert called the incident "very unfortunate" and said his office made a mistake by indicting Broady a second time. He said he takes responsibility for what happened.

"Occasionally a mistake happens, and this is one of those times," Ebert said. "They should have never released him. We should have never indicted him. It was just combination of things that happened that will probably never happen again."

Anthony Kostelecky, Broady's court-appointed attorney, said he got a call Tuesday from police telling him his client was released. "I was dumbfounded," he said. "I can see how a mistake might be made, but at the same time it's a big mistake."

4th Animal-welfare Activist Sent To Prison (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 14, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) _ A fourth animal rights activist who helped incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals was sentenced Wednesday to prison.

Joshua Harper, a West Coast coordinator for Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, was sentenced to three years in prison and was ordered to help pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people he helped terrorize.

DOJ_NMG_0063062

On Tuesday, three other members of the group were sentenced to prison for terms ranging from four to six years. Two other members of the group still await sentencing: Andrew Stepanian, SHAC's New York coordinator, and Darius Fullmer, an organizer who researched the group's targets. They were scheduled to be sentenced Tuesday.

Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a Britain-based company that tests drugs and household products on animals.

The government charged that the group waged a five-year campaign against the company, posting the names, addresses and phone numbers of Huntingdon employees and those who do business with the company, and personal information such as where they go to church and where their children attend school.

Many of those people saw their homes vandalized and received threatening e-mails, faxes and phone calls.

The group, based in Philadelphia, maintained its actions were protected under the First Amendment.

The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism.

Matheson Concurs With Reid On The Thorny Issue (SLT)

By Thomas Burr, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - At least one Utah congressman says the federal government should be more involved in prosecuting polygamy crimes, while others say the matter is largely a concern of state and local law enforcement.

"Crimes against children cannot be tolerated," Rep. Jim Matheson said in a statement Wednesday. "I would support additional federal assistance to help prosecute these crimes."

The state's lone Democrat in Congress was responding to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's call a day earlier for a federal task force to investigate polygamist activity in the West.

The Justice Department said Wednesday it is reviewing a letter from Reid to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to appoint a team to probe, and prosecute, if necessary, accusations of "systemic child abuse" in "this modern day polygamy movement."

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom," wrote Nevada's Reid, who is LDS. "But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated. Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice."

DOJ_NMG_0063063

Matheson's district includes the polygamist enclave of Hildale, which, along with Colorado City, Ariz., is the base for the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, led by Warren Jeffs. Jeffs was captured late last month after being among the FBI's most wanted list on charges of being an accomplice to rape in arranging marriages of young girls to adult members of the church.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said polygamy "is against the law," and prosecuting it is largely the job of local and state law enforcement.

"But the federal government should definitely back them up, especially when these activities cross state lines," Hatch said in a statement, adding, "As for an investigation, any attention to this issue is helpful, that's for sure."

GOP Rep. Chris Cannon's spokesman Charles Isom said his boss has "full faith in" the states' abilities to prosecute polygamy.

"Congressman Cannon has every confidence that the attorney generals in the Western states, working with law enforcement, are well-qualified to take on this issue," Isom said.

The offices of Rep. Rob Bishop and Sen. Bob Bennett did not answer a request Wednesday for comment on Reid's letter.

The anti-polygamy group Tapestry Against Polygamy praised Reid's call for an investigation, saying "it's about time this has happened."

These "civil rights violations have gone on for over 50 years and finally an outsider is coming in and has to do our housecleaning for us," said Vicki Prunty, executive director of the group. "That should be an embarrassment to the state of Utah and Arizona, but we need this to happen and if we couldn't do it ourselves, let someone else take the initiative to get the job done."

Prunty, a former polygamist wife, added that polygamy is not just a Utah problem and the federal government and states are going to have to work together to address the problems.

"Some of that's already happening," Utah's chief deputy attorney general, Kirk Torgensen, said of Reid's call for more federal assistance.

"We have had several meetings with our federal counterparts on several issues. I hate it to sound like this is some new idea and we haven't been working collectively on things, because we really have."

Torgensen, though, says he welcomes more federal involvement, especially if the Internal Revenue Service could provide help in investigating purported tax fraud in polygamist havens.

"It's ripe for someone to give a serious look," he said.

Polygamy Proposal Called 'witch Hunt' (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 14, 2006

Polygamous groups are upset over a Nevada senator's call for a Justice Department probe into their lives and activities.

"It is disconcerting to have a senator take a real strong position on that," said one Utah polygamist, who asked the Deseret Morning News not to use his name. He said all of his wives are consenting adults. "It appears to be a reaction to (Warren) Jeffs and the FLDS culture."

In a letter sent Tuesday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Senate Minority leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., reacted to the capture of Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs and suggested creating a federal task force to look into polygamous communities in Western states.

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been masked in the guise of religious freedom. But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated," Reid wrote. "Individuals who force minors into adult relationships and marriage must be brought to justice."

Members of the polygamous community of Centennial Park, Ariz., called Reid's request a "modern-day witch hunt."

"Polygamy is not a federal offense but is to be regulated under the prerogative of state's rights," said Joyce Steed of the Centennial Park Action Committee. "Therefore, one could question what his justification is for asking the federal government to target their efforts on an unpopular minority. We can be sure polygamy does not represent a personal moral issue for the senator, coming out of the state that has legalized prostitution."

Reid's letter tries to distance the fundamentalist sects from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, of which he is a member.

But the pro-polygamy group Principle Voices feared a task force could be too invasive.

"I would like to know why he feels that's necessary," said Anne Wilde. "I thought the attorney generals in Utah and Arizona both were doing a good job separating the crime from the culture."

Tapestry Against Polygamy, a Utah-based group that opposes polygamy, hailed Reid's call for a task force, saying abuses in polygamy are prevalent throughout the West.

"This is no longer a Utah problem. It will take federal intervention," said Tapestry director Vicky Prunty.

But some in the Utah Attorney General's Office said a task force was unnecessary.

"We have been working for several years with our federal partners," Chief Deputy Attorney General Kirk Torgensen said Wednesday. "They have been fantastic."

The FBI has been investigating Jeffs and had put him on its Ten Most Wanted list. Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas. He is currently being held in Hurricane's Purgatory Jail without bail pending a Sept. 27 court appearance.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against him, but would not say if it was conducting its own investigations.

Jeffs, 50, is facing rape as an accomplice charges in 5th District Court in St. George. He is accused of forcing a teenage girl into a polygamous marriage with an older man. In Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is charged with sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor.

In his letter, Reid asked the Justice Department to assist prosecutors in Utah and Arizona in their cases, including filing federal charges should Jeffs be acquitted.

Mohave County Attorney Matt Smith indicated he would be willing to take the help.

"If there could be a charge of moving these minors across state lines for sexual purposes, that would be a great assistance to what we are trying to do," he said, "which is to stop these underage, so-called marriages and to stop the men up there from having sex with girls before they reach their 18th birthday."

Texas Court To Reconsider DeLay Charge (AP-Y)

By April Castro

AP, September 13, 2006

Texas' highest criminal appeals court agreed Wednesday to consider reinstating a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a move that could delay his trial until next year.

DeLay is facing felony money laundering and conspiracy counts that stem from Republican fundraising in the 2002 legislative races. He stepped down as majority leader after the charges were filed and announced his resignation from Congress a few months later.

"It's just another bump in the road," DeLay attorney Dick DeGuerin said.

A state district judge threw out one of two conspiracy charges in December and let the money laundering charge stand. Prosecutors asked the appeals court to reinstate the dropped conspiracy charge, a move that has postponed trial proceedings on the other charges.

DeGuerin argues that the dropped charge accuses DeLay of conspiring to violate the election code as it stood in 2003, and that the transaction was legal at the time it was made. The second conspiracy charge accuses DeLay of conspiring to launder money.

Early on, DeLay had hoped to have the case resolved quickly so he could regain his leadership position in Congress. But with his resignation behind him, he is working on a book that he says will address how his career "furthered the conservative cause" and helped change the culture of Washington.

"The time crush is not there anymore," DeGuerin said. "Of course he'd like to get it over with as quickly as possible, but he's gone on in his life and has got other things to do."

DeLay and other Texas Republicans have accused prosecutor Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, of conducting a political vendetta. Earle's office did not comment Wednesday.

Prosecutors accuse Delay and two political consultants of funneling $190,000 in illegal corporate money to the Republican National Committee, which then donated the same amount to Texas candidates. Under Texas law, corporate money can't be directly used for political campaigns.

DeLay and the consultants, Jim Ellis and John Colyandro, say the transaction was legal.

3 Bilked Medicaid Of Millions Using Fake Billings, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-Peña

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063065

Two brothers, a doctor in Brooklyn and an owner of pharmacies in Brooklyn and Queens, led a conspiracy that defrauded Medicaid of millions of dollars by billing the program for H.I.V. drugs and other medicines that were never given to patients, federal prosecutors say.

The United States attorney's office announced the arrest yesterday of the brothers, Dr. Muhammad Ejaz Ahmad and Muhammad Nawaz Ahmad, and a third man, Mohammad Tanveer, a pharmacy employee, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government, punishable by up to five years in prison. The complaint against them points to a larger conspiracy, involving "others known and unknown."

Two law enforcement officers posing as H.I.V. patients took secret audio and video recordings at the doctor's office and the pharmacies, according to a statement filed with United States District Court in Manhattan by an F.B.I. agent, Shawn R. Mullen. He said that the undercover officers, like real patients, were given some drugs, but that the conspirators billed Medicaid for many more prescriptions than were ever dispensed.

The defendants paid the patients $40 for each trip to the doctor's office or pharmacy, the agent said — which prosecutors noted is more than the $30 Medicaid paid the doctor for the visit. They described those payments as illegal kickbacks to the patients, suggesting that at least some patients were aware of the scheme.

The United States Attorney's Office would not put an overall dollar amount on the cost of the fraud against Medicaid, the joint federal and state health plan for the poor. But the complaint states that for just three antiviral drugs — among many medicines used to treat H.I.V. infection and its side effects — the three pharmacies billed Medicaid for $2.5 million for drugs that they never received from their distributors.

"My guy says he's absolutely innocent of anything, that he's a legitimate businessman," said Patrick Bruno, the lawyer for Mr. Ahmad, the pharmacy owner. The other defendants have not yet hired lawyers, he said.

Dr. Ahmad, 49, practiced internal medicine at an office at 1121 Coney Island Avenue, in central Brooklyn, and lives in Albertson, in Nassau County.

Doctors are supposed to make information about themselves available to the public — things like medical education, malpractice judgments and hospital affiliations — through a State Department of Health Web site. Dr. Ahmad does not appear on that Web site.

The complaint says that Dr. Ahmad's wife and his brother, who is 38, were co-owners of the three pharmacies involved in the Medicaid scheme. The wife is not named, and is not charged with a crime. Mr. Bruno said the younger Mr. Ahmad, who lives in Floral Park, in Nassau County, also has a medical degree but has never practiced medicine.

Mr. Tanveer, 49, also lives in Floral Park.

All three men are from Pakistan but are longtime United States residents, according to federal officials and Mr. Bruno. They said the Ahmad brothers are citizens, but Mr. Tanveer is not.

At an arraignment late yesterday, bail was set at $300,000 for each of the Ahmad brothers, Mr. Bruno said, and "we hope to make bail within a day." Both he and a spokeswoman for the prosecutors said they did not know the bail set for Mr. Tanveer.

The allegations in the complaint cover about two and a half years, but federal officials say they are looking at earlier years as well, to determine how far back the fraud goes.

The complaint says that patients with H.I.V. who visited Dr. Ahmad were steered to the pharmacies owned by his brother and wife: Stay Slim Pharmacy, less than a block away from Dr. Ahmad's office, at 1166 Coney Island Avenue; Script Depot, at 99-06 63rd Road in Rego Park, Queens; and Nash Pharmacy, at 47-07 Francis Lewis Boulevard in Bayside, Queens, where Mr. Tanveer works. In other cases, the doctor got the drugs from the pharmacies, and patients picked them up from him.

One undercover officer got three months' worth of drugs, but Nash Pharmacy billed Medicaid for eight months' worth, and tried to bill for more, the complaint says. Though Nash lies in another borough, prescriptions from Dr. Ahmad accounted for three-fourths of the pharmacy's Medicaid billing last year.

The complaint also says that a real patient of Dr. Ahmad's received H.I.V. drugs, but Medicaid records for that patient also show that over 22 months, the doctor prescribed $58,000 worth of other medications that the patient says he never took.

One of the stranger elements of the case is the complaint's description of what it calls kickbacks to the patients. It says that each time an undercover officer met any of the three defendants, the other man would hand him $40, without being asked for money, and without any explanation of what it was for.

Outed CIA Spy Sues Former State Department Official Over Leak, No Conspiracy Accusation (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-One-time covert CIA officer Valerie Plame sued the former No. 2 official at the State Department on Wednesday for violating her privacy rights.

The suit does not accuse Richard Armitage, who was deputy secretary of state in the Bush administration, of participating in an administration conspiracy to blow her cover.

Plame added Armitage's name to a civil suit in U.S. District Court against Vice President Dick Cheney, his former chief of staff I. Lewis Libby and White House adviser Karl Rove.

Plame and her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, say the White House leaked Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticisms of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Armitage admitted last week that he told two reporters in 2003 that Plame worked for the CIA, but he said the disclosure was inadvertent. Armitage said he knew of no plan to leak Plame's identity; some people said the admission disproved the conspiracy theory.

By adding Armitage's name to the suit, Plame's lawyers set up a different scenario. They contend a White House conspiracy existed, but that Armitage's leak was independent of it.

Armitage is accused of violating Plame's privacy rights. He is not accused of violating the Wilsons' constitutional rights to equal protection and freedom of speech, but those allegations remain against the White House officials.

Wilson discounted reports that then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from Niger to make a nuclear weapon. Such a claim wound up in President George W. Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has investigated the leak for years and has not charged anyone with intentionally leaking Plame's identity. Libby is under indictment for lying to authorities about his conversations with reporters.

Novak Accuses Plame Source Of Distortion (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Columnist Robert D. Novak, who first revealed Valerie Plame's employment by the CIA and touched off a lengthy federal leak investigation, is accusing his primary source of misrepresenting their conversation to make the source's role in the disclosure seem more casual than it was.

In an unusual column that appears today, Novak says his initial source, former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage, was more sure of Plame's ties to the CIA than the source has indicated. Novak adds that Armitage linked her directly to her husband's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger and suggested the disclosure would be a good item for Novak's column.

This differs from Armitage's assertions last week that his disclosure was made in an offhand manner and that he did not know why Plame's husband was sent to Niger.

Armitage, in an interview yesterday, said he stood by his account and disputed Novak's.

The disagreement between Novak and Armitage now covers even the length of their conversation in Armitage's office at the State Department on July 8, 2003. The fallout from that meeting eventually became a consuming political topic in Washington and led to Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's indictment last October of Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on charges of lying to investigators.

The leak of Plame's name touched off a major political controversy because of media reports at the time that the White House was attempting to discredit Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson was sent by the CIA to Niger in 2002 to investigate whether Iraq was trying to buy nuclear weapons material there, and on July 6, 2003, he wrote a column accusing the White House of deliberately twisting intelligence about the Iraqi program to justify the U.S. invasion.

Wilson's accusations infuriated the White House, and Fitzgerald has said in court documents that some administration officials wanted to undermine Wilson by suggesting that his assignment resulted from nepotism.

Plame sued Armitage yesterday, accusing him of violating her privacy rights.

Fitzgerald has not declared his probe of the leak finished, 2 1/2 years after it began, although he told Armitage in a Feb. 24 letter that "absent unexpected developments, I do not anticipate seeking any criminal charges against you."

In his initial July 14, 2003, column, Novak wrote that Wilson "never worked for the CIA, but his wife, Valerie Plame, is an agency operative on weapons of mass destruction." Novak also wrote that "two senior administration officials told me his wife suggested sending Wilson to Niger to investigate."

Novak did not identify his sources, but Armitage admitted publicly for the first time last week that he was one. White House political adviser Karl Rove earlier confirmed he was the other.

In confirming his role, Armitage said his disclosure to Novak was done in an offhand way. At the end of their conversation, "Novak asked me, 'Hey, why did the CIA send Mr. Wilson to Niger?' I said, 'I don't know, but I think his wife worked out there,' " Armitage said.

Novak criticized Armitage for not revealing his involvement before now. Armitage said he remained silent because Fitzgerald warned him it might jeopardize the investigation. He said he cooperated fully with Fitzgerald's investigation since realizing on Oct. 1, 2003, that he was a source for that Novak column.

But Novak says in today's column that Armitage's statements "obscured what he really did" and that "Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he 'thought' might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson."

Novak said further that "Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat. . . . He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column." In an interview, Novak said that Armitage effectively described it as stock, Washington-insider information of the sort that often appeared in the column.

Armitage, in reply, said his disclosure to Novak was inadvertent and noted that Novak himself described it as "offhand" in an Oct. 1, 2003, column. Armitage said he could not recall whether he identified the CIA division where Wilson's wife worked. He added that he rejects any suggestion he was deliberately trying to plant the information, explaining that "I had no reason to wish him [Wilson] any ill" and that Wilson "was simply verifying what had already been reported [about Iraq] through State channels."

Lobbyist Ken Duberstein, a friend of Armitage who helped arrange Novak's meeting with him, said yesterday that Armitage's account precisely matches what Armitage told him in October 2003.

Armitage's Leak (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

When Richard Armitage finally acknowledged last week that he was my source three years ago in revealing Valerie Plame Wilson as a CIA employee, the former deputy secretary of state's interviews obscured what he really did. I want to set the record straight based on firsthand knowledge.

First, Armitage did not, as he now indicates, merely pass on something he had heard and that he "thought" might be so. Rather, he identified to me the CIA division where Mrs. Wilson worked and said flatly that she recommended the mission to Niger by her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson. Second, Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column.

An accurate depiction of what Armitage actually said deepens the irony of his being my source. He was a foremost internal skeptic of the administration's war policy, and I had long opposed military intervention in Iraq. Zealous foes of George W. Bush transformed me, improbably, into the president's lapdog. But they cannot fit Armitage into the left-wing fantasy of a well-crafted White House conspiracy to destroy Joe and Valerie Wilson. The news that he, and not Karl Rove, was the leaker was devastating for the left.

A peculiar convergence had joined Armitage and me on the same historic path. During his quarter of a century in Washington, I had had no contact with Armitage before our fateful interview. I tried to see him in the first 2 1/2 years of the Bush administration, but he rebuffed me -- summarily and with disdain, I thought.

Then, without explanation, in June 2003, Armitage's office said the deputy secretary would see me. This was two weeks before Joe Wilson outed himself as author of a 2002 report for the CIA debunking Iraqi interest in buying uranium in Africa.

I sat down with Armitage in his State Department office the afternoon of July 8 with tacit rather than explicit ground rules: deep background with nothing said attributed to Armitage or even to an anonymous State Department official. Consequently, I refused to identify Armitage as my leaker until his admission was forced by "Hubris," a new book by reporters Michael Isikoff and David Corn that absolutely identified him.

Late in my hour-long interview with Armitage, I asked why the CIA had sent Wilson -- who lacked intelligence experience, nuclear policy expertise or recent contact with Niger -- on the African mission. He told The Post last week that his answer was: "I don't know, but I think his wife worked out there."

Neither of us took notes, and nobody else was present. But I recalled our conversation that week in writing a column, while Armitage reconstructed it months later for federal prosecutors. He had told me unequivocally that Mrs. Wilson worked in the CIA's Counterproliferation Division and that she had suggested her husband's mission. As for his current implication that he never expected this to be published, he noted that the story of Mrs. Wilson's role fit the style of the old Evans-Novak column -- implying to me that it continued reporting Washington inside information.

Valerie Plame Wilson's name appeared in my column July 14, 2003, but it was not until Oct. 1 that I was contacted about it by Armitage, indirectly. Washington lobbyist Kenneth Duberstein, Armitage's close friend and political adviser, called me to say that the deputy secretary feared he had "inadvertently" (the word Armitage used in last week's interviews) disclosed Mrs. Wilson's identity to me in July and was considering resignation. (Duberstein's phone call was disclosed in the Isikoff-Corn book, which used Duberstein as a source. They reported that Duberstein was responsible for arranging my unexpected interview with Armitage.)

Duberstein told me Armitage wanted to know whether he was my source. I did not reply because I was sure that Armitage knew he was the source. I believed he contacted me Oct. 1 because of news the weekend of Sept. 27-28 that the Justice Department was investigating the leak. I cannot credit Armitage's current claim that he realized he was the source only when my Oct. 1 column revealed that the official who gave me the information was "no partisan gunslinger."

Armitage's silence for the next 2 1/2 years caused intense pain for his colleagues in government and enabled partisan Democrats in Congress to falsely accuse Rove of being my primary source. When Armitage now says he was mute because of special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's request, that does not explain his silent three months between his claimed first realization that he was the source and Fitzgerald's appointment on Dec. 30, 2003. Armitage's tardy self-disclosure is tainted because it is deceptive.

Anthrax Victim's Widow Says Government May Know Who Killed Husband (PALMBEACHP)

By Eliot Kleinberg, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 14, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Maureen Stevens says the federal government probably knows who killed her husband.

She believes they're not telling because that might reveal things the government doesn't want revealed.

Nearly five years after Bob Stevens' death, the first in the anthrax attacks that terrified a nation, "I want to know what happened," his widow, who's sued the government, said Wednesday from her lawyer's office. "I want to go into court and find out what happened. What information's obviously there. The truth is there."

Bob Stevens of Lantana, a photo editor for Boca Raton-based tabloid The Sun, died in October 2001, after he apparently opened mail laced with the deadly substance.

The government said in February of 2002 that it had a "short list" of 18 to 20 people who had the knowledge, equipment, access, and motive to obtain and "weaponize" anthrax. Richard Schuler, Stevens' attorney, said Wednesday it might be fewer than a dozen.

Stevens filed suit in December 2003, alleging security lapses at the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases in Fort Detrick, Md., led to her husband's death. A federal judge refused to dismiss the case and it has been in front of a federal appeals court for nearly a year. The government has argued proceeding with the suit would jeopardize the ongoing search for the killer.

In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said he could not comment because the suit is still active.

Stevens said she's had only two contacts with the FBI since shortly after her husband's death. Agents talked with her in West Palm Beach in July 2003.

And she and families of the other four people confirmed killed by anthrax met with the agency in Washington in November of last year.

Stevens said the agents told the families they were getting close to solving the case and that she felt positive after that meeting. But, she said Wednesday, "it was just lip service. I don't want to say things like this, but I do feel that."

And Schuler said, "To only get with families once in five years, and to give what's only window dressing, I believe is a disgrace."

Stevens said she still believes the case will be solved.

"I have to be patient," Stevens said.

But, she said of her suit, "What else do I have?" she said. "Do I stand on a street corner and ask everybody to ask the government for answers? It's not going to happen."

Federal Judge Questions Data Used By Smokers To Define Class (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 14, 2006

A federal judge Wednesday expressed skepticism over a proposed class action lawsuit that would seek as much as $200 billion in damages against the tobacco industry for its allegedly deceptive marketing of light cigarettes.

DOJ_NMG_0063069

In a daylong hearing, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein wondered how the plaintiffs could define a viable class -- and accurately assess damages -- when the tens of millions of people who have smoked light cigarettes might have chosen to do so for any number of reasons.

While the plaintiffs in part rely on a study that shows 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers were attracted by perceived health benefits that experts now claim do not exist, Weinstein said consumers could have relied on those perceived benefits to varying degrees, or even known that those health benefits were illusory.

"How many people deep down knew they were getting something dangerous, but were willing to pay for the illusion it wasn't?" Weinstein said.

He added: "You can't get away from the contention of the defendants that every smoker is somewhat different."

Michael D. Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington, D.C., a firm for the plaintiffs, said the tobacco industry's marketing had the goal of shifting its buyers to light cigarettes, beginning in 1971, because of growing health concerns about smoking. If they had not, he said, smokers would have "quit in droves" -- a comment that was greeted with chuckles from the audience.

"The tobacco industry foisted a huge deception on the consuming public," Hausfeld said. A Brooklyn jury, he said, would have no trouble understanding what it means to be "cheated."

Hausfeld said light-cigarette smokers had essentially overpaid -- by as much as 50 percent to 80 percent per pack of cigarettes -- for a product that promised something it could not deliver. He said the plaintiffs were eligible for treble damages, which could amount to $600 billion.

Theodore M. Grossman of Jones Day in Cleveland, which represents defendant R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, called the 90 percent figure a "nonsense statistic" and said the plaintiffs had "no clue what the numbers are" in terms of how many people relied on the word "light" when choosing their brand of cigarettes.

Grossman said the plaintiffs arrived at the 90 percent figure by asking smokers what they would do if presented with the opportunity to buy one of two cigarettes, both with the same taste but one with fewer health risks.

"[It's] a question that only a suicidal person could answer in the negative," Grossman said.

He said that an expert for the plaintiffs had also found that 90 percent of light-cigarette smokers liked the taste of their cigarettes, and would continue to smoke them if they were told that they had the same health risks as other cigarettes.

Murray R. Garnick of Arnold & Porter in Washington, D.C., which represents defendant Philip Morris USA Inc., said that for the plaintiffs to succeed on a civil claim under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, they would have to establish a reasonable reliance on an alleged misrepresentation.

"The bottom line is the plaintiffs have to figure out what percentage of class members believed light cigarettes were safer," Garnick said.

Grossman said, "We have a class of virtually no one."

Weinstein pointed out that tobacco companies sold light and regular cigarettes at the same price, further complicating how the plaintiffs could identify damages to the class.

"You just can't allow a jury to grab a number out of thin air," the judge said. "There has to be some basis in reality."

The defendants asked the court to grant their motion for summary judgment. Weinstein reserved decision.

The case, McLaughlin v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 04-CV-1945, was filed in 2004 and rivals, in terms of lawyers and paperwork, some of the largest cases Weinstein, 84, has handled in his career, including mass torts involving firearms, asbestos and Agent Orange.

About 40 attorneys took seats in the well and jury box Wednesday, and the judge's bench was piled high with boxes and bound documents (the judge sat at a table closer to the parties).

Another voluminous document -- a 1,742-page opinion by Judge Gladys Kessler of U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia -- may also play a role in the case.

Last month, Kessler, ruling in a racketeering suit brought by the U.S. Justice Department, said the tobacco industry had defrauded consumers through false marketing and promotion of light cigarettes as less harmful than regular cigarettes.

The day after the ruling was released, Weinstein asked both parties in his case to brief the issue of collateral estoppel. The tobacco companies have claimed that Kessler's ruling should not prevent them from relitigating issues that she decided in her case.

Judge Weighs New Trial Against Tobacco Companies (NYT)

By Melanie Warner And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063070

A federal judge is considering whether tobacco companies should be tried on the question of whether they deceived smokers for years about the safety of light cigarettes.

After hearing a day of arguments yesterday, Judge Jack B. Weinstein, of Federal District Court in downtown Brooklyn, did not indicate whether he would grant class-action status to the closely watched case. But he did ask lawyers for the plaintiffs how they were determining the number of smokers potentially affected and possible damages.

In the case, known as Schwab after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab, lawyers asserted that cigarette makers had deceived smokers into thinking that light cigarettes, representing 45 percent of the market, were safer or less addicting.

Lawyers are seeking a national class action of tens of millions of smokers and are proposing that tobacco companies pay damages of $20 billion to $200 billion. The case was filed under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act, which entitles plaintiffs to triple damages.

Judge Weinstein is expected to decide within several weeks whether to grant class-action status.

The case, filed in 2004, is part of the latest legal assault against tobacco companies. After successfully warding off litigation by people claiming to have been injured by smoking, plaintiffs' lawyers have turned their attention to attacking cigarette companies for defrauding consumers by selling light cigarettes.

While many of these so-called light cases have been unsuccessful, the Schwab case follows an opinion last month by a federal judge in the District of Columbia, who found that cigarette companies engaged in decades of fraud and racketeering, including misleading smokers and concealing information about the health risks of light cigarettes.

That ruling, by Judge Gladys Kessler in a case brought by the Justice Department, was a victory for tobacco companies in the sense that they did not have to pay a possible $10 billion in damages. But the 1,600-page opinion was a searing indictment of conduct by tobacco companies over the last 40 years.

Plaintiffs' lawyers in the Schwab case want to rely on those findings. "The tobacco industry has foisted a huge deception on the public and the public health community," Michael D. Hausfeld, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll, said at yesterday's hearing. "They understood they were selling death but they had to disguise it."

Attorneys for tobacco companies argued that the Schwab case should not be certified as a class action because differences in the way people smoked cigarettes could affect the amount of tar and nicotine taken in. They also argued that people smoked cigarettes for a variety of reasons and that many people smoked light cigarettes because they liked the taste, not for health reasons or as part of an attempt to quit smoking.

"This is a tiny class of people," said Theodore Grossman, an attorney for R. J. Reynolds, the country's second-largest tobacco company. He also said the plaintiffs had failed to show which people were relying on light cigarettes for health reasons.

Tobacco analysts on Wall Street have been expecting Judge Weinstein, who is 84 and has earned a reputation as a champion of consumer rights, to certify the case as a class action.

In a research note last year, Robert Campagnino, a tobacco analyst for Prudential Financial, called Judge Weinstein a "thorn in the side of the tobacco industry."

But at the conclusion of the hearing yesterday, Judge Weinstein asked pointed questions to the plaintiffs' attorneys to explain how they would determine how many people might have been defrauded by the marketing of light cigarettes and how they would calculate damages.

Workforce Central Florida Settles $3.5M Justice Department Claim (ORLANDOBIZ)

Orlando Business Journal, September 14, 2006

Workforce Central Florida and the Workforce Central Florida Foundation Inc. have paid nearly $3.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. Department of Justice that they defrauded the government by misusing federal grant funds to improve their privately owned offices and One-Stop Center in Lake Mary.

However, no individuals involved in the case have been either charged with a crime or dismissed from their job because it was considered an unintentional violation of federal rules concerning allowable charges, one described by Workforce officials as an "accounting dispute."

Still, it is believed to be the largest settlement ever levied against one of Florida's 24 nonprofit workforce agencies, which are locally chartered organizations designed to provide services such as job placement and training. The organizations are overseen by the state Agency for Workforce Innovation.

"We analyzed every aspect of this transaction and voted at the end (in public session) to do it this way," WCF board member and past Chairman Atlee Mercer says. "Later, in hindsight, the government decided we should have done it differently. We don't agree. We thought we followed the letter of the law."

DOJ_NMG_0063071

The settlement has been paid by the foundation through a refinancing of the building that houses Workforce Central Florida, which handles One-Stop centers for Orange, Lake, Osceola, Seminole and Sumter counties. It will not have any impact on the services WCF currently offers, its officials emphasize.

The Workforce Central Florida Foundation is a separate organization set up several years ago to find alternative funding sources to the $26 million in federal funds WCF currently receives annually.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Putting Off Sentencing Is Urged (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino (CA) Sun, September 14, 2006

Members of Congress seek probe of agents' convictions

Sentencing should be delayed for two Border Patrol agents facing 20 years apiece in prison for shooting a drug smuggler and violating his civil rights, 22 congressmen told the Department of Justice on Wednesday.

In a letter, the congressmen asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to postpone sentencing and review the case against Border Patrol agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean.

"Due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding the prosecution of agents Ramos and Compean, the House Judiciary Committee has already recognized the need for a thorough review of this case by calling for congressional hearings and an investigation of the Department of Homeland Security, Office of the Inspector General, U.S. Customs and Border Patrol and the U.S. Attorney's Office," the letter stated.

In a separate letter to the Justice Department, Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas, echoed his colleagues' concerns.

"If the facts I have laid out are accurate, then this prosecution puts the rights of illegal alien drug smugglers ahead of our homeland security and undermines the critical mission of better enforcing current immigration laws," Gohmert wrote.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the department had received the letters and is planning a response to the request. She said any comment specifically about the agents' case had to come from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Texas that prosecuted the agents.

Ramos and Compean are facing prison for their roles in the nonfatal shooting of Mexican national Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who ran away from the agents after entering the United States from Mexico with a van filled with nearly 800 pounds of marijuana. Ramos shot at the smuggler, who he believed pointed a gun at him during a foot chase along the Rio Grande.

The agents were convicted earlier this year by an El Paso jury.

Aldrete-Davila is suing the Border Patrol for $5 million for civil-rights violations.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton defended the successful prosecution of the agents by Assistant U.S. Attorney Deborah Kanof.

"These agents shot an unarmed suspect as he was running away," Sutton said in a news release Wednesday. "If they honestly believed the shootings were justified, then they had no reason to lie about it and destroy the evidence.

"Mr. Compean and Mr. Ramos both told their stories at trial, as did the victim and numerous other witnesses. Texas juries are very well aware of the tough job Border Patrol agents have in this state and give them the benefit of the doubt. In this case, after hearing all the evidence from both sides, the jury didn't buy the defendants' stories."

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., who helped draft the congressional letter, said that after reviewing the agents' case, he and his colleagues noted a number of serious problems with the prosecution.

At a news conference last week, House members, along with Sheriff Terry Crawford of Uvalde County, Texas; TJ Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a union for agents; and Andy Ramirez, chairman of Chino-based Friends of the Border Patrol, discussed evidence they believe needs further review by the Justice Department.

The contingent said they were concerned that past assaults and violence against Border Patrol agents was not admissible in the court and questioned the Border Patrol's official "no pursuit" policy, which prevents agents from pursuing fleeing suspects unless authorized by a supervisor.

Kanof told The Sun's sister paper, the Ontario-based Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, last month that the agents violated their own pursuit policy and should never have attempted to apprehend Aldrete-Davila in the first place.

Ramos broke an 18-month silence about his altercation with Aldrete-Davila in an exclusive interview published in The Sun and Daily Bulletin on Aug. 6. Compean has been asked by his attorney not to speak to the media while the men's Oct. 18 sentencing hearing is pending.

Group Will Demonstrate In Waters Off Cuba During Summit (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0063072

AP, September 14, 2006

MIAMI - Cuban exile protesters plan to hold a symbolic, pro-democracy demonstration on a boat in international waters off the communist nation this weekend during a Nonaligned Movement summit, an exile leader said Wednesday.

Ramon Saul Sanchez of the Miami-based exile group Democracy Movement said the "maritime demonstration" is scheduled to take place Saturday. The weeklong summit began Monday.

Current plans call for about 20 demonstrators to leave a Key West marina onboard the 39-foot Democracia after midnight Friday and arrive in international waters off Cuba early Saturday, Sanchez said.

The group will carry symbolic electoral ballots printed with the choice of "dictatorship" or "democracy," fly a large white flag, display posters of Cuba's political prisoners and drop white roses on the water, Sanchez said.

They are demanding free elections and the release of all political prisoners among other things, Sanchez said. The group also hopes to fly a blimp from the ship with the word "Democracia" on it and mirrors that will reflect light and be seen on the island.

Sanchez said he met with representatives of the community relations board of the U.S. Justice Department Wednesday night to discuss plans for the demonstration. The department had no immediate comment.

Coast Guard officials have been notified of the group's plan, Sanchez said.

"They have a right to go out there. Unless they violate territorial waters there's nothing we can do. We can stop the voyage if it's unsafe, but there is no indication of that," Coast Guard Petty Officer Jennifer Johnson said. She confirmed the office had been notified of the group's plans.

The Nonaligned Movement, which includes about two-thirds of the world's nations, was developed during the Cold War as a Third World alternative to the United States and Soviet Union.

The summit in Cuba comes almost two months after President Fidel Castro, 80, announced he was stepping down from power - for the first time in 47 years - to recover from intestinal surgery. He has made no public appearances since. Castro's younger brother, Defense Minister Raul Castro, is Cuba's acting president.

Election Glitches 'could Get Ugly' (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Eight weeks before elections that will decide control of Congress, a rush by state and local governments to prepare new voting machines and train poll workers is raising the possibility of trouble reminiscent of the 2000 presidential election standoff.

Problems range from delayed delivery of new equipment to an insufficient supply of trained technicians to fix anticipated problems, voting experts say.

Already this year, glitches have occurred in Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and West Virginia. Maryland became the latest on Tuesday, when technical problems, human errors and staff shortages led officials to keep some polls open an extra hour.

The fall elections shape up as the most technologically perilous since 2000, election officials say, because 30% of the nation's voting jurisdictions will be using new equipment. They include large parts of Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Virginia, scenes of key Senate races. "If you're ever going to have a problem, it's going to be that first election," says Kimball Brace, president of Election Data Services.

Since 2000, nearly half of U.S. counties have switched from punch cards, lever machines and paper ballots to electronic voting or optical-scan ballots read by a computer. They continue to rely on poll workers who are on average 72 years old and lack computer experience.

Since 2002, the federal government has given states $3 billion to upgrade registration and voting systems. Some states, however, still don't have statewide voter registration databases or equipment that people with disabilities can use independently.

Among the other concerns:

·Demand for new equipment, produced largely by four manufacturers, has delayed deliveries.

·States, counties and manufacturers don't have enough technical support staff. Spokesmen for Diebold and Election Systems & Software, two major vendors, say they're continuously seeking people. States such as Maryland, Mississippi and Pennsylvania have advertised for help on the jobs website Monster.com.

"The vendors have done a much better job of selling the machines than they have of servicing them," says Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, which monitors voting changes.

·Touch-screen machines with a paper backup for recounts have caused problems in primaries. Twenty-seven states require a paper trail, up from one in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0063073

"There are so many potential failure points this year that some of it could get ugly," says R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center, which represents state and local election officials.

Balloting Breakdown (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Statewide problems in voting demand bipartisan attention.

IN BALTIMORE, many people who tried to vote early Tuesday found polling places shut because election judges hadn't shown up for work. In Prince George's County, the Board of Elections inexplicably went home early yesterday morning without counting all the primary ballots. And Montgomery County endured not only the morning fiasco with inoperable machines but also chaos at night as election officials ran out of paper ballots for extended voting.

Clearly, there is something wrong with the way elections are run in Maryland, and there are plenty of people to share the blame. Let's start at the top with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who bears ultimate responsibility since it is largely his nominees on local boards who run elections county by county. Then there is Linda H. Lamone, chairman of the State Board of Elections and an appointee of Mr. Ehrlich's Democratic predecessor, whose office is charged with the administration of elections across Maryland but who maddeningly said that "there's nothing we can do" about ineptitude on the local level. It is regrettable that these two officials have spent so much time fighting with each other rather than working to guarantee smooth elections.

Partisan bickering over the election process -- on issues ranging from which machines to purchase to whether there should be early voting -- can't have helped the local boards as they prepared for the primary. We are sympathetic to the complaints of hardworking officials about having to deal with new technology and last-minute changes to the ballot. But that cannot be an excuse for the incompetence that led to the breakdowns in Tuesday's voting. As more than one politician has observed, boards of elections do one thing -- run elections -- and they are given plenty of time to get ready.

Disarray on Election Day does more than inconvenience voters. In Baltimore, it has led to conspiracy theories about Republican judges in cahoots. In Prince George's, it has left people wondering why a close county executive race was left undecided for many hours. And in Montgomery, the outcomes of several races were affected.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) is right to call for the removal from office of Board of Elections President Nancy H. Dacek and Election Director Margaret Jurgensen as the first step in restoring integrity to the voting process. It is encouraging that a spokesman said Mr. Ehrlich, in a departure from the stance he took Tuesday, will work with both parties as well as the state board to ensure a better job is done in November. After all, with his name on the ballot, he too has a stake in the outcome.

Calif. Judge Slashes $61 Million FedEx Verdict (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 14, 2006

Calling an initial $61 million verdict "excessive," last week Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stephen Dombrink whittled down a jury award against national shipping company Federal Express and one of its managers to a modest $12.4 million.

In his written decision, Dombrink stated concern that the evidence failed to support the initial verdict in an employment discrimination case.

"The harassment was mostly just offensive name-calling," Dombrink noted in his Sept. 5 ruling.

In June, the jury handed the $61 million award to two Lebanese-American FedEx drivers who accused a manager of racial discrimination and harassment. The verdict was thought to be the largest single civil rights judgment under California's Fair Employment and Housing Act and the fourth-largest verdict of any kind in Alameda County history.

Plaintiffs attorney Christopher Dolan said last week that he was still reviewing the decision and had not yet decided whether to seek a new trial. Though clearly disappointed by the outcome, Dolan said Dombrink's handling of the issue was "deliberate and thoughtful. I think Judge Dombrink has exercised what he thought to be in the best interest of justice."

Whatever happens on appeal, Dolan said he hopes the initial award continues to send a message to the business community that Arab-Americans will not tolerate harassment in the workplace.

"While this verdict was reduced to $12 million, the next one may not [be]. We hope the clear message isn't diluted by the reduction, and I don't think it should be," he said.

Darin Snyder, head of O'Melveny & Myers' San Francisco office, returned a call for FedEx attorney Debra Belaga and said the firm is proud of its attorneys. Seyfarth Shaw also represented FedEx at trial.

In addition to reducing the award against the shipping company, Dombrink slashed the damages against FedEx manager Stacy Shoun from $1 million to $400,000.

"We look forward to having it reduced even further by the Court of Appeal," said Howard, Rice, Nemerovski, Canady, Falk & Rabkin attorney Bobbie Wilson.

Why Race-based 'Survivor' Makes Us Squirm (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Millions of Americans tonight will watch different races fight for supremacy over a patch of land. No, this is not the latest installment of an Adolf Eichmann production. It is this season's CBS Survivor: Cook Islands.

With a ratings fall from a high of 29.8 million in 2001 to 16.6 million last year, the show's producers are clearly looking for something to captivate more viewers. To do so, they decided to try a TV version of divide and conquer: Fuel the racial identification of viewers, pit them against other races and reap the benefits of racial pride — or racial animus.

Not surprisingly, this year's reality-show theme produced an orgy of condemnations — and, for the producers, a steady stream of free publicity. Of course, denouncing TV producers as craven, ratings-seeking deviates is hardly news. Most executives would make the Rape of Nanking into a reality program if they could avoid Federal Communications Commission fines, throw in bikinis, and capture an additional share of the critical 25-54 demographic age group.

The problem is that this is a reality program that is far too real for our sensibilities. Despite decades of affirmative action, we remain a highly race-conscious society with highly segregated neighborhoods, schools, prisons and — yes — entertainment. More important, the 6-year-old show reflects a growing return to segregationist policies across the country.

Survivor's producers insist that the use of racially segregated teams is designed to boost minority participation and possible success in the show. Moreover, Mark Burnett, executive producer of the show, has said, "I've learned that the social time you spend is predominantly in your own ethnic group."

That rationale is being used in public schools. Arguing that segregation helps minorities perform, states have introduced schools segregated by race, gender and even sexual orientation.

Survivor is embracing a "separate but equal" policy that was the scourge of the civil rights movement, ultimately rejected by the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education. It is now the solution to everything from low school scores to low self-esteem — and apparently low ratings.

Just as producers feel comfortable with segregation, so do legislators. Congress effectively embraced the doctrine in a 2004 law that allows gender-segregated schools to receive federal funds so long as equal opportunities are made available at other schools. The Nebraska Legislature created three school districts in Omaha designed along racial lines with whites, Hispanics and blacks receiving their own districts.

Other states are experimenting with micro-segregation on the individual school or class levels. Recently, Chicago created the Urban Prep Charter Academy for Young Men, a school described as an "all-boys high school to primarily serve black youths."

In addition to racially segregated schools, there are also more than 200 single-sex educational programs, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. New York has five all-girl and three all-boy public schools. Many states, such as Wisconsin, will soon offer not only a segregated high school for girls but also segregated classes in co-ed schools.

The new segregation extends beyond matters of race and gender. New York created the Harvey Milk High School for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students. The courts prevented the city from creating a special school for the Jewish Hasidic community after parents said the children, who were also disabled, experienced "panic, fear and trauma" in public schools because of their different appearance and beliefs.

These schools are sometimes defended as purely voluntary and open to all students — though their purpose and de facto segregation is undeniable. The fact is that these schools affect relatively few students, but they offer appealing images for systems that have failed to address low scores, homophobia and crime.

There is no evidence such segregation leads to significantly higher scores. Any benefit is more likely because of increased money and smaller classes afforded to the students — not some comfort zone created through racial or gender segregation. The research used to support these programs has been challenged as stereotypes dressed up as science. Segregation at the Young Women's Leadership Charter School in Chicago was defended on the basis that it fosters "sisterhood" and that girls can "roll out of bed without worrying about makeup (and) hair," among other benefits.

Given these growing programs, the segregation of Cook Islands is hardly a surprise. We are voting gay students, girls and other groups "off the island" to leave the appearance of tranquility and progress.

Yet, our schools are often the last opportunity for society to monitor and shape future citizens. They were once viewed as ideal forums to reinforce our values of pluralism and tolerance — a managed microcosm of society where students learn to interact with the other races and gender.

DOJ_NMG_0063075

Integration themes, however, are not drawing much of a crowd on TV or in society. ABC recently scrapped the reality show Welcome to the Neighborhood, in which various minority groups competed for a house in a conservative white neighborhood.

Ironically, while shows such as The Simple Life appear tediously manufactured, CBS found a theme that resonates with our most base, racist tendencies. The fact is that Cook Islands is repellant not because it looks too little, but too much, like our society. It is a reality that many are likely to watch, but few want to recognize.

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Chief Takes Hands-off Approach To Apple (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The Justice Department's antitrust chief on Wednesday made a case for taking a hands-off approach to Apple Inc.'s (AAPL) iTunes music service and iPod music device, which are dominant in the online music business.

He also offered an implicit criticism of European governments that want the iPod player and iTunes music to be compatible with rival products. In June, French lawmakers approved government-backed legislation aimed at forcing Apple to make its online music and its iPod "interoperable" with other products. Regulators in Norway and Sweden have threatened to impose fines if interoperability isn't made possible.

"Apple provides a useful illustration of how an attack on intellectual-property rights can threaten dynamic innovation," Thomas O. Barnett, who heads the Justice Department's antitrust division, said in the text of a speech in which he also noted that he's not investigating Apple's activities.

The music industry has in recent years been hit hard by the illegal downloading of music from the Internet, but the success of Apple's iTunes has boosted the sale of legal downloads and led to forecasts from the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, a trade body, that recorded-music sales will grow in 2006. The concern across Europe is that Apple's products have too much dominance.

"While it is true that Apple's digital-rights-management software ensures that the first recording of a song downloaded from iTunes can only play on an Apple device, consumers can re-record an iTunes song in an MP3 format and play it on other devices; in sum, it is hardly clear that they are locked in," Barnett said.

His remarks came as European regulators traveled to the U.S. to address audiences here, providing U.S. politicians with an opportunity to push back. Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., who co-chairs an intellectual property caucus, in prepared remarks cited "grave concern" about European regulatory tactics, and he complained that forcing Apple to "hand over" its intellectual property would damp future innovation.

Barnett rejected complaints that Apple harmed consumers by selling expensive iPods that lock them in to buying the same costly devices in the future.

"This type of business model has been criticized in the past because the cheap product was the one that was sold first - think cheap razors and expensive replacement blades or cheap printers and expensive replacement ink," Barnett said. "Apple's model is the opposite: consumers buy the expensive iPod device first, then have the option - not the obligation - to use the free iTunes software and buy the cheap iTunes songs."

He also batted down criticisms that Apple is hurting competitors. "Antitrust law protects competition, not competitors," Barnett said. "There are real costs to using antitrust law to protect competitors rather than competition. There is the problem of deterring innovation by the target of the 'dominance' attack: if a firm knows it will have to share its intellectual property or be managed by a committee of government regulators, it may not innovate in the first instance."

Barnett's remarks come as the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission hold a series of hearings dealing with control of the markets by individual firms. He has said that while individual firms with monopoly power can harm consumers, "mere size" doesn't demonstrate harm.

Barnett was confirmed earlier this year after serving as acting head of the antitrust division since June 2005. His confirmation had reportedly been blocked for months by two Republican senators concerned that he would be too tough on mergers.

Airlines Disclose Settlements In Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063076

CHICAGO (AP) — United Airlines and American Airlines disclosed settlements Wednesday in a class-action lawsuit stemming from an investigation into alleged price collusion among carriers in the air cargo industry.

Unlike Lufthansa AG, which said Monday it would pay $85 million to settle pending lawsuits in the case, both U.S. carriers said they are not required to make any payments.

The settlements could close the books on their obligations in the case barring further findings. Officials at both American and United, the largest two U.S. airlines, said that if the Justice Department later brings charges against them as a result of its investigation, the settlements would be off.

More than a dozen airlines have been the subject of an investigation initiated by U.S. and European Union officials into suspected price-fixing in the air cargo industry on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance.

Investigators were quoted earlier this year as saying the surcharges apparently originated among European carriers, with U.S. companies then setting their own charges in line with competitors. For carriers to be hit with criminal charges, prosecutors would have to show they were actively conspiring, not just following others' price increases.

A Justice Department spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Tim Smith, a spokesman for Fort Worth, Texas-based American, a unit of AMR Corp., said the carrier had been swept into an investigation that appeared centered on European airlines.

"We do have a settlement with some of the plaintiffs, subject to court approval," he said. "It requires no payment at all by American, and we have been told we are not a target of the investigation."

American would not be forced to change its cargo-pricing policies, Smith said.

Neither American nor United, a unit of UAL Corp., disclosed details of the settlements.

"We are pleased to have reached an agreement with a majority of plaintiffs that will see us dismissed from the civil litigation, pending court approval," said spokesman Brandon Borrman of Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based United, the No. 2 U.S. carrier.

The Financial Times reported Wednesday that Virgin Atlantic Airways also had reached a settlement in the case. The London-based carrier did not respond to a telephone message.

The overall settlement could cost the involved airlines more than $1 billion, according to the newspaper, citing attorneys for the plaintiffs.

House Panel Deals Wright Bill A Setback (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy And Emily Ramshaw, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 14, 2006

Committee removes antitrust safeguards; backers discuss ways to protect measure from court disputes

Following a setback in a House committee, North Texas lawmakers were plotting Wednesday evening to reinstate language to protect their Wright amendment legislation from potentially crippling court challenges.

The House Judiciary Committee dealt the latest challenge to the effort to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, removing a phrase that would have immunized the agreement from antitrust claims.

Supporters of the deal remained hopeful they could recover through legislative maneuvers in coming weeks. But given a short legislative calendar and sustained Senate opposition, the outcome remains uncertain.

"I don't think it's a death knell for it," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell. "It's certainly going to make for a lot of discussion between Dallas and Fort Worth and the other parties. Now they're going to have to decide what's really important and what they can live with."

Proponents of the legislation characterized Wednesday's actions as progress even though they opposed the change.

"The process is moving forward," said Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American Airlines. "There are still several steps to determine which version of the bill ultimately gets voted on."

The Wright legislation can now proceed down other avenues after sitting under the control of the Judiciary Committee since late July.

The panel's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and its top Democrat, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, pushed through an amendment removing language that would have effectively exempted the measure from antitrust challenges in court.

Several lawmakers had objected to the language, saying it skirted century-old laws protecting consumers from anticompetitive practices.

Mr. Sensenbrenner said the deal "raises serious competitive concerns" by reducing the number of available gates at Love Field and discouraging Southwest Airlines from using Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

He said the antitrust issues should be litigated in court rather than be sidestepped by Congress in a private agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0063077

The amendment, which passed by a voice vote, drew objections from a handful of lawmakers who warned that the amendment would effectively kill the bill.

"As a practical matter, it's the Wright amendment that's anti-consumer and anti-competition," said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. "If we adopt this amendment, we will litigate this thing for the next 10 or 15 years."

The legislation would implement a June agreement by Dallas and Fort Worth, D/FW Airport, American and Southwest to repeal the 27-year-old Wright law in 2014. It would immediately allow one-stop flights anywhere in the U.S. as long as they stopped in the nine-state Wright perimeter.

The agreement also would cut the number of gates available at Love from 32 to 20, a move intended to compensate for an expected increase in traffic, noise and pollution at the inner-city airport. Nineteen gates are now operational.

How the debate started

The antitrust debate – stemming in part from the gate reduction – was sparked by lobbyists representing Love Terminal Partners L.P., owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal. The six-gate facility, which has been largely unused for six years, would be demolished under the agreement.

The group has already sued the parties in federal court under antitrust laws, saying it lost out on a $100 million deal for its terminal because of the agreement.

It remains to be seen whether the five parties to the North Texas compromise would be willing to accept legislation without some kind of antitrust protection.

The groups agreed last week to remove the explicit exemption from competition laws – the words that the judiciary committee removed Wednesday – if other protective language could be added. But no other protections were placed in the legislation. In fact, the committee's change Wednesday said nothing in the legislation "shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws."

What's next for bill

Fort Worth Mayor Mike Moncrief said the setback, while anticipated, is frustrating after working so long and hard to "delicately forge the agreement."

He's waiting to hear from the other North Texas parties before he decides how to proceed. "I think we can still get this ball over the goal line," he said.

The legislation next needs to clear a rules committee that decides how amendments can be introduced on the House floor.

The change by the House Judiciary Committee also puts the House version at odds with the Senate version, which has slowed due to concerns from leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Lawmakers ultimately could focus on a Senate version of the bill that has passed its originating committee there but hasn't been amended further. The goal would be to secure passage in the full Senate, allowing the bill to then move to the full House.

Legislation that passes the House and Senate separately with different language generally goes through a joint conference committee to reconcile changes. The step can be time-consuming for legislation that isn't a top priority by the leaders of each chamber.

On Capitol Hill late Wednesday, lawmakers and other proponents of the agreement discussed whether the House bill would need the original antitrust protection reinstated or new language, or whether it could be accepted with the judiciary committee's changes.

D/FW chief operating officer Kevin Cox said the original language would protect the parties from "any and all frivolous claims thinly veiled under the guise of an antitrust claim."

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said the five North Texas parties have "checked in with each other" at every step along the way to make sure they're comfortable with the language of the agreement.

"Right now, we're still fine," she said. "But if we get to a point where anyone says 'We can't live with that,' then there's no agreement."

She said she's confident that won't happen because the North Texas delegation is so aligned.

Southwest spokeswoman Beth Harbin said Wednesday's action was "good news for consumers" because the judiciary committee approved repealing Wright without altering key provisions of the local agreement.

"Those who feel the local solution is anticompetitive should consider the alternative, which is continuing to live under the Wright amendment where no one benefits," she said.

The Wright agreement faces a tight legislative window, complicating passage by the Dec. 31 deadline outlined in the compromise.

House members plan to return home by early next month to campaign for the November elections. The measure could resurface during a lame-duck session after the election, but then it would face more procedural hurdles. Sens. John Cornyn and

Kay Bailey Hutchison met Wednesday evening with the ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., to address concerns about the antitrust issue.

House Strips Antitrust Immunity From Wright Agreement (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A U.S. House panel stripped antitrust protections before moving forward Wednesday with legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights from Dallas Love Field after eight years.

The House Judiciary Committee, after brief debate, pushed through a bill modeled after an agreement that would eventually repeal the Wright Amendment and eliminate some gates at Dallas Love Field.

The agreement was forged by Love-based Southwest Airlines, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Dallas Fort Worth International Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. American, based in Fort Worth, has a major hub at DFW.

The bill endorsed Wednesday no longer includes wording that stated the agreement complies with anti-competition laws and gave the Department of Transportation sole authority to decide claims against the arrangement.

Those provisions were opposed by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. He said the claims should be decided by the courts.

"The antitrust laws are there for a purpose," Sensenbrenner said. "They are working, and there should not be legislative determination about what is or is not anticompetitive. The standard antitrust standards that have been applied to commercial arrangements for over 100 years should be applied to this one as well."

An unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division and made public last month said the bill would violate antitrust laws, although the department has not taken an official position.

The agreement calls for shrinking the number of gates at Love Field from 32 to 20, which some argue could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. Only 19 of the 32 gates are currently being used.

Last month, another House committee approved the agreement with the antitrust immunity provision included. House leaders and the Rules Committee will decide which version goes to the floor and whether to allow amendments.

California Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., surprised Democratic colleagues in opposing Sensenbrenner's amendment because of her pro-consumer record. Lofgren said the existing arrangement is worse on consumers. Under the Wright Amendment, Southwest can only fly from Love Field to eight nearby states.

If it isn't passed into law, the agreement expires at the end of the year. It was reached after Southwest Airlines launched a fierce lobbying effort to repeal the 1979 Wright Amendment, named for its author former House Speaker Jim Wright.

The issue split Texas Republicans in the House, although most now support the agreement.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, has taken the lead in trying to pass the legislation. She is sponsoring the bill in the Senate, where the agreement also has raised concerns over whether it violates anticompetition laws.

She had anticipated the House action Tuesday and said she would continue to try to move her bill in the Senate. She also has attached the bill to the transportation spending bill.

Love Field Agreement May Lose Antitrust Protection (BLOOM)

By John Hughesand Mary Schlangenstein, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, September 14, 2006

An agreement between South-west Airlines Co. and American Airlines on service at Love Field in Dallas may face antitrust challenges, possibly scuttling the deal, under a bill approved on Wednesday by a House committee.

The House Judiciary Committee proposal would eliminate antitrust immunity for the carriers under the agreement and let the Justice Department bring any actions it deems necessary.

The committee, which met in Washington, approved the bill after striking the immunity. American is the world's largest airline, while Southwest is the biggest U.S. discount carrier.

The agreement may be ineffective without the immunity, said Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala. "We will litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years," he told colleagues on the panel. "It will be tied up in court."

Southwest, based in Dallas, has 96 percent of passengers at Love Field. A 1979 federal law known as the Wright Amendment limits nonstop flights from the airport to Texas and eight nearby states.

DOJ_NMG_0063079

AMR Corp.'s American and Southwest reached the agreement in June to remove that restriction in eight years and let Southwest immediately connect passengers from Love Field to airports throughout the U.S.

The House committee's proposal "doesn't appear to be a deal breaker," Ed Stewart, a Southwest spokesman, said in an interview. "The important thing is that this is another step toward what we were wanting in the first place, giving customers more choice."

Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American, declined to comment on whether the version approved by the House committee would sink the agreement. The airline is based in Fort Worth, Texas.

"There are more steps to go before we know what's ultimately going to happen," Wagner said. Differences in versions approved by the House Judiciary Committee and the House transportation panel will have to be ironed out, he said.

Rivals, including JetBlue Airways Corp. and Northwest Airlines Corp., raised concerns about the agreement, which cuts the number of available gates at Love Field to 20 from 32.

House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., citing the competitive concerns, asserted his committee's right to review the legislation after it cleared the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee on July 19. Sensenbrenner was one of the sponsors of the proposal to strike the antitrust immunity. That change was approved by a voice vote of his committee.

"Antitrust principles are necessary to preserve competition," said Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., who co-sponsored the change. Northwest has a major flight hub at Detroit Metro Airport, near Conyers' district.

The Consumer Federation of America and the Consumers Union said in a letter to the House Judiciary Committee that the carriers' agreement is "designed to protect market share for Ameri-can and Southwest Airlines."

The Love Field agreement came after a two-year battle in Congress between Southwest, seeking to scrap the Wright Amendment, and American, trying to preserve it. The compromise was crafted by the two carriers, the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, and Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport, where American has its main flight base.

The Wright Amendment was intended to protect the Dallas-Fort Worth airport as the major airfield in northern Texas, while allowing Southwest to remain at Love Field.

Before the bill could become law, it would need to pass in the full House and Senate, then be reconciled in a House-Senate conference committee and sent to the president for his signature.

Wright Bill Advances (DALBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 14, 2006

A U.S. House panel on Wednesday moved forward a bill modeled after the local Wright compromise, but not before stripping the document of antitrust protections, The Associated Press reported.

The House Judiciary Committee removed wording that protected the bill from antitrust legal challenges, The AP said.

The bill is based on an agreement forged by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines (NYSE: AMR), Southwest Airlines (NYSE: LUV) and the Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport that calls for a repeal of Wright Amendment restrictions in eight years.

In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there from 32 to 20. Fort Worth-based American and Dallas-based Southwest both accepted that compromise, which is being debated in Congress.

The Wright Amendment is a 1979 federal law that limits trips from Dallas Love Field to short-haul flights to a few surrounding or nearby states.

An unsigned memo purportedly from the Justice Department's antitrust division began circulating shortly after the bill was introduced. The letter expressed concerns that the bill violates antitrust laws and should not be approved by Congress.

Last month a group of antitrust professors from law schools in Texas and elsewhere said in a letter to congressional leaders that the Dallas-Fort Worth deal to end Wright Amendment flight restrictions will result in higher fares and reduced service for Dallas-Fort Worth fliers.

Tuesday, D/FW Airport put out a letter written by antitrust law experts that refuted the professors' statements by saying an outright repeal of the Wright Amendment has never happened and would face too many challenges.

House Strips Antitrust Immunity From Wright Agreement (FWST)

By Maria Recio

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House Judiciary Committee quickly and decisively removed antitrust protections from the Wright Amendment legislation on a voice vote this morning.

Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., joined by the ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., proposed an amendment that removes the antitrust immunity in the bill and inserts additional language reinforcing that nothing in the law governing Dallas Love Field "shall modify, impair, or supersede the operation of the antitrust laws."

"What this amendment does is state that the antitrust aspects will be litigated," Sensenbrenner said. "What we're saying is that the antitrust laws are there for a purpose."

Conyers, joining the chairman in an unusual show of bipartisanship, said, "I'm not here to say the agreement is pro-competitive or anti-competitive."

Rather, he said, he was also supporting the antitrust laws as the protector of consumers. "For more than a century, the antitrust laws have been the cornerstone of preserving our free-market economy."

Rep. Spencer Bachus, R-Ala., warned that if the amendment remained in the bill, "We'll litigate this thing for the next 10 to 15 years."

Bachus, who said he sympathized philosophically with the chairman, said he thought Congress ought to support the local agreement reached by Fort Worth, Dallas, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport. "This amendment is going to put it in the courts and do away with an agreement that I didn't think could ever be made," he said.

But Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., countered that the agreement in force during litigation would be the one reached by the cities – allowing immediate through-ticketing, reducing the gates to 20 from 32 and eliminating the restrictions in eight years – giving consumers benefits of lower airfares.

An unexpected supporter of the Wright Amendment agreement was Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., who said Congress refusing to support the deal as written "may fail opening the market at all."

The vote is a victory for Love Terminal Partners, which has waged a campaign against the antitrust language after filing a $100 million suit for the loss of gates at Love Field.

But the fight for the Wright Amendment is far from over. It will now shift to the House leadership and the House Rules Committee, which will have to mediate between the bill approved by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee and the one modified by the House Judiciary Committee.

Wright Amendment supporters are in key spots: Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas, is a member of the rules committee; House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, R-Arlington, is influential with the leadership and Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, is close to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Hedge Fund Gets Antitrust OK For McDonald's Investment (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - An activist hedge fund has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission for a previously announced plan to buy nearly $794 million of McDonald's Corp. stock.

In a Sept. 1 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Oak Brook, Ill., fast-food chain said New York-based Pershing Square Capital Management LP had informed the company of plans to acquire more than $793.8 million of McDonald's stock, through three investment funds.

The FTC said Wednesday that it granted early termination on Tuesday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law.

The purchase would amount to less than a 2 percent stake but would still make Pershing one of McDonald's top institutional shareholders.

Last year, Pershing controlled 4.9 percent of McDonald's shares. It publicly pressured the company to spin off about 65 percent of its company-owned restaurants as part of an effort to boost its stock price. McDonald's met with William Ackman, Pershing's manager partner, but resisted.

Pershing Square sold all of its remaining McDonald's shares in the second quarter.

Shares of McDonald's closed Wednesday down 36 cents, or 0.9 percent, at $37.84 on the New York Stock Exchange.

EU Fines 14 Companies For Price Fixing Road Bitumen (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 14, 2006

BRUSSELS (MarketWatch) -- The European Commission Wednesday fined 14 companies EUR266.717 million for fixing prices of bitumen, a tar used in road construction.

Regulators found that eight suppliers and six purchasers participated in a cartel in the Netherlands from 1994 to 2002.

The commission granted BP PLC (BP) full immunity for cooperating in the investigation. In contrast, it doubled Royal Dutch Shell NV's (RDSA) fine to EUR108 million as a repeat offender.

DOJ_NMG_0063081

"We should not have attended these meetings and we regret our involvement in this case," President-Director Rein Willems of Shell Nederland BV said in a statement.

The cartel fines represent the seventh largest ever levied by EU regulators and underline their determination to fight cartels. Companies are liable to up to 10% of their worldwide turnover if they participate, but they can appeal all decisions to the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg.

In 2001, the commission imposed fines of EUR790 million on a vitamin cartel. Last year, it imposed fines of EUR388 million on a hydrogen peroxide cartel and EUR344 million on an acrylic glass cartel.

"The result of the cartel was the price of bitumen was higher than it otherwise would have been," said E.U. antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd. Although bitumen is a "small market" Todd said the "fine is very high comparatively, because "very large companies were involved, the cartel lasted for a time and that it was a very serious infringement." In addition, some companies were "repeat offenders" and some "obstructed our investigation."

He said similar probes were ongoing in both the Belgian and Spanish bitumen markets.

BP was granted full immunity from a fine, which would otherwise have been EUR30.78 million, while Kuwait Petroleum Corp. had its fine reduced by 30% to EUR16.6 million. Shell, Total SA (TOT) and Nynas, also claimed a reduction of the fine, but failed to qualify. Shell's fine was upped by 50% because it had participated in other similar cartels, the commission said. Total was fined EUR20.25 million and Nynas EUR13.5 million.

None of the construction companies applied for leniency. Ballast Nedam, which was fined EUR4.65 million, first joined the cartel in 1996, when it became a major road builder in the Netherlands. Wintershall AG, fined EUR11.6 million, sold its bitumen business to BP at the end of 1999.

Others bitumen suppliers fined were Esha, EUR11.5 million and Kockner & Co. AG (KCO.XE), EUR10 million. Bitumen buyers fined include Ballast Nedam NV (33654.AE), EUR4.65 million, Dura Vermeer NV, EUR5.4 million, Heijmans NV (34193.AE), EUR17.1 million, Holladsche Beton Groep NV, EUR7.2 million, Koninklijke Groep BAM NV (33731.AE), EUR13.5 million and Koninklijke Volker Wessels Stevin NV, EUR27.36 million.

In its statement, the commission said Volker Wessels Stevin had obstructed its probe, refusing commission investigators access to its facilities.

Europe had a long history of tolerating price-fixing, dating back to medieval guilds, analysts say. In the Netherlands, cartels were legal until 1996.

But that tolerance is fast disappearing. The EU's antitrust commissioner Neelie Kroes has vowed to be a "whistle blower" and to show "zero tolerance" toward cartels.

Ironically, though, she served on the supervisory board of Ballast Nedam during the period in which the offense took place. In a statement, she said she had recused herself from the investigation and that the company's supervisory board learned about the investigation only in 2004, shortly before she left to become competition commissioner. She refrained from voting on the fines at Wednesday's commission meeting.

Bitumen, a by-product of fuel production, is mainly used to make asphalt, binding other road surfacing materials together. This cartel covered all bitumen used for road construction in the Netherlands, a market valued around EUR62 million in 2002.

In June 2002, BP applied to the commission for immunity from fines. In October 2002, the commission carried out inspections of various bitumen suppliers and road constructors. It sent statements of objections in October 2004. A hearing was held in June 2005.

The evidence showed that from at least 1994 to 2002, a delegation of the bitumen suppliers met with the six biggest road construction companies in the Netherlands in a series of meetings, called the "bitumen consultation" or "bitumenoverleg," the commission said. These meetings were usually preceded by preparatory meetings of the suppliers and separate preparatory meetings of the six biggest road construction companies.

In the joint meetings, participants fixed the gross price of road bitumen to be invoiced to the asphalt production plants and two rebates for the construction companies that own these asphalt production plants. A uniform minimum rebate for the road construction companies that were part of the cartel and a lower maximum rebate for other road construction companies that weren't part of the cartel. The latter therefore had to pay higher prices.

The construction companies participating in the cartel appeared not to be particularly concerned about the absolute level of the price of bitumen, as long as they received larger discounts than their smaller competitors, the commission said. This caused the price level of bitumen in the Netherlands, even after the discounts granted to the large road builders, to gradually rise above that in neighboring countries, the commission added.

ImClone Goes Up Against Patent Dispute (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, September 14, 2006

More bad news could be looming for ImClone Systems, the biotech maker at the heart of the Martha Stewart stock scandal.

A federal judge is expected to rule, possibly within weeks, on a bitter patent dispute affecting ImClone's sole product, cancer drug Erbitux.

One Wall Street biotech analyst, Citigroup's Yaron Werber, has predicted defendants ImClone and Aventis Pharmaceuticals will lose the dispute. That could cost ImClone tens of millions of dollars a year, delivering an 8% to 24% hit to net income.

The patent dispute — argued over a 10-day trial that ended in July in an often-packed Manhattan courtroom — pits former colleagues, friends and two giants of science against each other: Michael Sela, 82, a co-developer of multiple sclerosis drug Copaxone, and Joseph Schlessinger, 61, who testified he had been nominated for a Nobel Prize and that, for the last decade, he's been among the top 20 most-cited scientists in the world.

The patent dispute goes back 20 years and centers on who invented the idea of using a certain antibody, such as Erbitux, in combination with a chemotherapy drug to slow the growth of cancer tumors: Schlessinger and his colleagues or Sela and his colleagues.

Aventis owns the patent, which lists Schlessinger as its first named inventor. ImClone licensed the exclusive rights to the patent in 1994 even before it was approved.

The plaintiff, Israel's Yeda Research and Development, alleges that three scientists, including Sela, from Israel's famed Weizmann Institute of Science are the true inventors. Yeda, which commercializes inventions of Weizmann scientists, alleges Schlessinger — during a chance conversation with one of Sela's colleagues — volunteered to supply them with an ingredient to do the experiments.

ImClone and Aventis say Schlessinger and his colleagues had already conceived of the patent claims before that conversation and that he simply asked the Sela colleague to test the idea in routine experiments.

After the experiments, Yeda says, Schlessinger submitted a paper about them to a corporate predecessor of Aventis, where he worked while on sabbatical from Weizmann. The company started to pursue the patent. Schlessinger was listed as one of six paper authors; Sela was the primary.

“I was in a state of shock,” Sela testified, when he first saw the patent in 2002. Sela said he had thought of Schlessinger as a friend and protégé until “the bad moment,” according to a transcript of the trial. In an interview, Sela described Schlessinger as an excellent scientist but added, “I have trouble with his ethics.”

Schlessinger testified that he would never have asked the Weizmann scientists to do the experiments had he suspected they would seek co-inventorship.

“This is a clear example of greed,” Schlessinger said in an interview. “They woke up after many years when they realized all the money involved.”

Schlessinger, chair of the department of pharmacology at the Yale University School of Medicine, says he receives no payment for the so-called 866 patent (the name comes from the last three numbers of the seven-numeral patent number). He described the work around the patent as “Stone Age” vs. what he's doing now.

ImClone, in a court filing, said that three of the seven authors on the 866 patent should be deleted because they had nothing to do with its claims. Yeda says the other four, including Schlessinger, should be deleted, too.

“This is a case about a mistake,” plaintiff's attorney Nicholas Groombridge of Weil Gotshal & Manges said in court. “The question before the court is not whether the inventorship is wrong, but how wrong is the inventorship.”

Like Schlessinger, ImClone and Aventis claim Yeda is challenging the patent now because Erbitux is hitting big money. It is one of the few cancer therapies that attack cancer cells but not healthy cells as does chemotherapy.

The Food and Drug Administration approved Erbitux in 2004 to treat colorectal cancers and later for head and neck cancer.

If Yeda gets partial or sole patent ownership, it could demand a “king's ransom” from ImClone, the defendants said in a post-trial brief.

Citigroup analyst Werber estimates ImClone pays Aventis royalties of 2% to 3%, based on Erbitux sales, for the patent license.

Werber says the most likely outcome is that Yeda emerges as a co-owner of the patent and ImClone pays an extra 1% to 2% royalty. If Erbitux's sales were $1.3 billion in 2008, Werber says, that would cut ImClone's net income by $10 million to $20 million, or 8% to 16%.

It is less likely that Yeda will win the patent outright, Werber says. If so, the defendants say it could try to forbid ImClone from marketing Erbitux in combination with a chemotherapy drug, which is most often the case for colorectal cancer.

Whatever the outcome, ImClone says, shipments of Erbitux won't be affected. Any decision by the U.S. District Court judge is likely to be tied up in appeals for years, says ImClone spokesman David Pitts.

What's more, it's in the financial interests of Yeda, if named to the patent, to keep Erbitux sales growing, says Werber.

The Weizmann scientists say money isn't the issue — honor is. "I'm not keen on a patent unless it is stolen from me," Sela said.

Schlessinger says he is offended by such accusations.

Yeda alleges the Weizmann scientists didn't learn that a patent application may have been filed until 2000 when Sela received a request from ImClone for notebooks related to the work. The patent was issued in 2001. When Yeda and Sela sought more information, they say, ImClone cut off communication. In her ruling dismissing ImClone's request for summary judgment, Judge Naomi Buchwald characterized ImClone as stonewalling Yeda.

The case marks ImClone's second high-drama courtroom appearance. In 2003, its founder, Sam Waksal, was sentenced to prison in a scandal in which he was accused of trying to sell ImClone shares knowing the FDA was about to reject ImClone's Erbitux application.

By the time Erbitux received FDA approval, Waksal was in jail and Stewart was soon to be sentenced.

The patent case isn't the only cloud over ImClone. In August, it said it would remain independent after failing to find a suitable buyer.

In a report after that announcement, WR Hambrecht biotech analyst Patrick Flanigan said the lack of compelling bids for the company suggests ImClone's fundamentals are deteriorating.

Among other things, he forecast declining Erbitux sales growth in the USA throughout 2007, in part because of new competition expected from rival Amgen.

Flanigan advised investors to "remain on the sidelines."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Assails Agency For Ethics Slide (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — The Interior Department's chief official responsible for investigating abuses and overseeing operations accused the top officials at the agency on Wednesday of tolerating widespread ethical failures, from cronyism to cover-ups of incompetence.

"Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," charged Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, at a hearing of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy.

"I have observed one instance after another when the good work of my office has been disregarded by the department," he continued. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials — taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias — have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.' "

The blistering attack was part of Mr. Devaney's report on what he called the Interior Department's "bureaucratic bungling" of oil and gas leases signed in the late 1990's, mistakes that are now expected to cost the government billions of dollars but were covered up for six years.

While these leases were the specific focus of the hearing, Mr. Devaney directed most of his criticism at what he called a broader organizational culture at the Interior Department of denial and "defending the indefensible."

He expressed particular fury at the willingness to dismiss two dozen potential ethical lapses by J. Steven Griles, a former industry lobbyist who served as deputy secretary of the interior during President Bush's first term.

Mr. Griles resigned after allegations surfaced that he pushed policy decisions that favored some of his former oil and gas industry clients and that he tried to steer a $2 million contract to a technology firm that had also been one of his clients.

In a 145-page report in 2004, the inspector general described Mr. Griles as a "train wreck waiting to happen." But on Wednesday, Mr. Devaney said he was appalled that the Interior Department's office of ethics dismissed 23 out of 25 potential ethical breaches against Mr. Griles and that Gale A. Norton, then secretary of the interior, decided not to act on the two remaining allegations.

Mr. Griles is once again a lobbyist in Washington. Efforts to reach Mr. Griles on Wednesday evening at his lobbying firm, Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles, were unsuccessful.

Mr. Devaney said that case was typical of a much broader "culture of managerial irresponsibility and lack of accountability" in the top reaches of the Interior Department.

DOJ_NMG_0063084

"I have unfortunately watched a number of high-level Interior officials leave the department under the cloud of O.I.G. investigations," Mr. Devaney said, referring to the Office of Inspector General.

"Absent criminal charges, however, they are sent off in the usual fashion, with a party paying tribute to their good service and the secretary wishing them well, to spend more time with their family or seek new opportunities."

That was almost exactly what happened to Mr. Griles, who was never charged with any wrongdoing, though he admitted to using bad judgment in some cases.

Dirk Kempthorne, who succeeded Ms. Norton as interior secretary earlier this year, said Wednesday that he took the inspector general's allegations "very seriously" and had sent a letter to all employees on his first day at the department on the need to follow ethical guidelines.

Mr. Kempthorne declined to say what additional actions he might take until he saw Mr. Devaney's final report.

Mr. Devaney, a burly man who began his career as a police officer in Massachusetts, is no stranger to combative investigations or confrontations with top officials.

He spent more than 20 years as a special agent in the Secret Service, specializing in white-collar crime, eventually being put in charge of the service's fraud division. In the 1990's, he became director of criminal enforcement at the Environmental Protection Agency.

He was named inspector general at the Interior Department in 1999, just as whistle-blowers outside the government were pressing huge lawsuits alleging that oil companies were fraudulently underpaying royalties.

Three years ago, Mr. Devaney scathingly criticized the Interior Department's auditing program for oil and gas royalties.

Beyond finding that investigators had missed millions of dollars in underpayments, his office uncovered evidence that agency auditors had lost key files, then tried to fool investigators by forging and backdating the missing documents. In an acid rebuke of the agency, Mr. Devaney noted that the agency gave a bonus to the official who came up with the false papers.

Mr. Devaney's broadside against the Interior Department's culture dovetailed with his tentative conclusions in his most recent investigation, into how the department had managed to sign 1,100 leases for offshore drilling that inadvertently let energy companies escape billions of dollars in royalties on gas and oil produced in the Gulf of Mexico.

The leases, signed in 1998 and 1999 during the Clinton administration, allow companies to escape normal federal royalties — usually 12.5 percent of sales — on the tens of millions of barrels of oil on each lease.

The royalty break was intended as an incentive for deepwater drilling, but it was also supposed to end if oil prices climbed above a "threshold" level of about $34 a barrel. The leases at issue omitted that restriction, and department officials kept quiet about their mistake for six years after they discovered it.

The problem was first disclosed by The New York Times in March. Government officials now estimate that the mistake could cost the Treasury as much as $10 billion over the next decade.

"The Interior Department holds our natural resources in trust for the American people,'' said Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California and chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on energy and resources. "It squandered billions instead."

Mr. Devaney said the error, a result of compartmentalized thinking within the department, might have remained buried if senior officials had had their way.

"We do not have a 'smoking gun,' " Mr. Devaney said. "We do, however, have a very costly mistake which might never have been aired publicly absent The New York Times, the interest of this committee, the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and several other interested members of Congress."

River's Renewal A Step Closer (FRESNOB)

By Michael Doyle And Mark Grossi, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, September 14, 2006

Deal to be filed today would begin restoration around '09.

WASHINGTON — More water should start flowing down the San Joaquin River by around 2009 under a long-awaited settlement scheduled to be filed in Sacramento today.

By around 2013, salmon should be reintroduced to the river, which once teemed with them. Hundreds of millions of dollars would be spent on channel improvements and more, and a new "San Joaquin River restoration" administrator would oversee the complicated work.

The river restoration details, and myriad others that will change life in the San Joaquin Valley, have been worked out by farmers and environmentalists during months of negotiations. They are to be presented to a federal judge this morning in hopes of settling an 18-year-old lawsuit.

"To be able to come up with an agreement that parties on both sides can agree to is a monumental step to a healthy river," said Grant Davis, executive director of the San Francisco-based Bay Institute, one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. "Failure would not only harm the river, it would harm the San Joaquin Valley."

Davis declined to offer details of the settlement, which was described by others who had been briefed about the pending deal. The Justice Department only signed off on the agreement Monday night, participants said, and details were changing up until the last moment.

But even as environmental groups and their negotiating partners embrace the new deal, it's attracting flak on Capitol Hill and among some water users. Part of the agreement includes an apparent deadline for Congress to approve San Joaquin River restoration legislation: Dec. 31.

If the legislation substantively differs from what negotiators agreed to, at least one lawmaker said, the whole deal could fall apart.

"It's the other branches of government telling Congress, 'You're going to do this or else,'" said Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Visalia. "It's putting a gun to our head."

Nunes represents many of the farmers on the east side of the San Joaquin Valley who are served by water stored behind Friant Dam.

Farmers downstream on the west side of the Valley did not get enough protection in the settlement, said Steve Chedester, executive director of the San Joaquin River Exchange Contractors Water Authority. The authority represents farmers downstream of Firebaugh, near Los Banos.

Chedester said the restoration may put water down the old channel where valuable crops now grow. He said the route should be further studied, and a lot of funding will be needed if the old river is the preferred route.

"Our area will be the most expensive reach to restore," Chedester said.

Construction of Friant Dam in the 1940s helped fuel the Valley's agricultural growth but also dried up portions of the San Joaquin River in western Merced and Fresno counties.

Environmentalists filed suit in 1988 when Friant contracts came up for renewal. The case quickly turned to restoration of the salmon run in the early 1990s. The case swung toward environmentalists, and the two sides attempted — unsuccessfully — to negotiate a settlement.

With the long-running lawsuit unresolved, Rep. George Radanovich, R-Mariposa, and Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein last year began urging farmers and environmentalists led by the Natural Resources Defense Council and Bay Institute to strike a deal. Feinstein has agreed to introduce the legislation — dubbed by some the San Joaquin River Restoration Settlement Act — to authorize the various river fixes.

A draft of the proposed legislation authorizes the federal government to buy land from "willing sellers." All environmental laws must be complied with — a blow to some water agencies that were hoping for exemptions. Outside parties — such as the Merced Irrigation District — would not be allowed to sue if they're unhappy with how the settlement works.

The proposed legislation establishes a "San Joaquin River Restoration Fund," which would include California state bond money and federal funds. Friant water users would not pay any more than they already do, but a portion of payments they make under existing water contracts would be devoted to the new restoration fund.

As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Feinstein could attempt to attach the river bill to another, must-pass funding bill.

Radanovich, next week, plans to hold a hearing on the settlement, which would set a foundation for a House bill.

"I think if all the water districts in Friant support it, then so do I," Radanovich said.

The agreement would not automatically dissolve if the legislation misses the Dec. 31 deadline, said Friant Water Users Authority lawyer Dan Dooley. The Friant authority negotiates for 15,000 farmers who get water from Millerton Lake.

"It's more of a poison pill that offers the parties in the litigation the opportunity to void the agreement if the deadline is missed," Dooley said. "But both sides are aware that there is not a lot of time left this year." Michael Doyle reports from The Bee's Washington Bureau. Accord Reached On Diverting Water From Farms To Restore San Joaquin River (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 13 — For most of the last 60 years, much of the San Joaquin River has not really been a river. Dammed and drained for agricultural purposes in the arid Central Valley, the San Joaquin is dry for mile after mile, a symbol of the cost of progress and the miracles of modern irrigation.

DOJ_NMG_0063086

It has also been the subject of extensive litigation.

On Wednesday, a coalition of environmental and fishing groups announced the settlement of an 18-year-old suit against the Interior Department and a group of California water users, ending one of the longest-running environmental skirmishes.

The proposal, which Congress will vote on, would create a multimillion-dollar project to restore more than 150 miles of the San Joaquin to the lush riverbed it once was.

"This is one of the most important and historic restoration efforts in the West," said Hal Candee, a senior lawyer for the Natural Resources Defense Council, which filed the suit in the Reagan administration. "This is really bringing a dead river back to life."

Under the plan, announced in Sacramento, billions of gallons of water would eventually be released from Friant Dam, just north of Fresno, spilling into the historic river channels. The new flow, environmentalists and fishermen hope, will create a healthy environment for Chinook salmon, which once spawned — and thrived — in the San Joaquin.

In exchange for losing 15 percent to 20 percent of their yearly water, depending on rainfall, farmers and other long-term water users would be assured of a supply.

"For the next 20 years, we know what the water commitment is going to be, and that was important to us," said Ron Jacobsma, consulting general manager of the Friant Water Users Authority, which represents 22 water districts that span five counties.

Fed by downstream tributaries, the San Joaquin, the second-longest river in California, flows as it meets the Sacramento River east of San Francisco, forming an enormous delta that provides water to 22 million Californians. Since the 1940's, the upper reaches of the river, from Friant Dam to its convergence with the Merced River, have been siphoned off to water a million acres of crops through a vast irrigation project that has helped turn the Central Valley into one of the most prosperous agricultural regions.

The proposed restoration would carry a hefty price, with estimates from $250 million to $800 million, a cost that the federal government and state would probably share.

Some support seems to have been mustered. Mike Chrisman, secretary for state resources, signed off on the accord on Wednesday, as did Senator Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, and Representative George P. Radanovich, a Republican. Mr. Radanovich, who represents the Fresno region, said he would hold a hearing on the plan on Sept. 21.

After years of machinations and stalled negotiations, legal pressure on the government intensified in 2004, when a federal district judge in Sacramento, Lawrence K. Karlton, ruled in the environmentalists' favor, saying the California Fish and Game Code, which guarantees water to fisheries, could be applied to the federally owned Friant Dam.

Judge Karlton had set a trial date for earlier this year to consider remedies. But as that date approached, the two sides returned to the table to find a more nuanced middle ground.

"The judge had made statements along the lines of all he had was a meat cleaver," Mr. Jacobsma of the water users' authority said. "And what we needed was a scalpel."

Kirk Rodgers, a regional director for the Federal Bureau of Reclamation, said the project would "probably be unprecedented in terms of its magnitude and challenges."

"In some cases,'' Mr. Rodgers said, "you're going to have to define a channel through mechanical means. In some cases, you're going to have to build structures to put the water that's being diverted back in the channel. It's a very complicated and very ambitious project." Some water spilled into the riverbed would also be recirculated to farmers, he said.

A tentative timetable calls for water to be diverted to the river by 2009 or 2010. Fish would be introduced two or three years later, with most construction and physical restoration finished by 2016. The project, if approved, would run through 2026.

Decline In Winter Arctic Ice Linked To Greenhouse Gases (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The amount of ice being formed in the Arctic winter has declined sharply in the past two years, a finding that NASA climate researchers say significantly increases their confidence that greenhouse gases created by autos and industry are warming the Arctic and the globe.

For years, scientists have reported a steady decrease in summertime Arctic ice, but they had never before found a similar reduction in the amount of ice being created during the frigid and dark Arctic winter. This lack of effect on the Arctic winter was one flaw in the scientific models of global warming, which predicted a steady decrease in ice formation.

But a new paper by Josefino Comiso, a senior research scientist at NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, found precisely the reduction in wintertime ice over the past two years that the model had predicted. The past two winters each produced 6 percent less ice than the average amount measured for almost three decades.

"This amount of Arctic sea ice reduction the past two consecutive winters has not taken place before during the 27 years satellite data has been available," Comiso said. "In the past, sea ice reduction in winter was significantly lower per decade compared to summer sea ice retreat. What's remarkable is that we've witnessed sea ice reduction at 6 percent per year over just the last two winters, most likely a result of warming due to greenhouse gases."

Comiso yesterday called the new data from satellite imaging of ice formation and temperatures "the strongest evidence of global warming in the Arctic so far."

The drop in wintertime ice tracks a similar drop in sea ice detected in the warmer months. According to Mark Serreze, senior research analyst with the National Snow and Ice Data Center, the amount of ice in the Arctic at the end of the 2005 summer was the smallest seen in 27 years of satellite imaging, and probably the smallest in 100 years. He said this year's summer ice cover started out even smaller but is not another record.

Serreze, in a teleconference with Comiso yesterday, said the new information on wintertime ice increases his confidence that greenhouse gases, and not other variables of weather and climate, are causing the warming.

"There a growing consistency here, with our observations in line with what our models project," said Serreze, whose group is part of the University of Colorado and does contract work for NASA.

Comiso said that researchers had been puzzled that wintertime ice creation remained robust in the Arctic while summertime melt was increasing, since the greenhouse effect would have potentially greater impact on wintertime ice.

In a paper that will appear in the journal Geophysical Research Letters, Comiso describes a "remarkable turn of events, with the observation of record low ice extent and area during the winters of 2005 and 2006." He adds: "The abnormally low winter ice maximum extent and area and enhanced surface temperatures in 2005 and 2006 . . . may just be the beginning of these trends which have been more apparent in other seasons."

Comiso said the wintertime polar warming may be caused by increases and changes in long-wave radiation from the sun, which is associated with the greenhouse effect. He also said the fact that there is so much less ice visible during the summer suggests that the ice cover is not getting as thick in the winter as it used to.

NASA also announced yesterday a study of the effects of shrinking Arctic ice formation on polar bears. The paper, to be published in the journal Arctic, found a marked decrease in the time that polar bears can spend on sea ice, their preferred platform for hunting seals and other sea mammals. As the coastal ice melts, said Claire Parkinson, a senior scientist at the Goddard facility, the animals have been forced to spend more time on land -- resulting in more encounters with people and a decline in the bears' average body weight.

The paper reports that the average weight of adult female polar bears in western Hudson Bay was 650 pounds in 1980. Their average weight in 2004 was 507 pounds -- a 143-pound drop.

"A key result of our research is its strong suggestion that climate warming is having a significant and negative effect on a primary species reliant on the sea ice cover for survival," Parkinson said.

She said that while the Antarctic experienced a sharp decline in ice cover during the 1970s but then recovered, there were no signs that the Arctic will now recover its ice in the same way.

House Rejects Attempt To Curb Indian Gaming (USAT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett New Service

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Indian tribes hoping to establish casinos away from tribal lands dodged a potential setback Wednesday when the House rejected a bill barring off-reservation gambling.

California Rep. Richard Pombo, head of the House Committee on Resources, said "reservation shopping" by tribes has "perverted" the intent of the 1988 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, which opened the door for tribes to establish casinos.

But Pombo, who introduced the bill, was unable to secure the two-thirds vote needed for it to pass, under special House rules barring amendments. The vote was 247-171 for the bill, with 278 votes needed for approval.

All of Louisiana's House members, except Reps. William Jefferson, R-New Orleans, and Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, voted for Pombo's bill.

As Indian gaming revenues have grown — they reached nearly $22.7 billion in 2005 — so has opposition in Congress to the industry's expansion.

Only four tribes have off-reservation casinos. But at least 44 others, many landless and newly recognized by the federal government, like the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians, have applications pending at the Interior Department.

Pombo's bill would have prohibited the Jena Band and other tribes from establishing casinos off tribal land or land not contiguous to their reservations. It also would have required tribes to compensate local communities for a new casino's impact on roads, water and sewer systems and other services, including law enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0063088

The National Indian Gaming Association, which represents more than 180 tribes, strongly opposed the bill, saying it would violate tribal sovereignty.

"Before they could use their lands, these tribes would have to jump through many new hoops," an NIGA statement said. "Indian tribes are recognized as sovereign in the Constitution and under existing law. Sovereign tribes negotiate with sovereign states, not town councils."

The defeat of Pombo's bill is expected to end the congressional debate over Indian gaming this year.

In the Senate, lawmakers from two opposing camps have stalled a less restrictive bill sponsored by John McCain, R-Ariz.

Some senators, including Sen. David Vitter, R-Metarie, have blocked McCain's bill because they say it's not tough enough. Others oppose it because they say it attempts to curb Indian gaming violate tribal sovereignty.

Agents Say Oregon Schoolmates Developed Drug Ring Over 3 Decades (AP)

By Joseph B. Frazier, Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. – The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday it has shattered a drug operation that started among high school buddies in Roseburg, Ore., 30 years ago and grew over the years to become an international operation that took in more than $20 million.

Eleven of the 12 people named in a federal indictment are in custody after arrests Wednesday in Oregon, Washington, Colorado and Idaho. Most are from Oregon.

U.S. Attorney Tom Moss of Boise, Idaho, said the arrests followed a classic strategy of “follow the money.”

The 194-page indictment, handed up in Boise in June but kept sealed until Wednesday's arrests, said the operation began by growing and selling marijuana. But, the indictment said, the operation expanded to smuggling of drugs from Mexico and South America, growing large quantities of marijuana indoors and on public lands, and manufacturing methamphetamines.

The government seeks forfeiture of more than $24 million in assets including boats, planes, business interests and real estate in five states.

U.S. attorney spokeswoman Jean McNeil said more arrests could follow, and those in custody likely would be sent to Idaho after court appearances where they were arrested.

The case is handled in Idaho because it stemmed from the case of a convicted Clearwater, Idaho, drug trafficker, Leland Lang, who was allegedly supplied with large amounts of drugs by the operation.

In addition to drug distribution and money-laundering charges, six of the defendants are charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which carries a mandatory minimum 20-year sentence.

“Lee Lang was a major distributor, and he was getting his drugs from somewhere,” Moss said. “We wanted to find out where, and now, thanks to the hard work and dedication of more than a dozen law enforcement agencies, I think we have.”

Police Count 54 Drug Dealers In Arrest Sweep (MANUL)

By Pat Grossmith, Union Leader Staff

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, September 14, 2006

Manchester – An eight-month undercover drug investigation in the state's largest city has resulted in 54 drug dealers being arrested and the confiscation of more than 10 pounds of drugs with a street value of $450,000, authorities said yesterday.

The arrests began on April 1, but since Monday, police have arrested 28 people on charges they sold crack, cocaine or heroin to undercover officers or possessed drugs.

Manchester Police Chief John Jaskolka, at a news conference yesterday afternoon, said he "fully expects more arrests as the operation continues over the next few days and weeks."

Manchester Mayor Frank Guinta commended all the agencies involved -- Manchester police, state police, Hillsborough County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Marshal's Office, ATF, state Probation and Parole Department, and the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force.

He said the arrests show there is a "renewed commitment to eradicate the criminal element in our city."

The undercover drug investigation so far as involved the execution of 13 search warrants and the seizure or purchase of 7.9 pounds of cocaine, 2.4 pounds of crack cocaine, and 2.5 ounces of heroin by agents. Police also removed nine firearms -- eight handguns and one shotgun -- from city streets and seized $130,979 in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0063089

The probe was funded with a federal grant under the Operation Streetsweeper program and involved seven different state, local, county and federal agencies.

U.S. Attorney Thomas Colantuono said nine of those arrested will be prosecuted on federal charges in U.S. District Court in Concord.

Those charged in federal court include Joseph Anderson, 36, of 326 Amherst St., Apt. 9; Lucien Arsenault, 37, 8 Ruby Way, Merrimack; Cotisha Blake, 37, of 22 Concord St., Apt. 13; Andrew Eaton, 38, 3951 Brown Ave.; Anthony Frith, 32, 3951 Brown Ave.; Kim Paul, 41, 478 Beech St., Apt. 6; Kyshawn Ross, 28, 509 Beech St.; Michelle Sarazin, 34, currently being detained at the Valley Street jail; Eugene Williams, 45, 281 Auburn St., Apt. 2.

Anderson was in Manchester District Court yesterday on state charges of possessing marijuana and resisting detention. His bail was set at $5,000 cash or surety, with a trial set for Nov. 13.

Those arrested are mostly street-level dealers, selling drugs in Manchester and the surrounding area, although there were a few mid- to high-level drug traffickers among them, according to police.

Two alleged mid-level crack cocaine dealers arrested Monday night were Jerrel T. Cryer, 25, of 9 Wheelock St., and Christopher Hoggard, 19, of 501 Somerville St., first-floor. Cryer is charged with three counts of selling crack cocaine and one count possessing cocaine with the intent to sell it. Hoggard is charged with four counts of selling crack cocaine.

Each is being held on $40,000 cash or surety bail, with probable cause hearings in Manchester District Court set for Sept. 25.

Brothers Nathaniel Kitchen, 19, of 100 Lincoln St., and Isaiah Kitchen, 21, of 283 Bridge St., were also arrested Monday night. Nathaniel Kitchen was arrested on an electronic bench warrant for operating a motor vehicle after his license was suspended.

When he arrived yesterday morning in District Court for his arraignment, police promptly arrested him on a drug charge. He was handcuffed and taken to the police station for processing.

He is to be arraigned this morning on both the motor vehicle complaint and the drug charge.

His brother, Isaiah, pleaded innocent yesterday to possessing marijuana. He is free on $1,000 personal recognizance bail with a trial slated for Nov. 9.

Also arraigned yesterday were:

Kasha Carmody, 20, of 86 Batchelder Ave., one count of selling cocaine. Bail is $5,000 cash/surety. Jason Coelho, 26, 285 Concord St., Apt. 5, three counts of selling cocaine. Bail is $10,000 cash/surety.

Edward Davender, 32, 455 Pine St., Apt. 220, three counts of selling crack cocaine. Bail is $30,000 cash/surety.

Their probable cause hearings are Sept. 25.

Irvin Donlagic, 20, 373 Beech St., first floor, was charged with three counts of selling cocaine. His bail is $30,000 cash/surety, although police prosecuting officer Kristen Taylor wanted it set at $50,000 because, she told the judge, he was a flight risk.

Donlagic said he planned to leave for an out-of-country vacation on Sunday. Should he make bail, however, he is not to travel outside of New Hampshire.

"I guess that will cancel any vacation plans you have," Judge Norman Champagne told him. He is to return to court Sept. 25 for a probable cause hearing.

Also arraigned yesterday were Scott Gauthier, 37, 22 Concord St., Apt. 13, one count sale of crack cocaine. Bail is $5,000 cash/surety, and a probable cause hearing, Sept. 26.

Katon Lang, 21, 211 Pine St., third floor, was arraigned on four counts of selling cocaine and three charges of selling heroin.

His bail is $30,000 cash/surety with a probable cause hearing, Sept. 25.

Fritz Lemite, 28, 22 Beech Hill Ave., was arraigned on three counts of sale of cocaine. His bail is $20,000 cash/ surety with a probable cause hearing, Sept. 26.

Norman Moore, 32, last known address of 6 Hold St., Concord, was charged with one count of selling the drug cyclobenzaprine, a muscle relaxer. Bail is $10,000 cash/surety with a trial Sept. 26.

Topsham Crack Dealer Sentenced (BTR)

Brunswick Times Record, September 14, 2006

PORTLAND - A New Haven, Conn., man was sentenced Tuesday in U.S. District Court to more than 15 years in prison in connection with his role in trafficking crack cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0063090

Phillip Whitworth, 33, pleaded guilty in May to charges of possessing with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. The joint investigation between the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Topsham Police Department began in Topsham and lasted 13 months, said Detective Mark Gilliam of the Topsham Police Department.

Whitworth was arrested in March 2006 in the Topsham Fair Mall area after attempting to sell the drugs to an undercover informant working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. Whitworth went to the New York state-Connecticut area to purchase crack cocaine at a lower cost, then distributed it in central Maine and the Mid-coast region, Gilliam said. "This was a career criminal and that's why his punishment was so bad," he said.

Whitworth had lived in Topsham and Brunswick while he was selling drugs in Maine. He also maintained a residence in Connecticut, where he was on probation. Previously, he had been convicted on drug and weapons charges, Gilliam said.

While living in Maine, Whitworth drove a sport utility vehicle and had a house with a large plasma television, which Gilliam believes were bought through profits from drug sales. At the time of his arrest, Whitworth had arranged to have approximately $10,000 worth of electronic equipment installed in his SUV, Gilliam said.

Gilliam said it is becoming common for people to move to rural areas to sell drugs. A new area means less competition, allowing drug dealers to sell at higher prices, he said.

U.S. Attorney Paula D. Silsby praised the DEA and the Topsham Police Department for their work in the investigation. Gilliam also praised the DEA for the agency's help with the investigation. Top of Story

Spain, US Boost Joint Efforts To Combat Drug Trafficking (AFP)

AFP, September 14, 2006

Spain and the United States announced they were increasing cooperation to stop drug trafficking, following talks between Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba and visiting US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) administrator Karen Tandy.

Both announced the strengthening of "common instruments to combat the laundering of money proceeding from drug trafficking".

The interior ministry said in a statement that Rubalcaba and Tandy had underlined the need for a "joint and coordinated" effort to stem drug-related crime, via the creation of specialized anti-narcotics teams from both countries

Also present at the meeting were Spanish Secretary of State for Security Antonio Camacho, who held talks with US counterparts in Washington in July, and US ambassador Eduardo Aguirre.

Spain is at the frontline of the anti-narcotics fight in Europe since it is the main European port of entry for Latin American cocaine.

Last year, seizures of cocaine in Spain reached a record 46.6 tonnes.

Spain will in April, under the co-chairmanship of Tandy, host the 25th International Drug Enforcement Conference (IDEC) in Madrid.

The IDEC was established in 1983 for law enforcement officials in the Western hemisphere to share information related to drug crime and draw up a coordinated approach to combat trafficking.

Drug-trade Violence Grips Acapulco (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

ACAPULCO, MEXICO

He took office as a charismatic, ballad-singing maverick who promised to contain crime in this coastal resort town.

But during his term, Acapulco, once known as the "Pearl of the Pacific," has seen its reputation - and its mayor, Félix Salgado - battered by the worst drug violence in the town's history. Mr. Salgado has lost 33 pounds in nine months and, when asked what his major accomplishment has been so far, answers deprecatingly: "that I'm alive."

"I've been dealt a very complicated situation, very hard," says Salgado, turning serious. In July he mourned the death of his city's security chief found suffocated in the back of a car.

Salgado's survival during a siege of violence mirrors the impact on Acapulco and beyond, as the drug war between two cartels has spread from the northern ganglands along the US-Mexican border toward the south - both startling, and horrifying, the nation.

Some 1,500 have been killed in drug violence this year, double the number in previous years. But it's the recent, and growing, viciousness of the acts that has been most unsettling. Acapulco has seen grenade attacks and decapitations haunt its front pages. Bodies have been wrapped in garbage bags, heads hung on the fence outside government offices.

Salgado and other city officials say that a national plan of stepped-up police enforcement has helped stem the violence. But just last week, in the neighboring state of Michoacan, five heads were hurled onto a dance floor while the disco was in full swing, showing how volatile the situation is becoming. It will be one of the most vexing problems for incoming president Felipe Calderón.

"I never expected this war would last so long, and it is bad news for Mexican society," says Jorge Chabat, a criminal justice expert in Mexico City. "One of the challenges Calderón has to face is he has to reach an agreement with other parties to make long-term reform." Long ties to drug trade

Acapulco has old ties to drugs, with coves along the Pacific Coast where speedboats have long picked up cocaine from South America. But growing domestic consumption and the battle for key entry points into the US has fueled unprecedented violence, with over 65 execution-style killings this year alone.

"In the last 50 years, we have never seen anything like this," says Jorge Valdez Reycen, a spokesperson for the local police. "This is a police force not trained for war, it is trained for tourism."

The escalating violence is believed to be the fallout between the Sinaloa cartel, which had dominated Acapulco, and the Gulf cartel, which has been moving into its territory. "It has gotten really personal too, which is why it is spiraling out of control," says Laurie Freeman, who authored a report this summer on Mexico's drug trade for the Washington Office on Latin America think tank. "The trafficking is nothing new, the level of violence is."

In the past six years, President Vicente Fox has made the war on drugs a top priority, making high-profile arrests. The arrest last month by US officials of suspected drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was lauded a major cross-border success.

The top-level arrests have created opportunities for smaller players to vie for control of principal traffic routes. The result: Battles once contained in border towns have spread to tourist hot spots.

"In some sense, as the country is more democratic, so is the drug trade," says Bruce Bagley, a drug-trade expert at the University of Miami. "There are a lot more players in it, and crime has risen because Mexican authorities don't have the personnel [to tackle it]."

In Acapulco, the results have been devastating. The bay town was once a playground of Hollywood stars. On a recent day, as Mr. Valdez Reycen from the police department went through photos chronicling events over the last few months, it seemed more like the backdrop to a horror film.

In January, a daytime shootout a mile from the beach left four suspected traffickers dead. Three months later, two heads were hung outside the state Finance and Administration headquarters, where the shootout had been, with a note: "So that you learn to respect." Image problem

Teresa de Jesús Rivas, the city's tourism director, says that vacationers have not been scared away in recent years. The number of visitors increased from 5.3 million in 2004 to 5.7 million in 2005, and she expects this year to keep pace with, or exceed, the last.

Still, drug violence does image damage. "When people are looking for a destination for vacation and they see there are heads in Acapulco, it's not going to be as attractive," she says outside her office, next to a huge photo of the bay when foreign tourism dominated the market. These days, only about 15 percent of tourists hail from other countries.

These are among the challenges for Salgado, who says security is his top priority. He led a peace march in July. And he says that random street patrols, which include 400 federal, state, and local police have started to tranquilize the town. "The people were afraid, terrorized, horrified, but it's improved," Salgado says.

Fernando Tenopala, the president of a local business group, agrees that the situation is better. "When the extreme violence began [this year], suddenly we felt very alone ... and protested for peace," he says. Since then the police have received training in using arms, as well as 250 additional HK-36 rifles. "Things have improved, though we have to continue fighting."

President-elect Calderón has already outlined plans to create a national crime database and sweep the police of corruption.

Local residents remain doubtful. Mari Acosta, a cook in a local eatery, says she is tired of the line that the drug wars are between enemies - especially since she says no one knows who the enemy is. "It's hurting the rest of us too, but the government does nothing about it, probably because they are involved, otherwise they wouldn't get killed," she says in a low voice so customers don't hear.

Just last month she saw in the newspaper that a regular customer was gunned down outside town. She didn't know his name but recognized his face. Says Ms. Acosta: "I don't know what's going to happen with us here in Acapulco."

Witness Held In Wales Slaying Pleads Not Guilty To Gun Charge (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063092

SEATTLE -- A Bellevue gun collector who was arrested as a material witness in the 2001 assassination of a federal prosecutor pleaded not guilty Wednesday to an unrelated charge of machine-gun possession.

Albert K. Kwan was arrested Friday on one count of possessing an M-14 machine gun in January 2005. His attorneys said they found the charge curious, because Kwan owns more than 100 machine guns legally, and the one that resulted in his indictment required serious modification by federal agents before it could be fired automatically.

Kwan was arrested in early 2005 and held for 23 days as a material witness in the October 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Crane Wales, an 18-year federal prosecutor and president of a Washington gun-control organization. Wales was shot through a window as he worked in the basement of his home on Seattle's Queen Anne Hill. The FBI has designated his assasssination a "major case" and is offering $1 million for information that helps solve it.

Kwan, who has not been identified as a suspect, was held because federal investigators believed he had purchased two replacement barrels for a Makarov pistol, and ballistics evidence indicated the bullets that killed Wales had traveled through such a barrel. The investigators wanted to know if Kwan had the barrels or if he had provided them to someone else.

Kwan, who has testified four or five times before a grand jury investigating Wales' death, gave authorities one barrel which did not match the bullets, said his lawyers, Joseph Conte and Eric Stahlfeld.

"He told them he believes he never had a second barrel," Stahlfeld said after the hearing Wednesday.

The grand jury "has asked him about everything. He knows nothing," Conte added.

Conte, of Washington, D.C., and Stahlfeld, of Seattle, also said Kwan does not know a Bellevue airline pilot who is the only publicly identified suspect in the Wales killing. That pilot had feuded with Wales in court. Through his attorney, he has declined several interview requests.

"From everything we know, he's never had anything even close to contact" with the pilot, Stahlfeld said of Kwan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey argued Wednesday that Kwan should be detained because he posed a danger to the community and was not forthcoming with the court regarding his assets. He also failed to disclose a passport that had been issued to him in Hong Kong.

Kwan once imported 50 firearms from Canada without proper documentation, Redkey said, and in 1996 he was caught trying to cross the border with two guns wrapped in bubblewrap under the hood of his car.

Customs agents also seized a van from Kwan in 2002 when they discovered it had a hidden compartment. Kwan unsuccessfully sued for damages. He also sued in 2003 when the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to refused to renew his four federal firearms licenses. The agency said it based its decision partly on his refusal to cooperate with agents seeking to inspect his home, the licensed premises. Kwan lost that case and has filed an appeal.

Conte said the lengths to which Kwan went to ensure that his other machine guns were legally owned and properly documented, and that the M-14 at issue could not readily be fired automatically, indicate that he did not intend to do anything illegal.

"It didn't operate as a machine gun when the government seized it," he told U.S. Magistrate Judge Monica Benton.

Conte also questioned why Kwan was only arrested last week, when agents seized the gun during a January 2005 search of his home. Redkey said he had only recently received information about the case from the ATF.

Benton said she would likely release Kwan pending trial, possibly on home detention, as long as all weapons were removed from the home. The detention hearing was put off until Friday to give Kwan's lawyers time to find storage for his collection of firearms.

London Firearms Crackdown Includes Raids In NJ (WABC)

WABC-TV, New York City, September 13, 2006

British police seized hundreds of firearms in a dawn raid overseas

(New Jersey-WABC, Sept. 13, 2006) - British police seized hundreds of firearms, including automatic weapons and shotguns, in a dawn raid involving gun-smuggling between New Jersey and London.

Eyewitness News has learned a 55-year-old man, who answered the door wearing his boxer shorts, was arrested at a home in Dartford, England Hundreds of guns, including shotguns, semiautomatic guns and automatic weapons, were found at his house.

Officials say an accomplice of that man was taken into custody in New Jersey this morning, questioned and released. The raids were a joint operation between U.S. and U.K. authorities.

The ATF, the Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms agency was the lead agency on the U.S. Side of the case, called "Operation Trident" and which British officials say has been in operation for six years.

"For eight months, the ATF has worked with the UK in this case, and we are conducting follow up work in the United States today," said Richard Marianos, an ATF official.

Marianos stressed that British authorities are the lead agencies in the case and they will make any extensive comments. There have been no US arrests in the case so far.

"This is the biggest firearms haul we have ever had. The premises raided were used to store hundreds and hundreds of weapons, Det. Chief Superintendent Kevin Davis said.

"I've never seen anything like it. Guns are mounted on every available wall space in the property and live ammunition was found lying on the floor. There are guns everywhere."

"It will take us at least three days to log it all and bag up the evidence.

The international arms operation has been in progress for more than eight months, and one of the persons arrested in the UK today -- a 55-year-old man -- is believed to be a "major player" in the arms case.

Michigan Fugitive Caught In Tennessee After 30 Years (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- A convicted murderer who escaped from a Michigan psychiatric facility in 1976 was arrested Wednesday in Nashville, where he assumed a new identity and got married.

Thomas Ball, 76, was arrested at his Nashville home Wednesday morning by U.S. marshals, WSMV-TV reported.

Ball was convicted in 1964 of second-degree murder and was sent to what is now called the Southern Michigan Correction Facility in Jackson, Mich.

He escaped from the Center for Forensic Psychiatry in Ypsilanti, Mich., after being transferred there for treatment in 1976.

Ball was living under the name of Thomas Fry and had remarried during him time in Tennessee, although his wife died in the past year.

Justice Department officials said they believe Ball came to Tennessee shortly after his escape.

U.S. marshals in Nashville tracked down Ball while acting on a tip from their counterparts in Michigan.

Ball and his wife ran a storage facility in Franklin, south of Nashville, for several years, the television station reported.

Ball was being held in the Metro Jail pending extradition.

IMMIGRATION:

Son Of Ex-Liberian President To Plead Guilty To Passport Charge (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, September 14, 2006

MIAMI - Charles McArthur Emmanuel, the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor, told a federal judge Wednesday that he will plead guilty to charges of lying about his father's true identity on a passport used to enter the United States.

Emmanuel, who is also known as "Chuckie" Taylor, said "Yes sir, judge" when asked by U.S. District Judge Donald Graham whether he was ready to change his plea to guilty. A second hearing was scheduled for Friday for Emmanuel to formally enter the plea.

Emmanuel, who headed an elite paramilitary unit for his father in Liberia, was arrested March 30 at Miami International Airport shortly after arriving on a flight from Trinidad. His arrest came the day after his father was apprehended in Africa on United Nations charges of alleged atrocities during neighboring Sierra Leone's civil war.

On his application for a U.S. passport, Emmanuel identified his father as "Steven Daniel Smith" rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. The passport fraud charge carries a maximum penalty of 15 years in prison.

Emmanuel's court-appointed attorney, Miguel Caridad, declined comment after Wednesday's hearing. Karen Rochlin, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case, also declined comment.

Left unresolved by the planned guilty plea on the passport charge is whether Emmanuel might yet face war crimes and torture charges based on his role in Taylor's regime.

Emmanuel headed the Anti-Terrorist Unit in Liberia during his father's tenure, which has been described by Human Rights Watch as a force created by Taylor after he became president in 1997 that was involved in murders, extortion, abuse of civilians, recruitment of child soldiers, torture and looting.

Some human rights activists and Liberians have called for U.S. prosecutors to charge Emmanuel under laws making it a crime for U.S. citizens to commit torture or war crimes overseas. Emmanuel, 29, was born in Boston in 1977 while Taylor was an economics student at Bentley College.

DOJ_NMG_0063094

Elise Keppler, counsel for Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program, said the guilty plea should have no direct bearing on whether Emmanuel might face more serious charges. But, she said, once a passport fraud sentence is imposed "the clock is ticking" for the Justice Department to make a decision.

"This is not at all the end of the story when it comes to Chuckie Taylor," Keppler said.

Emmanuel also has been placed on a U.N. restricted travel list and a U.S. Treasury Department list prohibiting him from doing business with U.S. citizens and whose assets in the United States could be frozen by the government.

House Republicans Will Push For 700 Miles Of Fencing On Mexico Border (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — House Republicans announced Wednesday that they would move swiftly to pass legislation requiring the Bush administration to build 700 miles of fencing along the Mexican border to help stem the flow of illegal immigrants and drugs into the United States.

The legislation, which is expected to go to the House floor for a vote on Thursday, would require construction of two layers of reinforced fencing along stretches of California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas that are considered among the most porous parts of the border.

It would also require officials of the Department of Homeland Security to establish “operational control” over all American land and sea borders by using Border Patrol agents, fencing, satellites, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles.

The bill is the first in a series of border security measures House Republicans have promised to pass before the midterm elections in November.

The House majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, hailed the legislation as “a critical step towards shutting down the flow of illegal immigration into the United States.”

Democrats promptly criticized the plan as political grandstanding intended to energize conservative voters before the elections.

The House passed a nearly identical fencing provision as part of a border security bill in December. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, has publicly raised doubt about the effectiveness of border fencing, particularly in remote desert areas.

While the Senate easily approved 370 miles of border fencing in its own immigration bill in May, it is unclear whether the two chambers will be able to reach agreement on the issue before Congress recesses this month. House leaders have said they will not support the Senate bill, which would create a guest worker plan and put millions of illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship in addition to toughening border security.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, dismissed the fence bill as partisan politicking. “Republicans have a record of failure on border security,’’ Ms. Pelosi said, “and this is their attempt to cover up that record.’’

House Republicans countered that immigration hearings held across the nation in August showed that Americans expected Congress to toughen border security, particularly while the country remained under threat of terrorist attacks.

Congressional staff members predicted that some House Democrats, especially those from border states, would support the fencing bill.

The barriers, which are to be accompanied by additional lighting, cameras and ground sensors, would be built near Tecate and Calexico on the California border; Columbus, N.M.; and El Paso, Del Rio, Eagle Pass, Laredo and Brownsville in Texas.

House Republicans have also proposed counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work, measures that would require the deportation of immigrants linked to Central American gangs and an increase in the number of Border Patrol agents as part of their border security agenda.

“The first priority of the American people is secure borders,’’ said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who is the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

House Republicans said they were encouraged by what they called the success of a 14-mile fence at San Diego that was mandated by Congress in 1996. Crime rates have dropped by 47 percent since the fence was constructed, they said, and the number of illegal immigrants captured dropped to about 9,000 in 2005 from about 200,000 in 1992.

Amy Call, a spokeswoman for the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, said Senate Republicans would consider the legislation.

“The leader believes very strongly that we need to secure the border,’’ Ms. Call said. “We’ll look at all options to do that.’’

DOJ_NMG_0063095

Senator Jeff Sessions, the Alabama Republican who championed the fencing provision in the Senate, praised House Republicans for pushing ahead with the legislation. Mr. Sessions said he was concerned that the Senate proposal, which had been attached to the military appropriations bill, might not receive adequate financing.

"They've put forth a strong barrier bill,'' Mr. Sessions said of House Republicans. "It's time for us to complete the job.''

Republicans Resurrect Plan For Fences Along U.S.-Mexico Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Republicans are renewing their push to construct nearly 700 miles of two-layered reinforced fences along the U.S.-Mexico border as the first installment in a series of border security initiatives they hope to send to President Bush in the closing weeks of Congress.

The fence proposal is identical to one that was included in an immigration enforcement bill passed by the House of Representatives in December 2005. But with that measure sidelined in a stalemate with the Senate, House leaders plan to resurrect the $2.2 billion barrier in a single-shot bill that House members are expected to pass on Thursday.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., said the Secure Fence Act represents the opening salvo in an end-of-session flurry of initiatives designed to stem the flow of illegal immigration along the Southwest border.

House leaders have refused to consider a more comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would create a foreign guest-worker program and put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship. Leading supporters of the Senate plan acknowledge that it appears dead for the year.

But President Bush isn't giving up on his push for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws and wants the House and Senate to "work together to come up with comprehensive reform," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Wednesday.

Asked if the White House supports the proposed fence, Snow responded, "What the administration wants is comprehensive reform."

The other House proposals will be announced on Thursday, Boehner and King said, and are expected to include more Border Patrol agents and the expanded use of unmanned aerial vehicles, sensors and other high-tech hardware along the border.

House members approved the five-section fence as an amendment to its immigration bill by a vote of 260-159.

The largest sections include a 361-mile stretch from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz., and 176 miles in Texas, from Laredo to Brownsville.

Two other sections of fencing also would be built in Texas - 51 miles from Del Rio to Eagle Pass, and 88 miles from El Paso to Columbus, New Mexico. A 22-mile section would be built near a port entry in Tecate, Calif., in eastern San Diego County.

House leaders moved forward with the border security package after a series of summertime field hearings that reinforced their opposition to the Senate-passed immigration bill. Democrats have denounced the initiatives as political posturing by Republicans to appease voters demanding congressional action on illegal immigration.

With less than two weeks left before Congress quits work to campaign for the Nov. 7 election, the outlook for Senate passage of the border security package is uncertain at best. But two leading architects of the Senate bill, Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Mel Martinez of Florida, said they would be willing to consider the initiatives.

Senators included 370 miles of fencing in their bill.

House Set To OK Border-fence Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

The House is expected to approve nearly 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border today as part of a final effort by House Republicans to place major border-security legislation on President Bush's desk before the November elections.

The Secure Fence Act, which is nearly identical to an amendment the House easily approved last year, would deploy cameras, ground sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles to monitor the border.

In addition, it would change current policy to give Border Patrol agents the authority to forcibly disable fleeing vehicles along the border.

"House Republicans believe we must address the immediate need to secure our borders," said Rep. Peter T. King, the New York Republican who chairs the Homeland Security Committee and will introduce the bill today.

DOJ_NMG_0063096

"The field hearings held by House Republicans over August demonstrated that the first priority of the American people is secure borders, whether it is providing additional fencing and infrastructure or more state-of-the-art technology and surveillance to strengthen border security."

House Democrats dismissed the legislation as election-year politics.

"The Republicans are covering up for their failed record on border security," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi.

"They're passing legislation that has already passed the House and has an uncertain future in the Senate."

Indeed, the Senate has steadfastly opposed such border-security legislation unless it is twinned with provisions to grant a path to citizenship rights to some 10 million illegal aliens already in the country and a guest-worker program to admit more foreign laborers.

Two Senate Republicans yesterday wrote Majority Leader Bill Frist and urged him to abandon the wide-ranging Senate legislation. Sens. Jeff Sessions of Alabama and Wayne Allard of Colorado advised Mr. Frist to instead take up the border -ecurity measures proposed by the House "that a clear majority in both houses favor."

Asked if administration officials would work to pass the House's new border-fence bill, White House press secretary Tony Snow said they are still fighting for a broad bill.

"We are urging the House of Representatives and the United States Senate to work together to come up with comprehensive reform," said Mr. Snow, referring to the guest-worker plan and citizenship rights that Mr. Bush supports.

Asked if Mr. Bush held out hope for an immigration bill, Mr. Snow said, "You know, we've got a very limited amount of time. You draw your own conclusions."

House Republicans also plan to announce a slate of additional border-security proposals they plan to introduce in the coming days.

"Tomorrow's vote represents the first step in that process, and a critical step towards shutting down the flow of illegal immigration into the United States," Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said yesterday.

On Eve Of A Vote, GOP On Both Sides Of Fence (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans on Wednesday launched a renewed bid to stiffen border security and rally voters, unveiling a bill that would mandate construction of 700 miles of fencing in highly populated areas along the U.S. border with Mexico.

The House is to vote today on the "Secure Fence Act," which requires the Department of Homeland Security to prevent "all unlawful entries" into the United States, pushes for border agents to use greater force, and calls for more border surveillance using cameras, ground sensors and satellites.

The new bill is the first of several tightly focused border-security measures House leaders say they will introduce in coming weeks. It represents the latest effort by House Republicans to build momentum for an enforcement-only approach, which they say — despite objections from the Senate and President Bush — is the best way to repair the nation's immigration policies.

"House Republicans believe we must address the immediate need to secure our borders," said Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee and author of the new bill.

The bill would require at least two layers of reinforced fencing, along with vehicle barriers, roads, lighting, cameras and sensors, around the California towns of Tecate and Calexico and in border areas of Texas, Arizona and New Mexico. Surveillance cameras in those areas would have to be in place by May 31, 2007; fence construction would have to be completed a year later.

The bill also calls for a study on constructing a state-of-the-art barrier system along the northern border with Canada.

The House is expected to approve the legislation. When it goes to the Senate, though, it will present a challenge for the bipartisan group that backs the chamber's broader approach to immigration.

Senate legislation approved in May calls for allowing illegal immigrants to gain legal status and creating a guest worker program in addition to increasing enforcement, in part by building a 370-mile fence along the border.

Senators will have to decide whether to support the new House bill and risk losing any leverage they have to get the House to support other measures, such as the guest worker program. If they vote against the House bill, they risk being tarred as weak on security in an election year.

Some conservative Republicans have long supported the get-tough approach. One of them, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), responded to the new House measure by calling on Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to embrace the House approach and declare the Senate bill dead.

DOJ_NMG_0063097

Referring to the congressional deadlock over immigration, Sessions wrote to Frist on Wednesday, declaring: "We are not close to … a consensus now. The best solution is to go forward with strong immigration enforcement."

Democrats noted that House Republicans were introducing their bill at a time when the GOP, vulnerable in several election campaigns, needed an issue to rally voters.

"It's so transparent," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), adding that he hoped Latino voters would see through the Republican gambit and help the Democrats on election day.

"We believe in comprehensive immigration reform," Reid said. "We believe there should be a program to bring 12 million people out of the shadows."

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who met with Reid on Wednesday, said he too was disappointed in the House proposal. "I think a bill that only addresses security and does in the punitive way that the House does is absolutely unacceptable," he said, adding: "It's un-American."

Most provisions in the new bill — including the fencing and camera requirements — were taken from the get-tough immigration legislation the House passed in December. That bill bolstered enforcement at the border, in the workplace and inside the country. It also made it a felony to be in the country illegally or to help someone who is — provisions that helped trigger massive demonstrations in the spring.

The new bill "is just a rehashing of legislation that's already been passed," said Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. In the next few weeks, he said, he expects House Republicans to offer anti-gang legislation as part of the border security package.

The one new section would give Customs and Border Protection agents working on the ground and in the air division greater authority to stop smugglers' cars when they enter the U.S. illegally or attempt to flee authorities. Now, the most agents can do is lay down spike strips to puncture the tires of fleeing vehicles.

The new House bill would require Customs and Border Protection to consider other technologies, including rubber bullets, to stop smugglers who are trying to escape or who pose a threat to the community, a Republican aide said.

Drafting several smaller measures allows the House to advertise multiple achievements to voters in November, but it will also allow them to discreetly omit the felony provisions, which many in the Senate vehemently opposed.

House leaders say the new fence bill and the measures that will follow are products of the immigration field hearings they held across the country this summer. Though the hearings were described as an effort to find out what the public thought about immigration and border security, they did not allow for public participation, and the witness lists leaned heavily toward experts who supported the enforcement-only view.

Hispanic Lawmakers Question Absence Of Immigration In New Dem Agenda (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 14, 2006

House Democratic leaders passed around to colleagues Tuesday a plan they would focus on if their party wins control of the lower chamber on Election Day, but although the document was drafted to achieve consensus, it has already angered Democratic Hispanic leaders.

The cause of the consternation is not something the Democrats included in the agenda. Instead, it's something lacking: any mention of immigration. While Republican candidates around the country are trying to make immigration one of the biggest issues of this fall's elections, Democrats appear to be tiptoeing around it.

Some Democrats fear that the issue will hurt them in conservative-leaning districts such as in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky that they must win in order to capture majority control this November.

At a closed-door meeting of the Democratic Steering & Policy Committee on Tuesday, New York Rep. José Serrano, the panel's vice chairman, challenged Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) over the lack of any mention of immigration reform in the caucus's new 25-page agenda document for 2007. The confrontation created a tense moment in the room, said one participant.

Other Democrats agree with Serrano that their party should make known its position on an issue important to Hispanic voters, whom many political strategists believe will be a crucial voting bloc in the future because of their surging numbers.

"I think immigration is a big issue," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. "It's a big issue to the Hispanic community. They deserve some sort of answer on where the Democrats are on immigration."

"Mr. Serrano believes the book reflects a plan for the Democrats of the future," said Sanchez, referring to the agenda document "A New Direction for America," which leaders distributed at Tuesday's meeting. The document resembles the Contract with America that Republicans used to define their priorities before going on to win the House in 1994.

"[Serrano] wanted a plan about immigration in there, [or] maybe just a note that immigrants are important to the country," she added.

DOJ_NMG_0063098

Sanchez, a member of the steering and policy committee said she missed the meeting but heard about it from other members.

Serrano said that while many of the immigrants who would benefit from reform cannot vote, Hispanic citizens who do vote perceive attacks on immigrants as attacks on their heritage. Serrano said it is important that Democrats show they care about immigrants.

"We have to let people like me who are citizens know that we're not ignoring the others," he said, adding that any token of recognition would be important.

The new Democratic agenda addresses border security — which House Republicans made the focus of their controversial immigration reform bill — but it makes no mention of immigration policy.

Instead, space is devoted to other issues such as homeland security, energy independence, a "GI Bill of Rights," global warming, biofuels, broadband access for all Americans and lobbying reform. While homeland security has been a hot topic this election season, broadband access has not received much attention on the campaign trail.

"I'm very sad and disappointed that comprehensive immigration reform is not a key and pivotal point for the Democrats," said Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), who heads the Hispanic caucus's immigration reform task force.

Rep. Grace Napolitano (D-Calif.), the Hispanic caucus chairwoman, said she was not familiar with the new agenda document but that she would follow up on the concern expressed by Gutierrez and others. She said that the Hispanic caucus was "100 percent" unified behind the view that there needs to be comprehensive immigration reform.

"I can't give you a reason for why they have not been inclusive," said Napolitano of Democratic leaders' elevation of other issues. "I think they know it's a big issue. It will continue to be a big issue."

Several Democratic members of the steering and policy panel said that immigration was not included in the agenda because it was intended to be a "consensus document."

"What's in that document are things that there is absolute agreement on," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), another member of the Hispanic caucus.

But the agenda includes a statement on the Iraq war, an issue that has divided Democrats since Congress voted to authorize the use of force in 2002.

Cardoza countered that Democrats all agree on the statement in the agenda, which promises that Democrats will "ensure 2006 is a year of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty, with the Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country and with the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a top lieutenant to Pelosi who serves as the policy co-chairman of the steering and policy committee, said there are important issues that were not included in the agenda. But Miller acknowledged that he could not quickly think of one that rises to the same level as immigration.

Jen Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman, noted that there will be a large summit of Hispanic leaders in Washington later this month and that Democrats would unveil an agenda for it entitled, "A New Direction for Hispanic Families."

"A New Direction for America is where the Democrats will begin next Congress," said Crider, who described the agenda as a starting point, not an exhaustive list of what they will tackle.

Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, a political advocacy organization that has spent millions on drawing Hispanic voters into the Democratic Party fold, defended the Democratic record on immigration. Still, he chided leaders for their omission.

"Given how much energy and time Democrats have put into trying to pass comprehensive immigration reform, it's unfortunate that immigration hasn't made it into the document, because the party has made it a priority," said Rosenberg.

Rosenberg urged Democrats not to run away from the issue of immigration, vowing that it's a debate they will win over Republicans, many of whom are focusing exclusively on a tough law-and-order approach to illegal immigration.

Rosenberg predicted that some Democrats would spend a lot of money highlighting immigration this fall.

"We're going to see a lot of back-and-forth in paid media on immigration," he said. "We have nothing to fear. We have a plan to solve the problem and [the Republicans] don't."

Immigrants Prepare For Next Step (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Advocates working on behalf of illegal immigrants said they learned a lesson from the immigrant rights marches that fizzled over the Labor Day holiday: It's time to start driving.

During the recently concluded National Latino Congreso in Los Angeles, organizers decided to focus on voter registration drives for documented immigrants and citizenship drives for immigrants who qualify.

DOJ_NMG_0063099

Antonio GonzÃ¡lez, president of the Los Angeles-based Southwest Voter Registration Project, said 50 voter registration drives will be launched in California, Texas, New Mexico and Colorado, states with large Latino populations. In addition, 100 voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives will kick off in October, he said.

"The message from the community was to switch gears," GonzÃ¡lez said. "Now is not the time for mass mobilization of immigrants who don't have the right to vote. There has been a massive amount of intimidation, and immigrants aren't stupid. They're trying to protect themselves as best they can. It's time to get the vote out."

But opponents of illegal immigration said voter and citizenship registration drives will not reignite a movement that has stalled.

Labor Day week demonstrations that were supposed to draw hundreds of thousands of marchers in six cities drew fewer than 25,000 total. The number paled in comparison with the millions of illegal immigrants and supporters who came out in the spring for huge protests in Los Angeles, Dallas, Chicago, Phoenix and Washington.

With little political follow-up in the months after the big marches, immigrant organizers could only watch as legislation stalled in Congress to give illegal immigrants a chance to work legally and start on a path to citizenship. Meanwhile, state and city governments enacted laws targeting illegal immigrants.

Organizations working to stop illegal immigration said the big marches succeeded only in reminding U.S. citizens that the situation is out of control.

"The momentum is on the enforcement side," said Rosemary Jenks, director of government relations for NumbersUSA, a group that wants to decrease immigration. "I don't think the marches generated the spirit they were meant to generate. I think they scared Americans. It was an in-your-face reminder that we have a problem with illegal immigration. In my view, the marches were great."

At the Latino Congreso, or congress, GonzÃ¡lez and other leaders said the marches touched off the largest Latin movement in decades. In May, applications for citizenship were up by 42 percent from that time last year, and approvals rose by 21 percent, according to the Web site of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

But the leaders acknowledged that they failed to dissuade Congress from pushing forward with proposals that would make life harder for illegal immigrants. They also said the Labor Day marches fared poorly because potential marchers felt intimidated because of a government and law enforcement backlash against illegal immigrants.

The timing of the marches -- several of which happened in the middle of the week at a time when families were returning from vacation, children were back at school and the nation was remembering the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- was poor, several organizers acknowledged.

"The plan of action is to play strong defense and adamantly oppose with a variety of tactics the proposals that are coming out of Congress through November," Gonzalez said. "We will take our chances with a new Congress."

GonzÃ¡lez said activists hope to increase the number of registered Latino voters from about 8 million to 10 million.

Baldemar Velasquez, founder and president of the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, who once worked beside farmworker organizer Cesar Chavez, said Latino representatives in Washington are failing to tell Americans the story of why there are so many undocumented Mexican immigrants.

"The North American Free Trade Agreement opened up the market and put 1.3 million Mexican corn farmers out of work," he said. "Where do you think those corn farmers are now? Some of them are in Mexican slums, but a lot of them are in the United States."

The president of the Migration Policy Institute, an organization that studies immigration patterns, disagreed.

"The first part of the statement is true: Mexican farmers have lost their farms," Demetrios Papademetriou said. "But to say that those people are releasing into the United States, I think it's a gigantic leap. I certainly would not make that suggestion."

Offshore Tax Shelters Not Just For The Rich (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Type the words “offshore assets” into an Internet search engine and the electronic sales pitches of a growing mini-industry appear on the computer screen.

“At last, the kind of offshore asset protection previously available only to the extremely wealthy! Make one phone call and sleep better tonight,” says website Asset Protection Plus (assetprotec tion.ws).

DOJ_NMG_0063100

"I am going to show you how to protect your money and all you own so nobody not even the government can get at it," says U of Money.com (uofmoney.com).

"Once your assets have been transferred to an offshore entity … they are safe," says website Carib Offshore (carib-offshore.com). "You can't be taxed on them."

A network of brokers, accountants, attorneys and other providers is increasingly promoting offshore trusts and accounts as a way to avoid lawsuits, creditors and, in some cases, federal and local taxes in the USA. Riding the rapid expansion of the Internet, some parts of the mini-industry are making tax-avoidance techniques — once mainly offered to high-net-worth individuals in private conferences — available online to average Americans.

"This growing access to people who aren't wealthy and are willing to pay a $3,000 fee … to someone to help hide their assets offshore is getting to be a huge problem," says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking minority member of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which in August released the latest in a series of reports on potential offshore abuses. "Honest taxpayers get socked with the bill" as tax avoiders transfer assets offshore, Levin said.

That cost is high.

Although no precise estimates are possible, as much as $1.6 trillion in North American wealth is likely held in offshore accounts, according to a 2005 report by the Tax Justice Network, an international group opposed to tax avoidance.

Americans with assets offshore probably avoid about $50 billion in taxes annually, according to an estimate by Reuven Avi-Yonah, head of the International Tax Master of Law Program at the University of Michigan Law School.

Hundreds of companies and promoters now use the Internet to guide Americans and others who transfer assets to offshore banks or trusts, according to the Senate subcommittee report. Money moves from domestic accounts to offshore tax havens such as Belize or the Bahamas, at times without any meetings between promoter and client.

Although placing assets in international trusts and banks is not illegal, using such transfers to avoid federal, state and local taxes while retaining control of the assets is considered a possible tax violation, one that the IRS pursues.

"With the increased use of the Internet, these types of tax strategies are more easily spread," said Selva Ozelli, an international tax lawyer and accountant in New York. "It has trickled down to the middle-income level."

Among the Internet guides to offshore companies is Equity Development Group, a Dallas-based firm run by Samuel Congdon. His company has worked for about 900 clients since its founding in 1999, according to a review by the Senate subcommittee. That review, federal court records and interviews with government officials and tax experts provide an inside look at one small cog in the mini-industry.

The IRS recently completed a tax examination of Congdon and his companies and may launch a similar examination of his clients, IRS documents and federal court records in Texas show. Additionally, the Senate subcommittee subpoenaed Congdon's client list and plans to give it to federal investigators.

In a written report released in August, the subcommittee said its review of Congdon showed that he "willfully remained ignorant of his clients' motives for moving money offshore." That stance, the committee concluded, enabled him to operate "in apparent compliance with federal law while facilitating potentially illegal activity."

Congdon's attorney, A. James Lynn, described the conclusion as unfair innuendo about an honest businessman who has had no involvement with tax avoidance.

"There has been no showing that any of his clients have violated the law. And he has not violated the law," said Lynn. "He's being penalized because he's here in the United States, making a living in the United States, paying taxes in the United States, and there are some people who want to run him out of business."

Congdon founded Equity Development Group in 1999 after earning an undergraduate degree at Hillsdale College in Michigan and an MBA at Southern Methodist University. He sought a marketing edge by paying Internet search engine Google "for a top position on certain searches … to direct greater traffic to his site," the subcommittee said. Google would not comment but said many firms pay for the sponsored links that accompany search results.

"Why go offshore?" the Equity Development Group website asks. "Protection from lawsuits. Financial privacy. Regulatory advantages."

Warning that thousands of lawsuits are filed in the USA each week and citing disclosure laws, the website says, "Placing bank and brokerage accounts offshore will keep them off the asset collector's radar screen. Credit agencies and government agencies don't have access to foreign account records or transactions."

For $2,500, Equity Development Group offers a package that includes an offshore corporation formed in Belize, an offshore trust formed in the Bahamas, two offshore bank or brokerage accounts and mail forwarding for one year. Using several locations "weaves a network of anonymity which translates into rock-solid privacy and protection," the website says.

For additional security, the company also offers previously formed "shelf companies" — firms for those who want to show "that their offshore company has been in existence for several months or years" — for as much as $6,200.

In theory, use of a longstanding firm could avoid challenges that would arise if assets were shifted to a newly created offshore firm after a divorce or lawsuit notice.

Congdon told the subcommittee that most of Equity Development Group's clients come from the USA and Canada. Most contacts come via the website, which stated that the firm "has formed hundreds of offshore companies and trusts and opened hundreds of offshore bank and brokerage accounts worldwide representing millions of dollars."

That clientele enabled Congdon's firm to gross several hundred thousand dollars in 2003 and 2004 from markups on offshore packages and referrals from some international businesses, the subcommittee reported. Separately, a federal court record showed that another Congdon firm reported nearly $75,000 in taxable income for 2002.

Although Equity Development Group's website advertises that "there are no surprises or guesswork," some company details are not immediately apparent.

Although the firm identifies Congdon as its founder, the subcommittee said he is also its sole employee.

Although the firm lists offices in Dallas and the Bahamas, the subcommittee said Congdon conceded the second location is "a mailbox."

A federal court filing states that Congdon's firms neither provide nor advertise tax advice. But the Senate subcommittee found that during Congdon's first years in business, he used a presentation that said: "President Clinton vetoed the tax cut bill. Who cares? Offshore investors don't!"

The subcommittee also reported that an earlier version of the website featured an "offshore calculator" that contrasted the growth of an investment account in the USA with the higher gains that account would earn offshore. The calculator came with a disclaimer that warned, "You may be liable for taxes on foreign investments depending on your country of citizenship and/or residency."

The company's current website tells prospective clients that no matter what name is on offshore accounts formed through Equity Development Group, there's no question who controls the assets. "You do. The client is in complete and total control of all accounts at all times," the website states.

"Control is the key," said Ozelli, the tax lawyer. "If you control the assets, they're subject to taxation."

The Senate subcommittee concluded: "It is clear that Mr. Congdon knew that many of his clients moved their assets offshore to avoid U.S. taxation."

"I have no knowledge, none, that any of those clients were guilty of anything so much as a parking ticket," Lynn said.

Proving ownership and collecting taxes owed from those who have moved assets offshore isn't easy. In August testimony for the Senate subcommittee, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson wrote that the agency investigates alleged offshore tax abuses. But, wrote Everson, this "is an area where we still have a long way to go."

"The accounts are constructed in a way to make it almost impossible to prove who controls them," said James Kindler, chief assistant to Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau, who has filed numerous offshore-abuse cases.

When the IRS issued summonses for the names and addresses of Congdon's clients, Lynn filed a federal court motion to quash the demand on grounds of harassment.

If the IRS could show any clients were involved "in a tax avoidance scheme or some other violation of law" or "were committing crimes," Congdon "would promptly provide the information," the motion said.

"However, there has been no such showing."

Federal Magistrate Judge Irma Carrillo Ramirez denied the motion in a May 3 ruling that said client data were relevant to the tax examinations of Congdon and his firms. Lynn gave USA TODAY copies of IRS letters that said the exams had been completed with no new taxes levied. The IRS would not comment. A federal court brief filed in April stated that the IRS was not examining Congdon's clients at that time. But the brief said "that if the IRS had the names of the clients participating in offshore trusts it may (or may not) in the future investigate the client's tax liability."

Levin said the Senate subcommittee hopes to facilitate such an investigation by giving the subpoenaed client list to the Justice Department. He added that he and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., the subcommittee chairman, may introduce a bill to make it easier for the IRS to pursue offshore abuses.

Current law requires the federal government to prove that U.S. citizens control assets in offshore accounts before filing tax charges. Levin said the legislation he plans would reverse the legal burden.

"The presumption is that all the income is yours, and you've got to prove otherwise," Levin said.

Tyco Owes IRS $50 Million In Federal Income Taxes (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063102

Tyco International Ltd. still hasn't paid millions of dollars in federal income taxes from an allegedly false tax return filed by its chief tax adviser in 1999, the Internal Revenue Service said.

The potential $50 million tax bill potentially looming over the giant manufacturing-and-services conglomerate came to light this week as Tyco's former vice president in charge of taxation, Raymond Scott Stevenson, was charged with filing a false tax return that failed to report more than $170 million in capital gains on Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return. Mr. Stevenson pleaded not guilty to a felony fraud charge before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla.

According to the IRS, the capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill. Those taxes have not yet been paid by Tyco, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the agency's criminal division.

Ms. Michaud said that after Mr. Stevenson's expected criminal trial, the government may attempt to collect the taxes. Ms. Michaud declined to say whether the company is contesting the tax bill.

Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda and operated from West Windsor, N.J., is in the midst of executing a plan to split the sprawling conglomerate into three stand-alone companies by the first quarter of 2007.

According to the U.S. Attorney Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, who was Tyco's vice president in charge of taxation until 2003, directed a "series of transactions" designed to reduce Tyco's state liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in federal capital gains under federal tax code. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson left off the $170 million, said Ms. Michaud, adding that the investigation is continuing.

Tyco spokeswoman Stacey Lafond declined to say whether it has already taken a charge for the 1999 taxes, or plans to do so. Ms. Lafond said the company has been cooperating with an IRS audit since 2003.

Mr. Stevenson couldn't be reached for comment, and his lawyer in the criminal proceedings didn't return several phone calls.

Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., was hired under Tyco management led by former chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski, who left Tyco in June of 2002 and last year was convicted along with former finance chief Mark Swartz of looting more than $150 million from the giant company. Both men are in prison and have said they plan to appeal.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Seeks A Way To Keep Bolton At The U.N. (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

President Bush's nomination of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations appears increasingly endangered in the Senate, prompting the administration to explore other ways to keep him in the job after his temporary appointment expires in January, officials said yesterday.

The situation represents a sharp turnaround from two weeks ago, when the White House was confident it could finally push through Bolton's long-stalled nomination. But last week's surprise move by Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) to delay a vote convinced Republicans on Capitol Hill that the nomination may be doomed, prompting a search for alternatives.

Administration officials said they have not given up. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Chafee yesterday to kick off a lobbying campaign that will continue today when he returns to Washington after his hard-fought Republican primary victory in Rhode Island on Tuesday.

Bush and national Republicans pulled out the stops to help Chafee win the primary, and they expect a payback. But with Chafee now preparing to face a strong Democratic challenger in a Democratic state in November, many Republicans said he has less incentive to support a firebrand figure such as Bolton.

"It's dead as far as the Senate is concerned," said one Republican official at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where Chafee holds the decisive vote. "Chafee made it a 9 to 9 vote, and that's not going to change." A Senate Republican leadership aide added: "Chafee holds Bolton's future in his hands, and people are very worried he's going to squeeze and never let go."

White House officials said that assessment is premature. "John Bolton's been a tireless advocate for the United States at the U.N.," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "We continue to be confident he'll get the up-or-down vote he deserves, and it remains our goal that the vote would happen before the recess."

Another failed nomination would be a stinging defeat for Bush, who defied Senate opposition last year and installed Bolton at the United Nations on an interim basis with a recess appointment. That appointment will end in January unless the Senate votes to confirm him before adjourning for the year.

The battle over Bolton has been a defining struggle that has put the Bush administration's often brash style of foreign policy to the test. Bolton, who served as undersecretary of state in Bush's first term, has been a lightning rod among diplomats, Democrats and some Republicans because of his outspoken, tough-minded approach to issues such as Iran, the Middle East and the United Nations itself.

But in the 13 months since he was sent to New York, Bolton has surprised some critics with a more consensus-building style than they expected. Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who played a central role in blocking the nomination last year, reversed course this summer, declaring himself impressed by Bolton's performance -- seemingly clearing the way to confirmation.

Chafee put a halt to that last week by saying he would not vote for Bolton until after the administration addresses questions on Middle East policy that he had sent in a letter to Rice. Taken aback, White House officials hoped that it was merely a tactic to put off a controversial vote until after the primary, while preparing contingencies in case it was not.

Even with a "no" vote from Chafee, the Foreign Relations Committee could send the nomination to the floor on a tie vote, but Republicans would probably face a Democratic filibuster.

Bush has the power to give Bolton a second recess appointment, but under the common interpretation of federal law, Bolton could not be paid. Even if Bolton were willing to serve as a volunteer ambassador, officials said, the move could run afoul of another federal law that bans full-time employees from working without compensation.

Another possible option might be an appointment as "acting" ambassador. When the confirmation of President Bill Clinton's nominee for civil rights chief at the Justice Department, Bill Lann Lee, was blocked, Clinton appointed him deputy assistant attorney general, a posting that does not require Senate approval, and then had Lee fill in as "acting assistant attorney general." Lee spent 2 1/2 years in the post that way, although current law limits acting tenures to 210 days.

Such a move could anger a Senate that zealously guards its prerogatives.

"I don't think John Bolton has too many options but to go home," said Paul C. Light, a governance scholar at the Brookings Institution. "At some point, he has to decide whether he has to go."

Chafee's office said he has not decided how to vote. But an adviser outlined the difficult choice: "Politically it's a no-win for the senator. He votes against it, and he hurts the Republicans who just helped him in a primary in a very, very tight race. . . . And he votes for it, he hurts himself with the Democrats that he needs in November."

Earmark Showdown Set To Hit The Floor (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

With Republican leaders and House appropriators deadlocked over the scope of earmark reform, the leadership is on course for a showdown with the spending panel as the resolution is scheduled for a potentially close floor vote today.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the Appropriations Committee, said that another meeting of the panel on Wednesday again failed to result in an agreement on how reforms are applied to spending, tax and authorizing bills.

In particular, appropriators do not believe that the current proposal fairly applies the leadership-backed reforms to bills generated from the Ways and Means Committee as it does to appropriations bills. “Our members are fairly unanimous,” Scofield said.

“Whatever we do should apply to all committees,” added Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), a former Appropriations chairman, noting that he did not object to the principal of disclosure for earmarks.

Even though the House is set to vote on the GOP leadership’s proposal today, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) is planning to hold a full-committee mark-up next week for the panel to institute its own set of internal committee rule changes that would similarly require the sponsors of earmarks to be disclosed in committee reports.

The mark-up announcement suggests that appropriators are prepared to vote against the rule — potentially endangering GOP leaders ability to pass the reforms.

At press time Wednesday, House Majority Leader John Boehner’s (R-Ohio) office had not wavered, and the resolution remained on the schedule for today.

A spokeswoman for Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said there would be no formal whip effort on earmark reform. Similarly, a spokeswoman for Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Democrats would not formally whip against the rule.

However, a Democratic leadership aide suggested that they may put pressure on their members to vote against the measure if it becomes clear that Democratic votes are necessary to pass it.

“If they want to bring political bills to the floor, then we will vote politically,” the aide said, noting that Democrats support earmark reform but argued that the GOP bill is only a fig leaf to appease the conservative base.

Appropriators have not objected to disclosing earmarks included in their spending bills, but believe that the panel has been unfairly targeted on the issue.

The panel sent a counterproposal to leadership that would, among other things, increase disclosure requirements for the Ways and Means Committee, which appropriators believe "got a pass" in the reform debate, according to an aide sympathetic with the committee.

However, a GOP aide familiar with the appropriators' counterproposal said several of the suggested reforms were impractical. For instance, one proposal would expand earmark reform to potentially affect trade agreements, creating a point of order the aide deemed "unworkable" and unlikely to muster any support among the tax-writing panel.

"There is just a fundamental disagreement on what an earmark is," the aide said, arguing that Lewis' decision to hold a mark-up next week contradicts his past commitment to reform. "It undermines their contention that it needs to be comprehensive if they are just going to change their internal rules," the aide said.

The impact of earmark reform would disproportionately affect the Appropriations Committee, but advocates of reform are quick to note that most earmarks are generated from spending bills.

Failure to pass the rule today would not only be an embarrassment for Boehner and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) — who committed the House to enacting this rules change in late July — but it would likely agitate fiscal conservatives in the Conference and outside reform advocates who have supported reining in the earmark process.

Despite Pledges, Congress Clings To Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — Nine months after Congressional leaders vowed to respond to several bribery scandals with comprehensive reforms, their pledges have come to next to nothing.

On Wednesday, leaders of the House prepared to take up a rule requiring individual lawmakers to sign their names to some of the pet projects they tuck into major tax and spending bills. As an internal House rule, the requirement would be in effect only until the end of the session, just a few weeks away.

While reform advocates denounced the proposal as nearly toothless, its bite was still too sharp for many in Congress. By Wednesday night the resolution appeared to be bogged down in a three-way squabble among Republicans, Democrats and the powerful members of the House Appropriations Committee.

"It has been a very pathetic showing," said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for the reform group Common Cause. Even with one congressman in jail, a well-known lobbyist on the way and several other members and staff members still under investigation, she said: "The response to this has been nothing. It has been silence."

The resolution was a chance for House Republican leaders to make good on at least some element of their pledges in January, when Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, declared his party's agenda at risk "because of a growing perception that Congress is for sale" and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois declared that "now is the time for action."

The Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff had recently pleaded guilty to paying bribes to members of Congress, including treating some to a lavish golf trip to Scotland. Former Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California, had pleaded guilty to accepting bribes from a military contractor. Both scandals involved lobbyists paying bribes for "earmarks" — the special interest projects inserted into major spending bills by individual lawmakers, often anonymously and with little scrutiny. House Republican attempts at new rules have been dismissed as paltry by both reform advocates and Democrats. Mr. Hastert initially called for a ban on all Congressional travel at private expense and tightening the limits on lobbyists' gifts to lawmakers and staff (the current limit is $50, or $250 if the recipient is considered a friend). Others pushed for doubling the one-year waiting period before departing lawmakers and staff members can lobby their former colleagues.

But the lobbying reform bill that passed the House this year was scaled back to drop all these ideas. Instead, it focused on requiring lobbyists to disclose more of their dealings with members and staffs. The Senate passed a very different bill, and aides in both chambers say they are not expected to be reconciled into a final bill this year.

The final thrust of the House reform agenda was a measure to address earmarks — a favorite idea of Mr. Boehner. He initially called for substantive restrictions on their insertion in spending bills but eventually settled for a measure to at least illuminate the murky practice by requiring the public identification of the member who sought each earmark.

But the Republican leaders' draft resolution defined earmarks only as funds for organizations outside the federal government, like cities, universities, museums or nonprofit groups. It would not apply to earmarks directing money to the Defense Department or other federal agencies to execute projects, which account for the vast majority of the federal money spent on earmarks.

Some called the proposed rule almost pointless since members are often eager to boast of the earmarks they secure for constituents. "There is an element you can't legislate, and that is shame," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona and a frequent critic of earmarks. "You have got to have some embarrassment when you bring to the floor an earmark for the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame."

But the members of the House Appropriations Committee found even that too onerous. The appropriators, who have authority over all federal discretionary spending, objected from the start that the Republican leaders were unfairly singling out their favored projects without imposing the same level of scrutiny on the special interest provisions that other committees tuck into tax bills or other laws.

On Wednesday afternoon, Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, convened a meeting of the 64-member committee to consider a draft of the proposed rule. Although the Republican leaders had added some new requirements for disclosure by tax committees and others, the appropriators deemed them inadequate. (Mr. Lewis's ties to a lobbyist who procured earmarks are currently under scrutiny by federal investigators; he has said he did nothing wrong.)

After the meeting, the appropriators demanded changes and threatened to oppose the resolution, said John Scofield, a spokesman for the committee. "We delivered a message to the leaders that we are not there yet," Mr. Scofield said, adding that the committee plans to consider earmark disclosure requirements of its own next week.

House Democrats, meanwhile, submitted a proposed amendment to the Republican resolution that was so comprehensive it would upend much of the way Washington does business — and thus was all but certain to fail.

The Democratic proposal would block members of Congress from sponsoring earmarks that would benefit any former staff members or family members. Many Congressional staff members and lawmakers' relatives eventually work as lobbyists, and the proposal would limit their ability to make money for seeking earmarks for their clients.

Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for the Republican-controlled House rules committee, said the committee rejected the proposal as too broadly worded and "poorly thought out."

Although it is unlikely that such a far-reaching proposal could pass a vote of the Democratic caucus, its rejection by the Republicans could give the Democrats a pretext for opposing the Republicans' milder reform proposal as too weak.

"Transparency is not enough," said Representative Chris Van Hollen, Democrat of Maryland, who was a sponsor of the proposal. "You can't be pushing for earmarks that are a clear conflict of interest." Asked if he believed most Democrats would support his measure, Mr. Van Hollen challenged Republicans to put it to a vote.

If Democrats and the Republican appropriators are opposed to the resolution, it would stand little chance of passing.

Late Wednesday night, Ms. Maney of the Rules committee said the panel was meeting to work out technical changes.

But Fred Wertheimer, president of the reform advocacy group Democracy 21, called the dispute over the scaled-back earmark rule "absurd."

"They have had months to reach an agreement even among House Republicans about what this fig leaf should look like," he said, "and they still haven't been able to do it."

Lewis Balks At Earmark Legislation (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 14, 2006

House Republican appropriators remained unwilling yesterday to publicly endorse their leadership's resolution requiring disclosure of earmark sponsors, setting up a possible rebellion by committee members that could bring down the resolution.

Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) huddled with his panel yesterday afternoon but emerged with no firm panel-wide plan to oppose the earmark-reform resolution. Many GOP appropriators believe the resolution singles out their committee's product while applying a narrow definition of tax and authorizing earmarks.

"We are attempting to communicate with leadership that this committee feels very strongly that earmark reform is a priority, but it should apply to everybody," Lewis said after the meeting. "We feel very strongly that... the broad-based membership should be involved in it, not just the Appropriations Committee."

Lewis and other appropriators stressed that the panel would stay unified even as today's slated floor vote looms and the pressure mounts to give leadership a win heading into the midterm elections. Reps. John Sweeney (R-N.Y.) and Don Sherwood (R-Pa.), who are members of the panel, said appropriators were of one mind on the resolution.

"We're still having concerns that it doesn't apply to all committees," Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said. The pension bill that passed the House in July, he added, "had a number of very positive provisions in it for different companies" that would not be deemed an earmark according to the reform resolution, drafted by House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.)

DOJ_NMG_0063106

That resolution would allow the Joint Committee on Taxation to determine tax earmarks because of scoring demands. A Rules Committee summary defines a tax earmark as "any revenue-losing provision that provides a Federal tax deduction, credit, exclusion, or preference to only one beneficiary."

Authorizing earmarks are defined similarly to appropriations earmarks in the summary, as provisions that "permit funds to be allocated outside of the normal formula-driven or competitive bidding process and to be targeted to a specific entity, State, or Congressional district."

Republican Appropriations staff distributed a paper last week explaining loopholes in the language that would allow members of the tax and authorizing committees to avoid the restrictions that would hamstring appropriators.

Particularly galling was a section that, they argue, allows tax writers ostensibly to define what is and what is not an earmark.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) dismissed that concern yesterday following a lunch with members of his committee.

To ease passage, Republican leaders have coupled the rule for the bill with the language of the resolution itself. This prevents opponents from bringing down the earmark changes on a procedural vote and, in essence, dares them to vote against legislation to stem government spending.

This showdown comes two months before the November election and puts GOP leaders in the awkward position of angering the Appropriations chairman as those same leaders roll out a series of measures to beef up security on the border that are supposed to be included in the annual spending bills.

The fight also endangers party unity on the brink of the midterms. As appropriators held their meeting, Republican Study Committee (RSC) leaders held a rally on the Cannon Terrace to tout the resolution as a first step toward more comprehensive reform.

RSC Chairman Mike Pence (R-Ind.) tied the resolution into the GOP's election message of fiscal responsibility: "The answer is not more big-spending liberals, the answer is more conservative Republicans."

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who has forced numerous floor votes to kill individual member earmarks, recalled the RSC's attention-grabbing "Operation Offset" plan to cut federal spending, which help push through last year's $47 billion budget-cutting reconciliation bill.

"You can do all that and have one Bridge to Nowhere that in the public mind trumps everything," Flake said, warning that "the public recognizes [earmarks] as a Congress out of control."

Republican appropriators have not universally supported the position of Lewis and committee staff.

During a meeting last week, committee members, including Reps. John Carter (R-Texas) and Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.), recommended that their colleagues pass an internal committee rule to deal with the earmark issue, said one member present. That move might preempt leaders from bringing a broader bill to the floor.

At the same meeting, Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) told members they should support the leadership language, the same member said. Others stood with Lewis in objecting to the changes.

"It's not what they told us they were going to do," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who has been a vocal critic of the conservative members who are leading this fight. "[The leaders] told us all the committees would be treated the same," he added, referring to a deal struck with appropriators in May to secure their votes for a lobbying-reform package now stalled in conference.

LaHood doubted the rules change would have any resonance with voters this campaign season.

"I think the elections will be about the war in Iraq and the war on terror," LaHood said after emerging from the meeting. "I don't think we're going to rise or fall on this."

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), an appropriator who serves in the leadership, has been the chief negotiator between the committee and the House leaders during the last two weeks, members said.

At least one Republican legislator yesterday questioned the wisdom of Lewis waging a battle on earmark reform given the ongoing federal investigation on whether or not he used his influence illegally to insert earmarks on spending bills that would benefit the clients of his friends and/or former staff.

"I have never seen a member more unaware of his own personal situation," one Republican said yesterday.

Lewis has denied any wrongdoing and the Justice Department has not charged any members, staff or lobbyists with illegal activity on the issue.

Leadership may be hoping to peel off enough Democrats to compensate for the loss of appropriators' votes on the earmark-reform plan. One senior House Democratic aide, however, said little whipping is expected on the earmark resolution despite Republican assumptions that most members of the minority will oppose it.

DOJ_NMG_0063107

The June vote on a line-item veto bill from RSC member Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) saw 35 Democrats voting with the GOP, including 16 members of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. Eight appropriators, including Lewis, were among the 15 Republicans voting against the line-item veto.

"This legislation is not what we would hope for," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "It doesn't save a single dollar, doesn't cut a single earmark, doesn't give full disclosure."

Congress Lifts Blinds On Its Spending (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Coming soon to a laptop near you: how government is spending your federal tax dollars - contracts, grants, and special projects sought by lawmakers.

From wartime contracts for Halliburton to earmarks for the Punxsutawney Weather Discovery Center (think "famous groundhog") in Pennsylvania, all will be listed on a searchable database.

It's the least controversial of all the reforms Congress has considered since last year's bribery and corruption scandals, and its passage will provide an effective new tool for anyone wanting to look over lawmakers' shoulders soon after they clear spending bills.

"This is an extraordinary step for Congress to take, because it will put government information into the hands of millions of citizens who use the Internet as a source of information," says Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a public-interest group that promotes transparency in government. "The notion of government information on the Internet in the 21st-century ought to be a no-brainer."

It took a mobilization of bloggers and citizen groups to break secret holds placed on the bill in the Senate, where the bill passed unanimously Sept. 7. It was expected to clear the House after press time Thursday with broad bipartisan support.

The bill, sponsored by Sens. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma and Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, requires the White House Office of Management & Budget to maintain a database on some $1 trillion in US spending. New entries will be logged within 30 days of funds being disbursed. Senate majority leader Bill Frist last week credited the "blogosphere" for saving the bill.

"This can be a very powerful tool in the hands of citizens," says Stephen Ellis, vice president of programs for Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan budget watchdog group in Washington. "It will be the gold standard of information for debates over whether this is worthwhile spending or not."

Since last March, when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) of California was convicted of taking bribes, Congress has struggled to find agreement on how to reform ethics and lobbying rules, without success. The big lobby-reform bills remain deadlocked between the House and Senate.

The next battle, expected in the House Thursday, is over how much members of Congress and the public will know about the earmarks tacked onto spending bills before they come up for a vote. Sensing rising public objection to earmarks, appropriators in the House and Senate have instituted their own procedural reforms for fiscal year 2007 spending bills.

For example, appropriators are limiting the number of projects members can propose, as well as making the projects more visible to the public earlier in the process. In the House, member requests for projects this year declined 37 percent, or about $7.5 billion, from last year. House appropriators are also often requiring a local spending match for some economic-development earmarks, a move they say will discourage frivolous projects.

"We were getting about 25 requests per member. Now it's an average of 10," says John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee. "It helps us to do better oversight and weed out the bad ones." In addition, House appropriators say they will avoid adding earmarks when House and Senate conferees reconcile two versions of a spending bill - a source of abuse in the past.

While Appropriations Committee members have borne much of the criticism for earmarking, the practice exists in other committees as well. Congress included 6,373 earmarks in the last highway bill, amounting to $24.2 billion. The recent Water Research Development Act included 250 earmarks at a cost of $11 billion. As of press time, the House version of earmark reform still applied mainly to the Appropriations Committee.

"There ought to be a blanket provision with respect to earmarks - whether on taxes, healthcare, defense, or appropriations," says Ms. Miller.

Still, reformers say the searchable database is a key first step. "We see this like the battle in the Pacific in World War II: You take one island at a time," says John Hart, spokesman for Senator Coburn.

Critics, though, note that even the Coburn transparency reform doesn't get to the root of the problem. "The information comes 30 days after the funds are spent. That's about 60 days too late," says Winslow Wheeler, director of the Straus Military

Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information here. "We still lack an objective assessment of the spending." Spending accountability: a work in progress

A done deal

The Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act, already approved by the Senate, was expected to clear the House on Wednesday. It does the following:

· Creates a database that names recipients and dollar amounts of most federal grants, contracts, and loans. These will be searchable online and available to the public.

· Identifies so-called pork-barrel projects, or earmarks, in the searchable database. The database will not necessarily name lawmakers who added an earmark, but it will reveal the congressional district where the federal money will go.

· Gives the White House Office of Management & Budget the job of managing the online database.

Onworking

The House is wrangling over a rule change that would do the following:

· Identify lawmakers adding earmarks to bills - in advance of a vote on the bill. In dispute is whether the rule change applies just to Appropriations Committee members or to other committees.

FEMA Overhaul Debate Stalls Funds For Interoperable Radios (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

House Republicans are blocking an attempt to spend $3.1 billion to help the nation's police and fire agencies communicate in emergencies as Congress debates a proposed overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

As both parties intensified the election-season rhetoric over national security, Democrats accused GOP leaders of shortchanging the well-documented need to improve communication among first responders. Republicans acknowledged that they do not want to spend billions prematurely, saying more planning and coordination are needed.

"It is just so unfair for the White House not to support the full funding of solving the interoperability problem," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), ranking Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff rebuffed calls for dedicated federal grants to upgrade equipment, coordinate plans, train emergency workers and adapt common technology standards. Instead, he said, state and local leaders must first agree on radio codes and protocols.

"This is not, frankly, a technology issue," Chertoff told the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs on Tuesday. "This is an issue of having community leaders come to an agreement."

The inability of police and firefighters to talk by radio was a critical factor after the 2001 World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks, according to the Sept. 11 commission.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors reports that 23 percent of the nation's 60,000 police and fire departments cannot communicate with each other over the radio, one-third cannot talk to county sheriffs, and most cannot talk to state or federal agencies. Governors and state homeland security advisers say the issue is their top priority, according to the National Governors Association.

At the end of this year, the federal government was supposed to make available to first responders a slice of the broadcast spectrum now held by television broadcasters. Congress has changed the deadline to June 2009 and set aside $1 billion for gear.

The Department of Homeland Security has provided $2.1 billion to states and localities since 2003. But congressional analysts say that annual grants are not enough and that "several billions" will be needed to upgrade the nation's $100 billion infrastructure for public safety communications.

The federal government has been slow to set gear and technology standards, which private companies also resist for proprietary reasons. Local governments often fail to plan or train together or to coordinate major equipment purchases.

For now, the Department of Homeland Security has provided equipment to the nation's 10 highest-threat cities that enables commanders to patch into each other's radio systems. The department is surveying the 50 states and the 75 largest urban areas before taking the next steps.

"I would hesitate to dedicate a huge amount of money upfront without the input of the localities themselves to make a determination of what they feel they need and how far they've come," Chertoff said.

Earlier this year, a bipartisan Senate bill to overhaul FEMA after Hurricane Katrina proposed $3.3 billion over five years in interoperable communications grants. The bill was approved in committee, but the money was dropped when GOP leaders decided to include the FEMA overhaul in a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill. Thompson said his efforts to revive the proposal have been rebuffed.

DOJ_NMG_0063109

Yesterday, state emergency management officials and congressional aides said talks have bogged down over funding and jurisdictional fights, including whether to rename FEMA and whether to bring the nation's disaster laws in line with recommendations made in post-Katrina government reports.

Obama And Coburn Revive Effort To Stop No-bid FEMA Contracts (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 14, 2006

Having scored a high-profile victory on their bill to set up an online federal spending database, the unlikely freshman duo of Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) are hoping their fourth bid to crack down on no-bid contracting at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) will finally make it to the president's desk.

The Senate has passed four versions this year of Obama and Coburn's language requiring FEMA to accept competitive bids for hurricane reconstruction contracts valued above $500,000, but both chambers have yet to give their plan the force of law. As conferees near agreement on the defense authorization bill amid election-year pressures to appear tough on wasteful spending, the freshmen are pushing for their block on no-bids to emerge in the conference report.

"Everything we have seen about the Katrina rebuilding effort shows this is something that should have been initiated right away," Coburn spokesman John Hart said. "The closer you get to the election, the more members of Congress will want to demonstrate to the public that they are fiscally responsible."

Few senators have as much political capital on fiscal responsibility as Coburn, who riled some of his more seasoned colleagues by attempting to force votes on individual earmarks in the spring emergency supplemental. Perhaps unsurprisingly, an Obama and Coburn amendment enforcing competitive bidding at FEMA that passed the Senate unanimously was later left off of the conference report on that emergency supplemental.

But the landscape has shifted in recent weeks since Obama and Coburn's plan for an Internet listing of federal grants and contracts sparked an avalanche of blogger publicity and won public support from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). The House was poised to approve the Senate version of that bill yesterday, giving the senators new political capital at a crucial moment.

"Call it 'Groundhog Day' legislating if you want, but it's something that is very important to both of them," Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said, riffing on the popular film about living through the same day repeatedly. "If it's not [included in the conference report], we will be frustrated and we will offer it again."

Obama and Coburn wrote to FEMA director David Paulison last month after viewing reports that the four main no-bid contracts awarded for emergency housing of residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina had bloated from $400 million to $3.4 billion. Paulison had echoed the senators' qualms about no-bid abuse during private meetings in December and May, but the four contracts — given to Bechtel Corp., Fluor, the Shaw Group and CH2M Hill — were not reopened for bidding despite the agency's initial promises to that effect.

"While FEMA cannot comment on pending legislation, FEMA director Paulison has reiterated in public and in front of the Senate Homeland Committee that he is 'no fan of no-bid contracts,'" FEMA national spokesman Aaron Walker said. "We would welcome any dialogue to increase the competitive nature of our contracting and procurement policies."

More momentum for Obama and Coburn's amendment could come from a report on Katrina no-bid contracts released by a team of House Democrats a to coincide with the one-year anniversary of the disaster last month. That investigation, led by Government Reform Committee ranking Democrat Henry Waxman (Calif.), found that 70 percent of FEMA's Katrina contracts affected by the Obama-Coburn amendment were awarded with incompletely open competition.

The four businesses receiving the largest Katrina no-bids recently won new contracts for Katrina housing that were competitively bid, and the FEMA amendment was not discussed publicly following the most recent defense authorization conference meeting. But Obama and Coburn, who are also continuing to push their proposal for a chief financial officer to monitor spending on the Gulf Coast, plan to keep leveraging their lack of seniority for more public attention on their cause.

"Sometimes freshmen can be more in touch with what people are thinking," Hart said. "There is plenty of evidence that the longer people are in Washington, the less responsive they become."

NIH Punishments Criticized (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Angry members of Congress took federal health officials to task yesterday for what they said was a pattern of being "soft" on government scientists found to have violated ethics rules.

DOJ_NMG_0063110

One National Institutes of Health scientist is still on the job a year after the agency determined he had improperly accepted more than $700,000 in consulting fees -- and has taken recent trips to Switzerland and Hawaii on the government's tab -- lawmakers said at a hearing.

Another researcher is still at NIH after investigators found he had improperly accepted about $100,000 from more than 25 companies, members complained.

And although six NIH scientists deemed to have broken ethics rules left their jobs in the past year or so before disciplinary action could be taken, not one of the remaining 36 violators identified in an NIH-wide investigation was fired -- and most have endured punishment no more severe than a "letter of caution."

"I do recognize that NIH has taken needed steps to improve its ethics program," said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, which for years has been dogging NIH over alleged ethics violations. "But more action is needed."

Agency officials denied that they have been less than rigorous in meting out punishment to those who broke the rules that once governed such arrangements. NIH banned all outside consulting with drug and biotech companies more than a year ago, when it became clear that a few dozen had not reported their arrangements as required.

NIH Deputy Director Raynard Kington said that at the conclusion of its investigation, NIH began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others to the Office of Inspector General for possible prosecution. That office decided to pursue only two -- Alzheimer's disease researcher Trey Sunderland and cancer researcher Thomas Walsh.

But while NIH officials long ago expressed a desire to fire those two, neither the inspector general nor NIH has the power to do so because both scientists are members of the Public Health Service's Commissioned Corps. The corps' disciplinary rules -- including the right to a formal corps hearing -- trump NIH's.

Sunderland's corps hearing has been delayed indefinitely at the request of the Justice Department, which is considering criminal charges, according to testimony yesterday by John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health. Walsh's hearing has been delayed because it was awaiting completion of Sunderland's. Last week the corps decided to bump Walsh's case ahead of Sunderland's and began to organize a hearing for him, Agwunobi said.

Meanwhile, both researchers have continued to work at NIH, with travel and other job restrictions imposed only recently in the wake of fresh congressional inquiries. So lax has oversight of Sunderland's activities been, legislators said, that NIH did not stop him from recently shipping -- at government expense -- personal belongings to a New York hospital where he had hoped to continue his research. Those belongings were returned to Bethesda after the lapse was detected, an NIH spokesman said, again at government expense.

Several members complained that the punishments doled out to violators were not tough enough. Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.) pointed to one case in which a researcher was found to have received nearly $475,000 without proper approval or disclosure and received a penalty of a 45-day suspension without pay.

"So where is the deterrent?" Stupak asked, calculating aloud to show that the scientist still came out ahead financially. "What does it take to get an NIH scientist terminated?"

NIH officials responded that in some cases, including that one, punishment was less than might seem appropriate because although the researcher did not report the income properly, the outside work was found to have posed no conflict of interest and would have been approved under the rules in place then.

Undaunted, Stupak asked why federal scientists cannot maintain the same ethical standards as members of Congress. Often, he said, legislators get letters in the mail with a dollar bill inside to encourage them to reply. "Do you know what would happen to any of us," Stupak asked, "if we kept that dollar?"

Panel Challenges NIH Handling Of Rules Violations (LAT)

By David Willman

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A congressional subcommittee chairman and a top administrator of the National Institutes of Health agreed on at least one point Wednesday: Private financial deals between drug companies and NIH scientists that have come to light in recent years have posed the worst scandal in the agency's history.

"This is the largest scandal in all of the NIH's existence," said Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on investigations. To which NIH Deputy Director Raynard S. Kington nodded and replied, "We certainly hope it will be the last."

Citing internal ethics investigations over the last three years, Kington said the agency had disciplined 34 NIH scientists who had violated conflict-of-interest rules. Six scientists were suspended or placed on probation and the others were admonished orally or by letter, according to NIH documents.

NIH officials also assured the panel that they had recommended the termination of two other senior scientists who accepted drug company money without obtaining required advance approval.

"When violations were found, NIH implemented sanctions ranging from oral admonishments to letters of reprimand to suspensions," Kington told the subcommittee. "In all cases where individual scientists failed to take [personal] leave to conduct outside activities, they were directed to pay back that leave to the government."

But Kington's assurances were challenged by Republicans and Democrats on the subcommittee. They noted that despite previous statements of concern and outrage from senior NIH officials, no employee had been fired, and they said most of the disciplinary actions had been tepid.

The session marked the sixth congressional hearing since January 2004 that centered on NIH conflicts of interest.

"This is really an ethical Potemkin village, where a hollow system appears to provide the illusion of integrity, but transgressors never leave," said Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Much of the contentious afternoon session focused on two researchers: Dr. P. Trey Sunderland III, a geriatric psychiatrist who has researched Alzheimer's disease, and Dr. Thomas J. Walsh, who has researched fungal diseases in cancer patients.

Their cases are pending before an administrator at the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a uniformed branch of the service. A resolution of Sunderland's case has been delayed because of a separate investigation by the U.S. Justice Department, Bush administration officials said.

Panel members pointed out that Sunderland had been allowed until last month to retain most of his NIH privileges and that he had taken several trips at the expense of the government, visiting Hawaii and Geneva.

At a congressional hearing in June, Sunderland's boss, Dr. Thomas R. Insel, director of the National Institute of Mental Health, said Sunderland's receipt of more than $600,000 in fees from Pfizer Inc. was unacceptable.

Yet Barton said Wednesday that several months earlier, Insel had "recommended a $15,000 retention bonus" for Sunderland.

Barton and other subcommittee members also said that Sunderland had shipped samples of spinal fluid drawn from patients at the NIH to a New York hospital, where he had intended to take a new position. Those samples were returned in recent months after the shipments came under fire from the congressional panel. Officials said the samples should not have been transferred out of NIH custody.

Barton chided Dr. John O. Agwunobi, the Bush administration's assistant secretary for health, for not demanding swift resolution of the Sunderland case. "You're sittin' on your bottom, and you're not doing anything about it," Barton said, adding that Sunderland had been allowed to flout rules with impunity. "It's a farce."

In Walsh's case, the researcher accepted about $100,000 in fees from drug companies without required advance permission. On Wednesday, Barton criticized the director of the National Cancer Institute, Dr. John Niederhuber, as doing little to address Walsh's conduct except to recommend termination by the Commissioned Corps.

Niederhuber confirmed that he had recommended in December that Walsh be fired. But Niederhuber also lauded Walsh as "probably the world's expert on antifungal agents."

Documents distributed at Wednesday's hearing suggested that Walsh was paid $12,000 by Pfizer to help prepare the company for an October 2001 meeting held by a Food and Drug Administration advisory committee. Walsh had collaborated with the company in leading a major study of its antifungal drug, Vfend.

The NIH recently opened a separate internal review of Walsh's appearances with pharmaceutical companies at public and private FDA meetings. Merck & Co. identified Walsh as a consultant when he appeared at a January 2001 FDA advisory committee meeting that focused on the company's new antifungal drug. Walsh vouched for the effectiveness of Merck's drug, and the committee voted unanimously to recommend its approval.

Kington told the subcommittee on Wednesday that the NIH was now "clarifying its policies regarding the presentation of scientific information" to FDA advisory committees.

U.S. conflict-of-interest law generally prohibits a federal employee from representing an outside party before a government agency. Walsh and his attorneys have said he did not make any appearance before the FDA as a representative of any company.

In addition to all of the internal reviews, Kington noted that a policy enacted last year prohibits all NIH employees from accepting consulting fees, stock or stock options from drug companies. The previous rules allowed agency scientists to accept unlimited sums of compensation from industry.

A July 2005 report by the U.S. Office of Government Ethics concluded that the NIH was infused with a "permissive culture." Kington said Wednesday that agency officials were confident that the problems were a thing of the past, "with new restrictions in place and a more efficient and rigorous ethics program underway."

The subcommittee members appeared unconvinced.

"I believe that the tentacles of the drug companies influence the research at NIH, much to the consternation of the American people," said Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.).

Head Of Broadcasts Board Survives Effort To Oust Him (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, the embattled chairman of the federal board that oversees most government broadcasts to foreign countries, narrowly survived an effort to oust him on Wednesday.

After a recent report by the inspector general at the State Department that Mr. Tomlinson had used his office to run a horse-racing operation and that he had improperly put a friend on the payroll, the three Democratic members of the seven-member Broadcasting Board of Governors offered two resolutions.

One resolution called for his resignation as chairman during a continuing inquiry; the other sought to curtail his authority sharply. The Justice Department has declined to pursue a criminal investigation but is conducting a related civil inquiry.

Both resolutions failed 3 to 3 on party-line votes. Mr. Tomlinson did not participate in the votes, people involved in the closed-door session said.

Mr. Tomlinson has denied doing anything improper and had said the investigation "was inspired by partisan divisions inside the Broadcasting Board of Governors." Mr. Tomlinson, whose term has expired, has been nominated for a second term and continues to have the support of the White House.

Republicans in the Senate said that in light of the continuing inquiry, they would not bring his nomination to the floor this year. Under federal law, board members may continue to serve past the expiration of their appointments until successors are named.

The board oversees a group of broadcasting operations to more than 100 million listeners abroad. The operations include Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and Radio Martí.

Last year, Mr. Tomlinson was ousted from the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting after a report by that agency's inspector general. In that report, the inspector general said he had found evidence that Mr. Tomlinson violated rules intended to insulate public television and radio from political influence.

The three Democrats who voted Wednesday in favor of the resolutions — Joaquin F. Blaya, D. Jeffrey Hirschberg and Edward E. Kaufman — said in a statement that the "independent report of the inspector general," rather than partisanship, had prompted the resolutions.

There was no statement from the three Republicans who supported Mr. Tomlinson. They are Karen P. Hughes, the under secretary of state for public diplomacy, who serves as the representative for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Steven J. Simmons; and Blanquita Walsh Cullum.

All of the governors were appointed by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

In a statement issued by a board spokesman, Mr. Tomlinson said, "Surely reasonable people should conclude that it is time to move on."

Broadcast Board Refuses To Oust Bush Nominee (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Democratic members of the federal Broadcasting Board of Governors yesterday failed in a bid to remove Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, who has been accused of improperly using his office to benefit himself and a friend.

In two party-line votes, the BBG's three Republicans and three Democrats first split over forcing Mr. Tomlinson to resign and then over revoking his authority to run the agency that oversees Voice of America and other government broadcasting operations.

"This was clearly a partisan effort," said board member Blanquita Cullum, who supports Mr. Tomlinson, a conservative stalwart who was appointed to the post by President Bush. "The move was planned to usurp the authority of President Bush and the Senate."

Republicans said Democratic board member Jeffrey Hirschberg, who called for the votes, is engaging in a partisan attack, citing his financial ties to liberal figures such as former President Bill Clinton.

Since 1999, Mr. Hirschberg has given nearly $100,000 to Democratic candidates and organizations, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, according to public campaign-finance records.

DOJ_NMG_0063113

Mr. Hirschberg's brother, Judd Blair Hirschberg, who was convicted of mail fraud in 1991, was one of 59 persons pardoned by Mr. Clinton in December 2000, shortly before he left office.

"It is incorrect for Ken Tomlinson to characterize his problems as caused by 'partisan divisions inside the BBG,' " read a statement released by Mr. Hirschberg and fellow board members Joaquin F. Blaya and Edward E. Kaufman.

"It is the independent report of the Inspector General, which is the cause of his problems."

A State Department inspector-general investigation, called for by Democratic legislators, accuses Mr. Tomlinson of running a "horse-racing operation" from his BBG office and said he "improperly put a friend on the payroll." Mr. Tomlinson runs a stable of thoroughbred racehorses on his private farm in Virginia.

The results of the investigation were turned over to the Justice Department, which has declined to press charges against Mr. Tomlinson. According to the IG report, Mr. Tomlinson spent fewer than three minutes and sent one e-mail per day on his horse-racing ventures.

Mr. Tomlinson was in BBG meetings yesterday and was not available for comment.

Neither Mr. Tomlinson nor members of the BBG received a copy of the IG's report, which has been leaked to the press, before yesterday's vote.

Mr. Tomlinson, who has close ties to White House adviser Karl Rove, was nominated by Mr. Bush in August 2002. His term expired in 2004, and he was re-nominated, but the Senate has refused to act on it. Mr. Tomlinson can remain as chairman until the Senate approves a new nominee.

The IG investigation was requested by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, and Reps. Howard L. Berman and Tom Lantos, California Democrats.

"Congressman Berman believes that surely the president will now send a new nominee to the Hill," with "an ethical cloud" still surrounding Mr. Tomlinson, said Berman spokeswoman Gene Smith.

Last year, Mr. Tomlinson resigned from the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which he had chaired. The CPB's inspector general had accused him of political favoritism in hiring employees.

Clyburn V. Rahm For Whip (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 14, 2006

With political pundits predicting that Democrats will recapture the House this fall, Democratic lawmakers are debating who would become the majority whip: Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), moving up one step from caucus chairman, or Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the campaign wizard who would have orchestrated the victory.

Although only Clyburn has declared his interest in the position, the escalating rivalry between the two was on display this week when news broke that the Democratic National Committee (DNC) would funnel $60,000 into each of 40 House districts, breaking a stalemate between the DNC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Several Democratic officials credited Clyburn with brokering the deal. He invited DNC chief Howard Dean to his hideaway office in the Capitol July 21 in the hopes of convincing him to dip into the DNC's coffers and fund turnout efforts for House Democrats.

Allies of Emanuel, however, dispute Clyburn's influence, arguing that the agreement was engineered solely between staff.

Clyburn and Emanuel themselves declined to answer questions about how this week's deal with the DNC came to be.

The differing accounts of a relatively minor issue underscore a growing tension in the Democratic caucus: Clyburn is angling to be whip if Democrats control the House, and many see Emanuel as his chief competition.

Although neither is openly campaigning for the post, Clyburn, the current caucus chair, is clearly interested.

"If the opportunity is there, I plan to run for whip," he said last week, "I'm hoping that the way I conduct myself as caucus chair would make me worthy of moving to the next level, should the opportunity present itself."

Clyburn called it premature to start campaigning for the job.

"Whatever happens, Rahm and I will sit down and talk as gentlemen. On the morning of Nov. 8, I suspect we'll have a discussion of where we are going forward," he said.

As an African-American and a well-liked caucus chairman, Clyburn could mount a strong candidacy. He ran unopposed for his current post.

"Most people feel Clyburn has earned the respect of being caucus whip," said Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) last week. "That's the consensus of opinion I hear. The fact is the African American community has been a mainstay of the Democratic party. To have someone who is qualified for the job and also African American is an important opportunity."

DOJ_NMG_0063114

"Jim is the odds-on favorite," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) two weeks ago. "My sense is Clyburn has the whip job locked up. There hasn't been an African-American whip since [former Rep.] Bill Gray [D-Pa.]. There's also geography, sending the message that Democrats aren't writing off the South."

But many House Democrats believe the caucus will have to find a place in the leadership for Emanuel, the DCCC chair who will have engineered their victory.

Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), who has worked with Emanuel to help recruit Democratic candidates this cycle, said that she has heard his name floated as a whip candidate by her colleagues.

"Specifically by one of the Blue Dogs, who said we should reward him – if we win back the majority," she said, referring to a member of the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative Democrats.

But Solis added that she had heard nothing directly from Emanuel about his ambitions.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, said he would back Clyburn in a whip race and that he has also heard colleagues mention Emanuel as a contender for the post.

While Democratic lawmakers have said little publicly about the whip contest – in contrast to the behind-the-scenes race for Democratic majority leader, which has drawn much press attention – Thompson said there is widespread speculation among his colleagues about next year's leadership.

"Everybody's talking," said Thompson, who declined to name names.

"If we win the House back, Rahm deserves credit and he deserves a place in leadership," said one Democratic lawmaker allied with Emanuel. Some see the whip as the ideal post to showcase Emanuel's effectiveness.

With strong ties to the centrist Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), he appeals to many moderates. He would also have considerable cachet among newly elected members, many of whom he would have personally recruited and funded.

"He's done a helluva job," said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), a founder of the Blue Dog Coalition. "I'd be disposed to vote for him if he does want to run. He's not ideologically hide-bound; He's not in an ideological straight-jacket."

"He has a lot of chits to pull in," conceded a Democratic member who supports Clyburn's bid.

The DCCC post has served as a stepping stone to whip in the past. Former Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.) became whip in 1987 after serving as DCCC chairman from 1981 to 1986.

But Emanuel carries some personal baggage with him. His penchant for profanity and bluntness provokes strong emotions in many quarters, especially with the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

Emanuel himself has long refused to entertain questions about his future, stating that his singular focus is on winning in November.

"Rahm is focused solely on his responsibilities to his Democratic candidates, and to his caucus," said a DCCC aide, "He doesn't have the luxury or the time to focus on anything but the midterm elections."

A Democratic lawmaker allied with Emanuel suggested that Clyburn may be too hard to beat.

"There's this innate desire of the caucus to be representative of all races and genders," said the lawmaker. "It's one of the all-powerful characteristics of the caucus and it's hard to go against." The lawmaker suggested that Democrats might instead opt to create a new leadership position, such as assistant speaker, to accommodate Emanuel. A group of 40 House Democrats are currently rewriting their caucus's rules and have discussed the idea of adding that post to their roster of elected leaders.

Elsewhere on the leadership ticket, full-fledged races have broken out. Reps. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and John Murtha (D-Pa.) are vying for majority leader. Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) has declared for caucus vice-chair.

September 13, 2006, 7:00 pm Bush's Iraq Push Yields Small Gains in Poll

President Bush's latest communications offensive on Iraq appears to be yielding small initial dividends, increasing Republican and independent support as the mid-term election campaign enters its homestretch.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that Mr. Bush's overall approval rating, as well as his rating on handling Iraq, rose modestly after a series of speeches imploring Americans to remain patient despite repeated setbacks in the war.

It remains "a modest uptick" in "a very difficult national environment" for the president's party in mid-term elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though improved from 38% in June. (See full story) – John Harwood

September 13, 2006, 4:55 pm Shadegg Donation Stirs Talk of Leadership Run

After losing his race for House majority leader earlier this year, Arizona Republican Rep. John Shadegg today showed his colleagues that he may be planning another run for the Republican leadership. At a closed-door meeting today of all House Republicans, Shadegg announced he had raised $625,000 for the House Republicans' campaign arm. The sum far surpassed amount he and other Republican lawmakers were asked to raise for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

More importantly, it sparked talk that Shadegg may be interested in another campaign for the House leadership. His donations went to a special party committee that will be used for getting voters to the polls on Election Day. Republicans, who will elect their party leaders before the next session of Congress, give considerable weight to fund-raising ability.

Ironically, Shadegg's attempt to become a party leader would be helped if Republicans lose enough seats in the November election to hand control of the House to Democrats. A Democratic takeover could lead rank-and-file Republicans to reassess their party's leadership.

House Republicans hope to raise $17.5 million for the get-out-the-vote fund. The man who beat Shadegg earlier this year, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio, has contributed $550,000 to the fund, and he kicked in $210,000 total to cover the obligations of three vulnerable Republicans so they can focus on raising money for themselves. Others to top the $550,000 mark include Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana. –Brody Mullins

September 13, 2006, 3:43 pm Cole Turns to Voter Turnout

Oklahoma Congressman Tom Cole could now hold the inside line to succeed Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York as head of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds, who will step down after the November election following two terms heading the House Republicans' campaign apparatus, tapped Cole to head up the committee's get-out-the-vote effort. With Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman leading the Republican National Committee's mammoth effort and the Oklahoman directing the congressional side, Reynolds said Republicans had created a "voter turnout dream team." They'll need it. Republicans' worst nightmare right now is that disillusioned conservatives will avoid voting Nov. 7.

Cole was chief of staff at the RNC during the 2000 election cycle and executive director of the NRCC during the 1992 election. A Reynolds associate tells The Wall Street Journal that the Cole posting doesn't suggest an endorsement. His rivals for the job — Texan Pete Sessions and Pennsylvanian Phil English — already have substantial roles in the NRCC's campaign and have been raising lots of dough for colleagues and candidates. –Amy Schatz

Paulson As part of his ongoing effort to resurrect the stature of the Treasury and set the tone for his coming trip to Singapore and China, new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson invited a host of academics, business representatives and ambassadors to attend his first speech on the international economy this morning.

Among those seated for the 40-minute speech in the Treasury's historic Cash Room — designed in the 19th Century as a roofed version of an Italian palazzo, a traditional bank design throughout Europe — were Jim Sasser, the former Tennessee Democratic senator and ambassador to China under President Clinton; Charlene Barshefsky, the former U.S. Trade Representative in the Clinton years; John Engler, head of the National Manufacturers Association and a former Republican governor of Michigan; and heads of Council on Foreign Relations, the Securities Industry Association and the Financial Services Forum.

After the speech, Paulson invited guests to a reception in his office, where he personally greeted each one as they munched on cheese and crackers and sipped soft drinks. The speech was Paulson's second, but his first in Washington. The first was delivered at Columbia University's Graduate School of Business in New York.

Mr. Paulson spent the morning reaching out to members of Congress in advance of his speech, talking to folks on both sides of the aisle including Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, Montana Democrat Sen. Max Baucus, Washington Democrat Sen. Patty Murray and several House members such as California Republican Bill Thomas and New York Democrat Charles Rangel. The night before the speech Mr. Paulson talked with two vocal critics of the China's currency policy — Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y) and Lindsay Graham (R., SC). –Deborah Solomon

September 13, 2006, 12:50 pm Targeting Sen. Allen

Virginia Sen. George Allen hasn't exactly had the best month. There was the "macaca" gaffe. And then there were the dropping poll numbers, likely a result of the macaca gaffe. And let's not forget the "ethnic rally" slideshow, which is still up on his campaign site despite wide mocking from bloggers.

Allen

Today brought more fun for Allen campaign strategists, as a scathing ad debuted this morning attacking the Republican senator for voting against a measure that might have helped provide lifesaving body armor for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We believe the voice of the troops is sorely lacking in Washington and we're trying to change that," said Jon Soltz, chairman of VoteVets political action committee, which sponsored the ad. It will air on some broadcast stations and cable operators in Virginia, although the group wouldn't say where or how much the ad buy would be.

The group dubs itself as nonpartisan and notes it has given contributions to both Democrat and Republican vets, including Republican Sam Schultz, who received $2,100 in April for an unsuccessful primary bid to oust incumbent Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana's 9th congressional district. It's not endorsing Allen's opponent, James Webb, or any other candidates who haven't served in Iraq or Afghanistan, Soltz said.

The VoteVets board includes several prominent Democrats, including former Sen. Bob Kerrey, former Democratic presidential candidate Gen. Wesley Clark and Clinton administration official Elaine Kamarck, who has a son who served in Iraq, according to the site. The PAC's last campaign finance report in June showed it received $118,517 in contributions so far this year (including $5,000 from Christopher Heinz).

It's not clear how much money this group has, but if they get more contributions as a result of the Allen ad, other senators better watch out: "There are plenty of senators who deserve to be targets of this ad and they may be," Soltz said. "We have it ready to go in other states." –Amy Schatz

September 13, 2006, 11:13 am Primaries Produce Some Upsetting Results

The Republican rumble in the Rhode Island yesterday between Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey and incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee (who won last night) attracted the most attention, but other races around the country also produced some intriguing results.

Could seven-term Democratic Congressman Albert Wynn be on the verge of losing a primary race in Maryland? Wynn represents the 4th District in suburban Washington and has been battling attorney Donna Edwards. Earlier this morning, with 75% of precincts reporting, she had about a 200 vote advantage, although Wynn has since made up some ground. At last check, he had a 938 vote advantage with 81% of precincts reporting. Edwards was a former employee of the congressman earlier in her career, but she seemed to gain some major momentum after attacking his vote in favor of the war in Iraq.

While the Chafee win was a huge relief for the Republican Party leaders, who fretted Laffey was too conservative to win in November, other races around the country produced something of a mixed blessing for both parties, which had taken sides in several races in hope of producing the strongest candidates for November. In Arizona's 8th congressional district, conservative Randy Graf defeated the National Republican Congressional Committee-backed candidate Steve Huffman, a moderate who was the personal choice of Republican Jim Kolbe, a moderate who is retiring.

In New Hampshire, however, Democrat Jim Craig was upset by Carol Shea-Porter, another Iraq-war critic, in a low-turnout primary race for the 1st District seat. Craig's campaign received some support from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, although it's probably a stretch for the NRCC to call the $24,500 national Dems contributed to Craig's campaign "significant financial backing." Nevertheless, congressional Republicans were chortling over the DCCC's loss this morning: "The DCCC has now seen five of their hand-picked candidates lose during the 2006 primary season (Steve Filson in CA-11, Andrew Horne in KY-03, Craig, (Judy) Aydelott (in NY-19), and Joe Sulzer in OH-18.)" Shea-Porter will now try to capture the seat held by Republican Jeb Bradley.

Meanwhile, in Wisconsin, Republican state Assembly Speaker John Gard easily won the nomination for the 8th District and will go up against Democrat Steve Kagen in November. Gard was the national Republican's choice for the seat and was already being targeted by ads from the DCCC in the primary. Now the fun really begins as both well-funded candidates begin battling for this open seat, which both parties are prepared to spend handsomely to win. "Make no mistake about it, John Gard will keep Wisconsin's 8th in the GOP column come November," the NRCC said this morning. –Amy Schatz

September 13, 2006, 6:10 am Survival Instinct

DOJ_NMG_0063117

By helping moderate incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island across the finish line in Tuesday's Republican primary, President Bush's party signaled its pragmatism and determination to hold power in the face of a strong midterm election challenge from Democratic adversaries.

Chafee's victory hardly guarantees that Republicans hold the Rhode Island seat; some polls have shown him behind Democratic opponent Sheldon Whitehouse in a "blue" state John Kerry won handily in the 2004 presidential race. But he had displayed a far more formidable ability to compete than conservative primary challenger Steve Laffey.

The seat is critical to Democrats' uphill fight for the six-seat gain needed to recapture control of the Senate. That's why the national Republican Party poured resources into boosting turnout for Chafee and attacking Laffey in ads and mailings.

Those maneuvers were all the more striking given the party's Bush-era reputation for catering above all to its conservative base. Chafee has opposed Bush on the most important foreign and domestic initiatives of his presidency – the Iraq war and tax cuts. He has even mused publicly about the possibility of becoming a Democrat.

Yet Bush's reduced standing and the war's unpopularity have diminished the president's leverage and left many Republican candidates seeking distance from the administration. In the wake of last night's results, Republican Party Chairman Ken Mehlman swallowed any misgivings about Chafee's iconoclasm and hailed him as a "principled voice" for Rhode Island; the Republican Senate committee chair, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, praised his "independent, honest leadership."

Chafee's victory complicates Democratic strategy for the Rhode Island general election. Instead of hitting Chafee on policy as they would have attacked Laffey, Democratic strategists say they'll instead tie the moderate incumbent to a single vote – the one to elect a Republican leader for the Senate when the new Congress convenes. By facilitating Republican control of the Senate, they plan to argue, Chafee would empower Bush for the last two years of his presidency even if he defies the White House on key policy choices.

Republican voters displayed less of a pragmatic streak in Arizona Eighth district primary election to succeed retiring moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Kolbe had endorsed moderate Steve Huffman as his successor, and Republican Party leaders backed Huffman as the most electable candidate. Yet primary voters bucked those signals and instead nominated Randy Graf, who took a more conservative line on immigration and other issues in the border district.

That outcome cheered Democrats who consider the race critical to their hopes of picking up the 15 seats needed to win control of the House. Democrats nominated the candidate the national party considered most competitive, Gabrielle Giffords, over former TV anchor Patty Weiss.

After a comparatively mild primary battle, Democrats are counting on achieving greater unity in the fall campaign. The Republican contest between Graf and Huffman had a harsher edge, complicating the challenge of rallying the party faithful in November. — John Harwood

September 13, 2006, 6:00 am Fuel for Republicans?

Republicans could get a boost heading into the midterms from gasoline prices. Prices have fallen more than 35 cents from their $3 a gallon peak in early August and could fall another 35 cents in the weeks ahead because of the recent plunge in oil prices.

High gasoline prices have been a key factor behind the low approval ratings voters give President Bush and the Republican Congress on the economy. Democrats have also used high oil prices to paint the Republicans as the friends of Big Oil.

The price of gasoline is "one leg of a three-legged stool that is upside down and jabbing Republicans in the butt," says Glen Bolger, a partner at Republican polling firm Public Opinion Strategies. The other two are health care costs and stagnant wages. The drop in gas prices is "certainly happening at the right time. There's 56 days left [before the election]. If it continues to drop, that can only redound to our favor."

Administration officials have already started touting the turnaround. Edward Lazear, chairman of Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, said in a speech Tuesday that wages, unadjusted for inflation, have started to pickup recently in a lagged response to big gains in worker output per hour (productivity). But workers haven't enjoyed the benefits, he said, because "recent large and unanticipated increases in energy prices have consumed much of this strong nominal wage growth." Then he noted: "With recent declines in gasoline prices, however, there is the prospect of substantial real wage growth in the rest of 2006."

Inflation data aren't getting the attention now that jobs stats did in 2004. Nonetheless, the GOP could benefit from fortuitous timing on inflation data. The bulk of the recent decline in gasoline prices will show up in the September inflation report. In the same month, the 12-month inflation rate will no longer contain the huge increase in gasoline prices that followed Hurricane Katrina in September 2005. Based on some calculations from Goldman Sachs, that could show the inflation rate plummeting to 2.4%, the lowest in over two years, from 4.3% as recently as June. That report is to be released on Oct. 18, three weeks before the election. A few months after the election, the inflation rate will probably jump back up, because it will no longer be held down by a big drop in gasoline prices in November, 2005.

Still, Democrats maintain the decline will be too little, too late to make a difference. Geoffrey Garin, president of Hart Research Associates, notes that prices have moved sharply up and down for the last year without dislodging gasoline prices as an issue from voters' minds. "The public's been pretty badly scarred over the course of the last year and it will take longer than the two months left in this election cycle for the scars to go away." — Greg Ip

Democrats Plan To Reduce Need For Abortions (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Reaching out to more moderate, church-going voters with misgivings about abortion, House Democrats plan to unveil legislation on Thursday that sets a public policy goal of reducing abortions in America.

The proposal, to be announced at a news conference attended by House Democrats' national campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), would not restrict access to abortion. Instead, it promotes such preventive measures as funding for contraceptives and expanded sex education geared toward avoiding pregnancy as well as support for adoption and services to new mothers, according to several people familiar with the legislation.

The legislation targets voters who have concerns about abortion but who are not absolutely opposed to the procedure. Its introduction follows extended discussion in Democratic political circles about improving the party's image with traditionalist voters and public efforts by prominent Democrats to fashion an approach to abortion with broader appeal.

In January, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) urged the party to find "common ground" with abortion opponents. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) this summer chastised fellow Democrats for giving insufficient regard to "the power of faith."

The issue is delicate as the party seeks to address the ambivalence much of the American public feels toward abortion without offending a Democratic base that includes many passionate believers in abortion rights who are wary of any sign of a weakening in resolve to protect those rights.

The legislation will be announced less than eight weeks before the Nov. 7 mid-term election in which Democratic hopes of wresting control of Congress depend in part on competing in a number of socially conservative districts in places like Ohio and Pennsylvania. The Democratic Senate nominee in Pennsylvania, Bob Casey, opposes abortion rights.

Republicans in recent years have appealed to the unease over abortion felt by many moderates with such legislation as parental notification laws and the ban on certain late-term abortions that detractors labeled "partial-birth abortions."

But Democrats hope the new legislative package will allow candidates to demonstrate that their party acknowledges the moral reservations that many Americans feel about abortion and has a plan to take positive steps to cut use of the procedure.

"From our perspective, it shows Democrats are changing the debate and making it a priority to reduce abortions in America while leaving personal liberties intact," said Rachel Laser, a policy analyst with the center-left group Third Way who was involved with preparation of the legislation.

The House legislation, which is to be co-sponsored by anti-abortion Rep. Tim Ryan (D-Ohio) and abortion rights supporter Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), avoids some of the divisive issues that have been in Democratic legislative packages introduced earlier in the year.

In contrast to a package introduced by anti-abortion Democrats this spring, the legislation does not include a provision to ban adults from transporting minors across state lines to avoid parental notification laws.

The legislation being introduced Thursday also leaves out some of the more controversial provisions on contraception included in another package proposed this year by Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. The Reid legislation would require private group health plans to include contraceptive coverage in prescription drug benefits.

But the House Democrats' bill would considerably expand access to contraceptive services for low-income women. It calls for expanded funding to federal family planning programs and mandates that states provide contraceptive coverage to women with incomes up to twice the federal poverty level.

A congressional aide familiar with the legislation said the sponsors do not yet have a cost estimate for the measure.

According to descriptions from people who have seen the measure, the package also would provide grants for sex education with an "abstinence focus" but would also require that the programs include complete instruction on contraceptives.

Abortion providers would be required to notify patients of the risks of abortion procedures. In the past, abortion rights groups have often fought such patient notification proposals because they considered the wording to be overly alarmist. But the abortion providers would fashion the notifications through guidance from medical groups, such as the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, which does not oppose abortion rights.

There are also provisions for adoption tax credits, funding for nurses to make home visits for teenage and new mothers, funding for day-care programs and expanded funding for health care for low-income mothers and children.

Social Security Lays Out The Funding Consequences (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The Social Security Administration would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices 10 days next year if Congress does not increase its funding in fiscal 2007, the agency has told Congress.

"Fewer resources mean fewer people to serve the public in all areas of SSA's operations," Jo Anne B. Barnhart , the Social Security commissioner, said in a letter to the Senate Appropriations Committee. "Because these budget reductions will affect all employees, they will result in major service disruptions across all workloads."

If the agency resorts to furloughs, the Social Security network of 1,300 field offices would close, probably a day at a time over a five- to six-month period. On those days, the public would not be able to apply for Social Security numbers, replace Social Security cards, file for retirement or disability benefits or obtain decisions on pending disability claims and appeals.

In 2006, nearly 49 million Americans will receive approximately $539 billion in Social Security benefits.

"For an agency like ours, it is kind of a shock," said Richard Warsinskey , president of the National Council of Social Security Management Associations.

Warsinskey said he understands that companies lay off and furlough employees in bad economic times, "but this is a public service issue." He said, "We don't want to take a well-run agency and make it mediocre because we don't get enough money."

Mark Lassiter , the Social Security press officer, said no decisions on furloughs have been made. The House and Senate have not finished work on the agency's budget and Barnhart "remains hopeful that the president's budget request will be approved by Congress," he said.

The Senate bill would provide about $9 billion for the agency -- about $400 million less than the president's request and about $54 million less than what the agency received for this year's budget. The House proposal would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking.

The agency's budget may not be resolved until after the November elections, congressional aides said. A spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee said House and Senate negotiators would review the agency's funding and staffing levels later this year. Many agencies are likely to face budget squeezes next year, in part because Congress faces tough decisions on financing the Iraq war and homeland security.

Social Security, headquartered in Baltimore, has about 65,000 employees, and officials estimate that more than 40 percent of its workforce will retire by 2014. It appears that not all departing employees will be replaced because of budget pressures. Only one employee is being hired for every three that depart, according to 2006 and 2007 budget plans.

Darryl Perkinson , president of the Federal Managers Association, said reduced appropriations for Social Security will probably worsen the backlog of cases in the agency's Office of Disability and Adjudication Review. The association estimates the backlog has grown to 730,000 cases with an average processing time of 481 days. The group is urging Congress to pass the president's budget request and support adequate staffing levels in the disability review office.

Witold Skwierczynski , president of the American Federation of Government Employees' national council for Social Security field operations, testified before Congress in May and warned that the nation's demographics and baby-boomer retirements would require increases in skilled field staff in coming years.

In her letter, Barnhart indicated that the Senate's proposal to provide $400 million less than in the president's budget would require a hiring freeze, overtime reductions and other overhead cuts in addition to a 10-day furlough of staff.

Warsinskey said the agency is scouring its budget for ways to save money. "SSA has never been faced with this before," he said, referring to the prospect of a furlough.Electronic Health Records

The House federal workforce subcommittee approved a bill yesterday that would require insurance companies in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program to make an electronic health record available to enrollees upon request.

The bill goes to the House Government Reform Committee for consideration. Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), the subcommittee chairman and bill's sponsor, said electronic records will improve health-care delivery and help reduce medical errors. Companies would not be allowed to pass along costs of providing the records in premium increases, according to the bill.

Dueling Ex-Party Bosses (RC)

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

It was Ed Gillespie's book party, but it was his friendly political rival, Terry McAuliffe, who walked around touting his own new book and bragging how he's going to land on the best-seller list.

"He's incorrigible," Gillespie laughed.

Gillespie and McAuliffe really hit it off in 2004 when the two Irish Catholics ran their respective party operations, Gillespie at the helm of the Republican National Committee and McAuliffe overseeing the Democratic National Committee.

After working on it for 53 weeks, McAuliffe on Tuesday put the final touches on his 170,000-word book "What A Party" and shipped it off to the publisher. It's due out on Jan. 9.

Ironically, and in typical grandstanding style, McAuliffe finished his book on the very day that Gillespie chose to celebrate his new tome, "Winning Right: Campaign Politics and Conservative Policies," published by Simon and Schuster.

McAuliffe was among the fabulous turnout of a who's who of politicos, though no one, not even a single Republican, seemed to linger at the party quite as long as he did. And his favorite topic of conservation was, you guessed it, his book, which includes his inside perspective on the Democratic Party as a close confidant of former President Bill Clinton.

"Get your seatbelts on, it's gonna be a great book," he told HOH on the telephone Wednesday. "I think it'll keep you laughing through the whole book ... I think people will learn a lot from it, too."

Gillespie, a partner at Quinn Gillespie & Associates, said that, obviously, the two books will be at odds "on a number of different fronts." But he joked that he couldn't really promise it would be as sexy or explosive as his buddy's.

"He has a little bit of an edge, because he has Clinton stories in his," Gillespie said.

Burns Flies First Class, Wife Coach. A salivating Democratic informant sent HOH an e-mail with the most disturbing news: Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) flew first class to Washington, D.C., on Monday while his wife was stuck back in coach.

The Burnses flew back on a Northwest Airlines flight from Minneapolis to Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. The informant sent the information with an accompanying nasty editorial note that said, "Guess women really are second class to him."

The gratuitous little jab was a reference, ironically, to an incident in which two Northwest Airlines flight attendants accused the Senator of sexism after he reportedly suggested to one of them that she could stay at home and be a mother if she lost her job to outsourcing.

Burns denied sexism in that case or in the case of taking the first-class seat while his wife, Phyllis, rode coach on Monday. And we must point out that Mrs. Burns has not accused her husband of sexism. In fact, HOH tends to believe that Sen. Burns wasn't playing the big man card taking the first-class seat while making his little woman ride in the stuffy coach seat.

For one, she had the roomiest coach seat available: the exit row. Burns' spokesman, James Pendleton, swears the Senator chivalrously offered to take that seat and give Phyllis the only first class seat they could get. But she wouldn't hear of such nonsense.

"She declined, as she felt there was more room for him to work with his laptop, etc., in First Class," Pendleton told us via e-mail.

He wrote that it's "no surprise" that Burns has "well over a million miles on Northwest, and gets upgrades to First Class when available, just like any other super-frequent flyer."

On Monday, both he and Mrs. Burns had purchased coach tickets and at the time they upgraded, there wasn't room for both of them to go first class, Pendleton said.

For those of you still feeling sorry for Mrs. Burns, look on the bright side — maybe she can hold this one over her husband's head and get an upgrade on something else she might like.

Mad Max's Milestone. Hurray for Sen. Max Baucus! The Montana Democrat cast his 10,000th Senate vote on Wednesday, becoming one of just 27 in the history of the Senate who have cast 10,000 or more votes.

Baucus' chief of staff, Jim Messina, could hardly believe it himself when he heard the news. "Ten thousand votes? Well, I can still remember the first, and disco was still popular."

Yep, everybody was dancing to "Disco Inferno" and "Stayin' Alive" the year Baucus was elected to the Senate, 1978.

Ends Without Means (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

A leader's first job is to project authority, and George Bush certainly does that. In a 90-minute interview with a few columnists in the Oval Office on Tuesday, Bush swallowed up the room, crouching forward to energetically make a point or spreading his arms wide to illustrate the scope of his ideas — always projecting confidence and intensity.

DOJ_NMG_0063121

He opened the session by declaring, "Let me just first tell you that I've never been more convinced that the decisions I made are the right decisions," and he grew more self-assured from there. I interview politicians for a living, and every time I brush against Bush I'm reminded that this guy is different. There's none of that hunger for approval that is common to the breed. This is the most inner-directed man on the globe.

The other striking feature of his conversation is that he possesses an unusual perception of time. Washington, and modern life in general, encourages people to think in the short term. But Bush, who stands aloof, thinks in long durations.

"I got into politics initially because I wanted to help change a culture," he says, referring to his campaign against the instant gratifications of the 1960's counterculture. And he sees his efforts today as a series of long, gradual cultural transformations. Like many executives, he believes that the higher you go, the further into the future you should see, and so his conversation is filled with speculations about the long-term effects of deep social trends — the current religious awakening or the politics of volunteer armies.

All of which prepares him to think about the war on terror as a generations-long struggle. He asked us to think about what the world could look like 50 years from now, with Islamic radicals either controlling the world's oil supply or not. "I firmly believe that some day American presidents will be looking back at this period in time, saying, 'Thank goodness they saw the vision,' " he said.

Sitting between busts of Lincoln and Churchill, he continued, "My hope is to leave behind something — foundations and institutions that will enable future presidents to be able to more likely make the tough decisions that they're going to have to make."

"Ideological struggles take time," he said, explaining the turmoil in Iraq and elsewhere. He said the events of weeks or months were just a nanosecond compared with the long course of this conflict. He was passionate on the need for patience and steadfastness. He talked about "inviolate" principles written upon his heart: "People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift."

He was less personal and less assertive when talking about those tactical decisions made day to day.

We are now at a moment when many of the people who support his long-term goals, and who have stuck with him as the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, fear the war is irreparably lost. The general view among many Republicans is that Bush set out grand goals, but never committed resources commensurate with the task.

Bush was pressed about Iraqi troop levels repeatedly during our interview. His general response was that during Vietnam, tactical decisions were made in the White House. "I thought it was a mistake then, and I think it's a mistake now."

So on troop levels and other tactical issues, Bush defers to Gen. George Casey, who is in Iraq. He asks questions but does not contradict the experts. If Casey asked for two more divisions tomorrow, Bush would deliver, regardless of the political consequences. But Casey does not ask (and maybe none are available).

What if Casey is wrong?

"Then I picked the wrong general," Bush says bluntly. "If he's wrong, I'm wrong."

When asked if he should have expanded the military back in 2003, to give the current commanders more manpower, Bush used words that were uncharacteristically jargon-ridden: "The notion of warfare has changed, and therefore, we're modulizing the army so that it becomes more operational and easier to move." That sounds more like a transformation briefing paper than the president.

In other words, when Bush is strategizing goals, he is assertiveness on stilts. When he is contemplating means, he defers to authority.

And the sad truth is, there has been a gap between Bush's visions and the means his administration has devoted to realize them. And when tactics do not adjust to fit the strategy, then the strategy eventually gets diminished to fit the tactics.

Or worse.

The Medicare Monster (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Unless you're a news junkie, you probably missed Mark McClellan's announcement that he'll resign in early October, after two grueling years as head of CMS.

What's CMS? Well, it's the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, which spent $515 billion in 2005 -- 21 percent of the federal budget and about $21 billion more than all defense spending. Leaving government presents McClellan with a golden opportunity: He can tell us what to do about Medicare. It's the monster in our future -- and no one knows it better than McClellan, who is a medical doctor, a Ph.D. economist and, since 2004, Medicare's chief bureaucrat. Moreover, he's not a rabid partisan. He also worked for Bill Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0063122

If monster seems like rhetorical overkill, then recall what the aging baby boom does to government. Federal spending on the elderly is plausibly projected to double from 2000 to 2030 as a share of national income. About three-quarters of that increase will be health spending -- mostly Medicare but also Medicaid (70 percent of Medicaid spending goes to the old and disabled). The projected increase in health spending exceeds all of today's discretionary domestic spending on schools, the FBI, the environment and much more. If the "aging problem" involved only higher Social Security spending, we could handle it easily.

We all know that runaway health spending is already driving up the number of uninsured (latest count: 46.6 million), because insurance is increasingly too expensive for employers to cover low-skilled workers. Now uncontrolled health spending will dominate the federal budget and pose ugly choices: (a) raise taxes sharply, (b) gut other programs and (c) run ever-larger -- and more dangerous -- deficits.

Some economists believe that we've gotten our money's worth from higher health spending. Since 1960 life expectancy at birth has risen from about 70 to over 77. Harvard health economist David Cutler attributes about half the increase to medical advances -- new drugs, surgeries and therapies. (Candidates for the other half: less smoking, less-punishing jobs, fewer accidents.) Academic studies suggest that people value an extra year of life at about $100,000, says Cutler. That's how much they'd pay -- in theory -- to live a year longer. Since 1960 the average extra health spending at all ages needed to increase life expectancy one year has been less than $100,000 per person. Therefore we've gotten value for money.

By this logic, higher health spending is nonthreatening. In a recent paper, economists Robert Hall of Stanford and Charles Jones of the University of California at Berkeley suggest that health spending may reach 30 percent of national income by 2050, up from 16 percent today and 5 percent in 1950. But they are unperturbed, because as Americans get richer, they prefer more health spending -- longer and better lives -- to a "third car [or] yet another television."

I'm not in this camp. Yes, much health spending has been beneficial and cost-effective. In the future, biotechnology or stem cells may produce large gains against Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's and cancer at reasonable costs. But the present explosion in health spending is increasingly wasteful and socially corrosive. It may ultimately lower economic growth -- a side effect of the high taxes needed to pay for Medicare and Medicaid -- and already depresses take-home pay, squeezes other public services and redistributes income from the young to the old. Meanwhile, the extra health benefits are dwindling.

Today's waste transcends excess paperwork (an easy rhetorical target) and mainly involves unnecessary or harmful care. Using Medicare records, John Wennberg and colleagues at Dartmouth Medical School have documented huge variations in care -- with few, if any, benefits. One study examined 4.7 million Medicare patients with any of 12 chronic illnesses who died from 2000 to 2003. In New York, some hospitalization rates were twice as high as at the Mayo Clinic. (Indeed, Cutler's latest calculation just for the elderly sends the same message; by the 1990s, it cost about $145,000 to increase an average life one year for those over 65.)

We should overhaul Medicare, but just how is unclear. To know, we need to answer three questions: (1) How much health spending can the economy absorb without having higher taxes or depressed wages reduce economic growth? (2) Who should pay for Medicare -- that is, should older people pay more (lessening the burden on the young)? (3) How can we pay physicians and hospitals for better outcomes and not just for more tests, hospitalizations and visits? These questions apply to any system we might adopt -- from a government-run "single payer" system to more "consumer-driven" health care.

Carrying out President Bush's agenda -- including the new drug benefit -- McClellan couldn't pose these basic questions. Now he says he plans to settle at a think tank or university, where he can. He has a huge chance to help define the needed debate. Most studies of Medicare have had a narrow and technical focus, evading the truly central issue. It isn't "What's good for Medicare beneficiaries?" Rather, it's "What's good for America?"

Another Strong Session For The Dow Puts It Within 180 Points Of A Record (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Oil prices broke their losing streak, but stocks continued their winning ways.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 45.23 points, or 0.39%, to a four-month high of 11543.32. It was the average's 10th-highest close and only the 13th time it ended the day above 11500. The Dow sits 180 points from its all-time peak on Jan. 14, 2000, the record close of 11722.98.

Blue-chip stocks gained despite crude oil's finish 21 cents a barrel higher on the New York Mercantile Exchange, the first gain for crude in the past eight trading sessions. At $63.97 a barrel, the price is still more than 8% below its level at the start of the month and 17% below its July peak.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.38%, or 4.96 points, to 1318.07, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq Composite index rose 0.53%, or 11.85, to 2227.67. Smaller stocks, often more volatile than their bigger brethren, gained 0.86%, or 6.22 points, to 730.70 on the Russell 2000 index.

Energy and commodity stocks showed strength in a day when economically sensitive stocks trumped defensive plays. Exxon Mobil rose 1%, and Alcoa added 2%. Financial stocks benefited from better-than-expected earnings at investment bank Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. Lehman, which also reported strong revenue and a strong outlook for investment-banking deals, rose 3%. Goldman Sachs Group, which reported earnings Tuesday, tacked on 1.6%.

Commodity prices continue to be in the spotlight, as investors consider whether consumer spending will carry the economy. Tomorrow, investors will get the latest reading on inflation when the latest Consumer Price Index is released.

"The big debate that's raging" is whether falling gasoline and oil prices help the consumer enough to offset the weakening housing market, says Robert Harrington, head of U.S. stock trading at UBS's U.S. brokerage firm. "The consumer still seems to be spending," he says, in part because falling oil prices act as an immediate "tax cut" that encourages spending.

Mr. Harrington points to Best Buy, which reported this week that quarterly profit rose 22% on higher sales of flat-panel televisions and notebook computers. But should the economy reheat enough, commodity prices may jump higher. And the factors pushing oil prices down -- a mild hurricane season, OPEC sticking to production schedules and a seasonally slow period for demand -- could easily turn around in coming months.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.625 billion shares, with 2,277 stocks rising and 1,053 falling.

Bond prices advanced. The 10-year Treasury note rose 2/32, or 62.5 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.767%. The 30-year bond rose 3/32, to yield 4.898%.

The dollar was down. It traded at 117.58 yen, down from 117.95, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2697 from $1.2691.

Oil Prices Poised To Drop Sharply, Energy Consultant Says (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The recent sharp drop in the global price of crude oil could mark the start of a massive sell-off that returns gasoline prices to lows not seen since the late 1990s - perhaps as low as $1.15 a gallon.

"All the hurricane flags are flying" in oil markets, said Philip K. Verleger, a noted energy consultant who was a lone voice several years ago in warning that oil prices would soar. Now, he tells McClatchy Newspapers, they appear to be poised for a dramatic plunge.

Crude oil prices have fallen about $14, or roughly 17 percent, from their July 14 peak of $78.40. After falling seven straight days, they rose slightly Wednesday in trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, to $63.97, partly in reaction to a government report showing fuel inventories a bit lower than expected. But the overall price drop is expected to continue, and prices could fall much more in the weeks and months ahead.

Here's why.

For most of the past two years, oil prices have risen because the world's oil producers have struggled to keep pace with growing demand, particularly from China and India. Spare oil production capacity grew so tight that market players feared that any disruption to oil production could create shortages.

Fear of disruption focused on fighting in Nigeria, escalating tensions over Iran's nuclear program, violence between Israel and Lebanon that might spread to oil-producing neighbors, and the prospect that hurricanes might topple oil facilities in the Gulf of Mexico.

Oil traders bet that such worrisome developments would drive up the future price of oil. Oil is traded in contracts for future delivery, and companies that take physical delivery of oil are just a small part of total trading. Financial players, such as large pension and commodities funds, are the big traders and they're seeking profits. They've sunk $105 billion or more into oil futures in recent years, according to Verleger. Their bets that oil prices would rise in the future bid up the price of oil.

That, in turn, led users of oil to create stockpiles as cushions against supply disruptions and even higher future prices. Now inventories of oil are approaching 1990 levels.

But many of the conditions that drove investors to bid up oil prices are ebbing. Tensions over Israel, Lebanon and Nigeria are easing. The hurricane season has presented no threat so far to the Gulf of Mexico. The U.S. peak summer driving season is over, so gasoline demand is falling.

DOJ_NMG_0063124

With fear of supply disruptions ebbing, oil prices began sliding. With oil inventories high, refiners that turn oil into gasoline are expected to cut production. As refiners cut production, oil companies increasingly risk getting stuck with excess oil supplies. There's already anecdotal evidence of oil companies chartering tankers to store excess oil.

All this is turning financial markets increasingly bearish on oil.

"If we continue to build inventories, and if we have a warm winter like we had last winter, you could see a large fall in the price of oil," said Gary Pokoik, who manages Hedge Ventures Energy in Los Angeles, an energy hedge fund. "I think there is still a lot of risk in the market."

As it stands now, the recent oil-price slump has brought the national average for a gallon of unleaded gasoline down to $2.59, according to the AAA motor club.

Should oil traders fear that this downward price spiral will get worse and run for the exits by selling off their futures contracts, said Verleger, it's not unthinkable that oil prices could return to $15 or less a barrel, at least temporarily. That could mean gasoline prices as low as $1.15 per gallon.

Other experts won't guess at a floor price, but they agree that a race to the bottom could break out.

"The market may test levels here that are too low to be sustained," said Clay Seigle, an analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates, a consultancy in Boston.

On Monday, the oil-producing cartel OPEC hinted that if prices fall precipitously, OPEC members would cut production to lift them. But that would take time.

"That takes six to nine months. If we don't have a really cold winter here (creating a demand for oil), prices will fall. Literally, you don't know where the floor is," said Verleger. "In a market like this, if things start falling ... prices could take you back to the 1999 levels. It has nothing to do with production."

Producers Move To Debunk Gloomy 'Peak Oil' Forecasts (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And Jeffrey Ball

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Leading players in the petroleum industry, including Saudi Arabia and Exxon Mobil Corp., are aggressively arguing that plenty of crude oil remains for world consumption, in an effort to counter critics who contend crude output is about to plateau.

That argument, known as peak-oil theory, has provided intellectual backing for the boom in crude prices and sowed doubts among some policy makers about crude's long-term reliability as an energy source. Such doubts, coupled with concern over sky-high prices, have added impetus to the search for oil substitutes -- including in Washington, where President Bush this year declared the U.S. "addicted to oil" and sparked a boom in interest in ethanol.

Some in the industry are keen to fight the threat posed by such fears.

Yesterday, Abdallah S. Jum'ah, chief executive of Saudi Arabian state-owned Saudi Aramco, the world's largest oil company by production, argued during a speech in Vienna that the world has more than a century's worth of crude left at current production rates. His talk followed similar remarks by a senior Exxon executive this week. Spokesmen for Exxon and Aramco said they aren't coordinating their remarks.

The belief that the Earth is running dry of oil is just one factor supporting crude prices. Oil supplies -- constrained by underinvestment when crude prices were lower -- have increased more slowly than demand, leading to a thin margin of spare pumping capacity and higher prices.

Demand has shown signs of slowing and prices have fallen from a nominal all-time high of more than $78 a barrel in July, though, adjusted for inflation, oil reached as high as $99.21 in April 1980. In New York yesterday, crude-oil futures rose 21 cents to settle at $63.97.

In a sign that oil-supply concerns are gaining currency, the Department of Energy has asked the National Petroleum Council, an oil-and-gas-industry research group, to investigate peak-oil claims. The council launched a study that includes different industries and environmental groups and appointed Lee Raymond, retired Exxon chief executive, as the study's chairman. It will survey existing studies and examine why they differ on how much oil and gas the world holds and what the response should be.

At an OPEC seminar yesterday, Mr. Jum'ah of Aramco said the world had produced only about one trillion barrels, or about 18%, of the earth's producible potential of 5.7 trillion barrels of oil. "That fact alone should discredit the argument that peak oil is imminent, and put our minds at ease concerning future petroleum supplies," he said. The remaining 4.7 trillion barrels should be enough to last more than 140 years at current output rates, he said.

Saudi Arabia, with a quarter of the world's proven crude reserves, has an interest in countering developments that would reduce demand. "If you are sitting on the world's biggest oil deposits, you would want to prevent the premature development of alternatives to oil," said Herman Franssen, president of International Energy Associates, a consulting firm in Bethesda, Md.

DOJ_NMG_0063125

In an interview, Mr. Jum'ah said the Saudis "don't mind the development of alternatives to oil," because increasing energy demand means the world needs supplemental energy sources. But he objected to government subsidies and other supports that lead people to believe that alternatives like ethanol are a "panacea" that is "around the corner," he said.

Still, 3.5 trillion of the roughly 4.7 trillion barrels of oil Mr. Jum'ah is counting on will depend on the development of new technologies. "I believe we will eventually tally about one trillion barrels each from yet-to-be-discovered fields and higher recovery rates" from existing fields, he said in the speech. He also factored in 1.5 trillion barrels from nonconventional sources, such as Canadian tar sands.

Mr. Jum'ah's speech came two days after Exxon's Australia chief, Mark Nolan, told an industry conference in Adelaide, Australia, that "the end of oil is nowhere in sight." Mr. Nolan cited a U.S. Geological Survey estimate of more than three trillion barrels of conventional recoverable oil resources, of which one trillion barrels has been produced. Conservative estimates of heavy-oil and shale-oil resources push the total to four trillion barrels, while a 10% increase in recoverability will deliver an extra 800 billion barrels, Mr. Nolan said.

An Exxon spokesman said the company has long been making a similar argument.

Even mainstream analysts see a practical limit to supply. "The international petroleum system will be hard-pressed to produce more than 100 million barrels a day, given current technology," said J. Robinson West, chairman of consulting firm PFC Energy. Demand, expected to reach 84.8 million barrels a day this year, could rise to that level by about 2015, based on estimates for a different period by the International Energy Agency.

The industry says that while oil is finite, the known pool of obtainable oil grows as technology improves.

"I think there's a lot of misconceptions of what peak oil is," Mr. Raymond, who is leading the U.S. oil study, said in an interview last week. "The resource base is continually changing, driven by economics and technology." But he said his views won't dictate the study's results. "I may learn something."

Republicans Gain From Bush Focus On War On Terror (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

President Bush's series of speeches on the war on terror has boosted the issue's profile and helped recapture Republicans' lead when voters are surveyed on whom they trust to handle terrorism.

Republicans now lead Democrats by 48 percent to 41 percent among registered voters in a new ABC News poll, a flip from a seven-point Democrat advantage in the same poll last month, and 16 percent now choose terrorism as their top voting issue -- a gain of five percentage points.

Analyzing the poll on ABC's Web site, its polling director, Gary Langer, said Republicans' edge on handling terrorism is far less than the 35-point lead they had in 2002, when they won control of the Senate by bashing Democrats for blocking creation of the Department of Homeland Security over union rules.

But he said Republicans have made gains among independents, who are now split on which party they trust more on the issue.

And though it's just a trickle, the president's approval numbers also are ticking higher.

An NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 42 percent -- an increase of five percentage points since June, though still below a comfortable level for a president heading into a midterm election.

Both polls still showed Democrats with a sizable advantage when people are asked which party they want to control Congress -- nine percentage points in the NBC-Journal survey and eight points in the ABC poll.

The ABC poll was taken Sept. 5-7 of 1,003 adults, including 863 registered voters, and had a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points among registered voters. The NBC-Journal survey of 1,009 Americans was taken Sept. 8-11 and has a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

The polls come as Mr. Bush delivers a series of speeches trying to lay out his goals in the war on terror. He has tried to put a face on the terrorists, has released new information about attacks that have been thwarted by good intelligence, and has called for Congress to give official approval to military trials for terror detainees and to the National Security Agency's terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Bush's speeches have also stiffened the spines of Republicans in Congress, and top Republicans have said the details of thwarted plots have given them something concrete they can take home to tell constituents.

"There's been extraordinary successes in this war and a lot of them have occurred outside of plain public view," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

"It's useful and important to provide an update, and obviously, on an issue that continues to be right at the top of everybody's concerns."

DOJ_NMG_0063126

He said the president's speeches have been able to give another view to balance out the repeated images of bombings and killings in Iraq and elsewhere.

"We feel confident that when people get a full picture, they're not only going to have confidence in the president, but they're going to want to support him and give him the tools to fight the war on terror," Mr. Snow said.

The ABC poll found that Iraq is still a weak point for Republicans -- those voters who put it as a top concern clearly favor Democrats.

But the poll showed Mr. Bush is still winning some key arguments, such as the 57 percent who agreed with his position that Iraq is part of the war on terror.

Republicans' Strategy May Backfire (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Republican Party leadership won the primary battle in Rhode Island, getting their preferred candidate, incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee, past a conservative challenger. But at what cost?

To boost prospects of holding the Republican seat, the party backed the moderate Mr. Chafee and spent nearly a million dollars on direct-mail and television advertising against Cranston Mayor Steve Laffey, who ran as the kind of conservative the White House usually likes and who pledged to support the very Bush tax cuts Mr. Chafee opposed. That tactic angered Laffey supporters and could deter them from voting in November when Mr. Chafee squares off with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former attorney general whose campaign is flush with cash.

"When you aggressively attack a candidate who stands for the ideas shared by the vast majority of Republicans, that's demoralizing," says Pat Toomey, a former congressman who heads Club for Growth, an antitax group that backed Mr. Laffey.

Just as trends may be turning slightly more favorable for Republicans, Tuesday's back-to-back clashes between the Republican Party machine and its base in Rhode Island as well as in Arizona could diminish turnout among conservative voters in November. Turnout by that voting bloc carried the president in 2000 and 2004.

But frustration among those voters has been mounting for years and covers issues such as government spending, the Iraq war and illegal immigration. "Conservatism traditionally was a philosophy of smaller government. In the Bush years, it appears it isn't," says David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank.

Washington Monthly this month published a collection of essays, titled "Time For Us To Go," by conservatives on the theme that Republicans have so lost their way they would be better off losing their majorities as well.

In his essay, former congressman and now television talk-show host Joe Scarborough recalls the moment a magazine representative called and "meekly" asked if he would consider writing an article about why "Republicans should get their brains beaten in this fall. 'Count me in!' was my chipper response," he says.

On the political battleground, conservative groups have been trying to change the party profile in primaries.

In California this spring, they backed Howard Kaloogian, who lost to moderate Brian Bilbray, in a race to fill the San Diego seat vacated by Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. The party backed Mr. Bilbray and used $5 million to win the primary and special election against Democrat Francine Busby.

In Michigan, Mr. Toomey's Club for Growth and the National Right to Life Committee rallied behind evangelical minister and former state Rep. Tim Walberg to defeat moderate incumbent Rep. Joe Schwarz, who was endorsed by President Bush.

In Rhode Island, party officials backed Mr. Chafee, who voted against many of the president's tax cuts and the Iraq war, because they thought Mr. Laffey was too conservative to hold on to the Senate seat in the heavily Democratic state.

Laffey activists expected that move, says the Heritage Foundation's Michael Franc, adding: "Incumbent survival instinct trumps all else." What stunned them was a string of last-minute attack ads paid for by the National Republican Senatorial Committee and Republican National Committee that blasted Mr. Laffey's record and his character.

"They really hit low," says Don Devine, editor of the American Conservative Union's newsletter. In Arizona, the battle was for the seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe. Conservatives supported state Rep. Randy Graf, whose get-tough immigration platform fit with a House bill passed earlier this year. Pro-Graf forces were startled when, in the final weeks of the campaign, Speaker Dennis Hastert and other House leaders poured cash into the race of moderate Steve Huffman, who embraced a Senate immigration bill that would have created a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

Mr. Graf beat Mr. Huffman by six points, but conservatives yesterday were still fuming about House leaders' decision to interfere in a race where they had no incumbent to protect. "It's outrageous," says the Cato Institute's Mr. Boaz.

Party strategists are working to reconnect and reinvigorate their base and believe they have enough time to do that.

DOJ_NMG_0063127

"At this point, conservatives are fairly lethargic, if not discouraged. But the prospect of [House Democratic Leader] Nancy Pelosi and [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean running the country can be a great motivator," says Whit Ayres, a Republican polling expert.

Bush Gets A Lift From Emphasis On Terror, Iraq (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's efforts to explain and win support for his policies on Iraq and terrorism appear to be paying some initial dividends as midterm congressional campaigns heat up.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1 shows that Mr. Bush's overall approval rating, as well as his marks on handling Iraq, rose modestly after a series of speeches imploring Americans to remain patient despite repeated setbacks in Iraq. Voters also expressed slightly increased willingness to maintain U.S. troop strength there as commanders struggle to tamp down a continued insurgency and sectarian violence.

It remains "a modest uptick" in "a very difficult national environment" for the president's party in midterm elections, cautions Republican pollster Bill McInturff. The president's approval rating remains weak at 42%, though it is improved from 38% in June. A 54% majority of voters continues to say the U.S. is headed in the wrong direction.

Yet the poll results suggest Mr. Bush retains some ability to shape the context of the election to his party's benefit. Whether that can last beyond the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks through to Election Day on Nov. 7 remains an open question. If so, the president could lighten what has been a period of persistent gloom for Republicans. Along with the roiling Iraq issue, factors that have cost the party range from the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina to the administration's fizzled Social Security privatization to rising gasoline prices.

The unpopular war and the historic pattern of midterm losses for the party holding the White House have strategists in both parties maintaining forecasts of Republican losses in Congress. Still, it remains unclear whether those losses will flip control of the House or the Senate or both. Republicans have held the House since 1994 and the Senate since 2002.

"In meteorological terms, it's going to be a hurricane -- what has yet to be determined is whether it's Category 1 or Category 3 or Category 5," says Peter Hart, the Democratic pollster who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Mr. McInturff. "If [Mr. Bush] has the ability to dominate the dialogue, he can push this election toward the Republicans even as he remains unpopular with the voters."

Mr. Bush used the 9/11 anniversary to buttress his assertion that Iraq is the "central front" in the antiterror campaign, an argument that might help Republicans limit their losses and hold control of at least one chamber of Congress for the final two years of Mr. Bush's presidency.

And officials of the Republican Party and at the White House yesterday were celebrating the Tuesday night primary victory of a Republican who opposed the war, moderate Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island. Though Mr. Chafee had opposed Mr. Bush on tax cuts and the war, party strategists concluded he has a far better chance of holding the seat against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse in November than his conservative challenger did. Mr. Chafee's re-election would increase the odds against the Democrats' gaining the six seats it needs to capture Senate control. (Please see related article8.)

Strategists in both parties believe Democrats have a stronger chance of picking up the 15 seats necessary to win control of the House. Yet economic developments have the potential to brighten voters' mood after months in which Mr. Bush and Republicans received scant credit for continued growth and low unemployment.

Crude-oil prices have fallen from $77 a barrel in early August to $63.97 yesterday, sending gasoline prices well below previous highs of more than $3 a gallon at the pump. And stock prices continued their climb from a slump in July: The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 45.23 points yesterday to close at 11543.32 -- just 1.6% short of the record.

So far, all of this is providing only mixed benefits for Republican candidates. Approval of Congress actually fell to 20% in this month's survey from 24% in July, and Democrats maintained a 48%-39% edge on voters' preference of which party should control Capitol Hill.

At the same time, the Journal/NBC poll shows voters split on whether their incumbent House member deserves re-election. In July, voters said it was time to "give a new person a chance" by a 10-percentage-point margin. Voters also say by 42% to 37% that they are more concerned Democrats have offered "no specific plans" than that Republicans have offered "no changes" to deal with the country's problems. The telephone survey of 1,009 registered voters, conducted Sept. 8-11, carries a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

In part, those results show the impact of Republican candidates' advertising attacks on their Democratic foes at an earlier point in the campaign season than in past elections. Democrats acknowledge that Mr. Bush's party has been quicker this year than President Clinton's allies were in 1994 to gauge the depth of political trouble they face and adjust tactics accordingly.

DOJ_NMG_0063128

The adjustments have been reflected on Capitol Hill in Republican leaders' decision, made in conjunction with White House officials, to spend September debating the surveillance and prosecution of terror suspects in the wake of court decisions rejecting Mr. Bush's initial approach to both. Some Republican lawmakers are dissenting from Mr. Bush's approach, but the Journal/NBC survey shows voters prefer Republicans to Democrats on handling terrorism by a 14-percentage-point margin. (Please see related article9.)

Another such step was Republican leaders' decision to shelve Mr. Bush's request for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws in the face of conservative opposition to a guest-worker program embracing some who already have crossed the border illegally. Instead, House Republicans spent much of the summer courting conservatives by emphasizing border security.

Whatever the cause, the Journal/NBC poll shows Republicans have taken initial steps toward narrowing the gap in voter interest that has favored the Democratic faithful for months. In July, 57% of Democratic voters expressed the highest possible level of interest in the election, compared with 46% of Republicans.

Now, that "interest gap" has narrowed to 51%-46% in the Democrats' favor. Hispanic voters, the constituency Republicans have feared alienating with an emphasis on border security, evince significantly less interest in the election than either whites or African-Americans.

Democrats hold the upper hand on some key issues in the survey, including a 23-percentage-point edge on handling Social Security and a 12-percentage-point advantage on handling the economy. Voters citing jobs, Social Security or health care as their top priority -- a group that accounts for nearly half the electorate -- want Democrats to win control of Congress, 60% to 25%.

Yet the slightly smaller group naming terrorism, moral values or immigration as top priorities favors Republican control by a similarly lopsided margin. That means control of the campaign dialogue will be a critical factor in battleground House and Senate races.

The Iraq war, now in its fourth year and with more than 2,500 U.S. troop deaths, remains the Republicans' most daunting political problem because it has depressed the overall public mood and fueled demand for change. Still, the poll shows how Republican candidates may best be able to limit the political fallout.

When offered a choice between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels and a Democrat who wants to reduce them, voters choose the Democrat by a 53%-40% margin. If offered a choice between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels and a Democrat seeking "immediate and orderly withdrawal," voters prefer the Republican by 48%-41%.

"There's a reason that Republicans and the president are trying to make this a choice for stability [in Iraq] versus 'cut-and-run,'" says Mr. McInturff, the Republican pollster. "If you're a Republican candidate, you'd better make this election on a narrow range of issues."

The Journal/NBC survey shows Mr. Bush's approval rating on the economy has risen to 43% from 39% in June. That may in part reflect an easing of energy costs; 26% cite "gas prices and energy costs" as the biggest economic trouble spot, down from 41% in July.

Rising stock-market values haven't yet translated into increasing optimism about the economy. Just one in five voters surveyed says the economy has improved in the past year, unchanged since June.

An Anti-Incumbent Election? This Year? Of Course Not (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

Over the past year or so, I've heard more than a few people talking about 2006 as an anti-incumbent election. Well, those people are wrong. We are not going to have an anti-incumbent election in November. We are going to have an anti-Bush election.

First, let's get our terms straight. If "anti-incumbent election" means anything, it is that voters are so dissatisfied with the status quo that they vote against all incumbents, regardless of party. The term highlights one, and only one, quality of embattled candidates: their incumbency.

This kind of election is not about party or ideology or how Members voted on a particular piece of legislation. If it were about any of those things, it wouldn't simply be an "anti-incumbent" election. An anti-incumbent election is a referendum on the "ins," and voters, for whatever reasons, are so unhappy with the performance of those "ins" — all the "ins" — that they throw them out. All of them.

I'm sure 2006 won't be an anti-incumbent election, for two very different reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0063129

First, history strongly suggests — and "suggests" actually is far too mild a word — that we don't have anti-incumbent elections in this country. I'm not saying that we've never had one or that we never will have one, but I'm hard-pressed to identify one during the past 50 years.

Over the past 26 Congressional elections, going back to 1954, there have been only three elections when at least a half-dozen incumbents of both parties were defeated — 1956, 1990 and 1992, according to "Vital Statistics on Congress, 2001-02," edited by Norman Ornstein, Thomas Mann and Michael Malbin.

By contrast, we have had eight elections in which one party knocked off at least 20 of the opponent's incumbents and lost fewer than a half-dozen of its own.

Virtually all midterm elections are a referendum on the party of the president, so it isn't surprising that when a political wave hits, it damages one party much more heavily than it does the other.

The worst bipartisan election since the mid-1950s was in 1992, when a total of 24 sitting House Members — 16 Republicans and eight Democrats — were defeated. While there was a strong anti-Washington, D.C., mood developing in this country at that time, that year also was a redistricting election in which some incumbents didn't possess the normal advantages of incumbency. That fact undoubtedly explains so many incumbent losses.

Otherwise, over the past 50 years, the closest we've come to an anti-incumbent election was in 1990, when six Democrats and nine Republicans lost in the general election, and in 1978, when 14 Democrats and five Republicans were defeated that November.

Second, there is very little evidence that the environment in the current cycle is heavily stacked against incumbents in general, even though a handful have been defeated for renomination.

Looking toward November, there is no indication that the two major parties both are facing significant incumbent losses. I suppose Democrats could lose an incumbent or two if things go poorly for them, but right now there isn't a single Democratic seat that ranks in the 25 most vulnerable House seats in the country.

Not one. Not a single one. The vulnerability is entirely on one side of the partisan aisle.

How could we possibly be having an anti-incumbent election if one party loses 10, 15 or even 20 incumbents and the other party loses none, or one or two?

Instead, what is developing is a classic political wave of voter dissatisfaction about the direction of the nation and the performance of the president. Congressional candidates from the president's party are about to bear the brunt of voter dissatisfaction, because President Bush isn't on the ballot.

Republican incumbents are in trouble not because they are incumbents, but because they are Republicans.

This election isn't really about agendas. Sure, Democrats have something called their "New Direction," but most voters aren't regarding November primarily as a choice between two visions or two ideologies. No, it's about sending a message to the president and to Congress that they aren't happy — specifically with the Iraq War, but more generally as well.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is quite correct when he says Republicans will do better when the election is a choice rather than a referendum. Unfortunately for him, that's not likely to happen until 2008.

So what about the defeats of Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), Reps. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) and Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.), and even Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski (R)? The answer is simple. Each lost for specific reasons, not because of a trend. It isn't their incumbency that unites them. They lost because of their own voting records and style.

While it is true that voters are not particularly impressed with Congress in general or either of the two major parties, the midterm elections have developed into a referendum on the president. Republicans may well succeed in minimizing the damage in November by localizing elections and re-electing incumbents, but there is no indication that voters will send a message of dissatisfaction with all incumbents in the fall.

That means that all but a handful of Democratic House incumbents can rest easy.

Analysis: Party Convictions Sidelined (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, September 13, 2006

All politics is national in the 2006 midterm elections, with both parties willing to put aside deeply held views over war, taxes and more in the surpassing struggle for control of the House and Senate.

Which explains why a conservative Republican Party rejoiced Wednesday at the primary victory of Rhode Island's incorrigibly independent GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee, and struggled with the defeat of the more moderate of two leading contenders for a House seat in Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0063130

Or why Democrats, whose leaders call daily for a timetable for a troop withdrawal from Iraq, were less than thrilled to find vigorously anti-war contenders winning nominations for House seats in New Hampshire and New York.

Nowhere was the phenomenon more obvious than Rhode Island, where Republicans placed an abundance of money and manpower into an effort to save their most liberal senator from defeat at the hands of a conservative primary challenger.

"We appreciate him. We know that he fits Rhode Island and he's got a record that's effective for the concerns of the people of Rhode Island," Sen. Elizabeth Dole, head of the GOP senatorial campaign committee, said in praise of Chafee. The Rhode Islander opposes the war in Iraq and President Bush's tax cuts, while supporting abortion rights.

In case anyone missed the point, she recast it in more overtly political terms. "This race would've immediately fallen into the hands of the Democrats if, in fact, Linc Chafee had lost this race" to Stephen Laffey.

Nationally, Democrats must gain six seats to capture control of the Senate.

"That would have been one down, right there," Dole said. She felt strongly about it, having approved a barrage of television commercials that depicted Laffey as weak on immigration and prone to raising taxes.

Not that Rhode Island is safe for Chafee or the Republicans in the fall.

The state's former attorney general, Sheldon Whitehouse, drew more votes in an essentially uncontested Democratic primary than Chafee and Laffey combined in their heated race, and the most recent pre-primary polls point toward a close race in November.

Chafee presented his credentials as he returned to campaigning.

"Rhode Islanders are going to know I'm independent, over and over again," he said.

But Whitehouse had already served notice he would try to undercut the claim. Speaking to supporters Tuesday night, he noted that the first vote cast when the new Congress convenes will determine which party controls the Senate.

"I can tell you this: I will never cast that vote to empower the Bush agenda," he said, a slap at Chafee.

Republican Party officials applied the same logic in Arizona, where Randy Graf ran on a tough-on-immigration platform for the GOP nomination in a district that runs to the Mexican border.

Strategists in Washington deemed him too conservative to hold the seat, and ran television commercials praising one of his rivals, Steven Huffman.

Graf won anyway, and immediately ran into difficulties. Rep. Jim Kolbe, the Republican who has held the seat for more than 20 years, issued a statement that said, "There are such profound and fundamental differences between his views and mine on several key issues that I would not be true to my own principles were I to endorse him now for the general election in November."

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win control of the House, and like Republicans, looked past their policy views — then conceded they had run afoul of voters who preferred a nominee with a sharper position on the war.

Judith Aydelott was the early choice of the Democratic establishment to run in the Hudson Valley of New York. The voters weren't as impressed, giving her little more than one-fourth of the votes cast.

Singer-songwriter John Hall carries the nomination into the fall campaign against Republican Sue Kelly.

For months, party officials had touted Jim Craig as the type of challenger who could make a New Hampshire congressional seat competitive. A leader in the New Hampshire legislature, he had the support of party officials in Washington as well as at the state capital in Concord, N.H.

He lost, in a rout, to Carol Shea-Porter, who raised a mere $40,000.

Of the war, she said recently, "We need to get out. We don't have to tell insurgents over there the exact date, but we better tell ourselves what the date is and better start planning to leave."

That sounds like something any one of dozens of congressional Democrats could say with pride.

Now, they'll find out whether their calculation was correct — that it might have been preferable to mute opposition to the war in districts like the one around the New Hampshire seacoast or the military academy at West Point.

What Primaries Say About US Voter Mood (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

In the end, the most-watched race of the Sept. 12 primaries became the dog that didn't bark. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, beat back a fierce challenge by a populist conservative supported by the antitax Club for Growth.

DOJ_NMG_0063131

A loss by Senator Chafee would have been nearly without precedent in modern times - the second senator to lose in the primaries, following Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman's defeat in Connecticut last month. Headlines would have screamed about voters clamoring for change, and about ideological purges in both parties.

The outcome - a 54-to-46 Chafee victory over Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, relatively close for an incumbent in a primary - suggests that the national Republican Party did indeed need to pull out all the stops, as it did, to ensure that the conservative was not the nominee and a near-certain loser in November. Rhode Island is one of the most liberal states in the country. Before the primary race heated up, sparking a flurry of Republican registration by independents and even some Democrats to help save Chafee, only about 11 percent of voters were registered Republican.

But the dynamic in Rhode Island was completely different from that of Connecticut. In the Lieberman race, no viable Republican is running, so the Demo- crats could afford to hold a primary centered on a major issue - US policy in Iraq. The Republicans could not afford to let the Senate primary be all about taxes and pork-barrel spending and the Iraq war. It needed to be about electability.

"In Rhode Island, had Chafee lost, the Democrats would have picked up that seat," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. Renominating Chafee is "a matter of pure pragmatism on the part of Republicans in Rhode Island."

Thus Chafee, the only Republican senator to vote against authorizing US military action in Iraq in 2002 - and who did not even vote to reelect President Bush in 2004 - was treated to lots of national Republican money in his quest for renomination. Dr. Sabato surmises that if just the true Republicans had voted in the primary, Laffey probably would have won 60 percent to 40 percent or better.

"It was the independents and even Democrats who switched registration who saved Chafee," he says, noting that small-state, personal loyalty to the patrician senator among non-Republicans likely played a role. Chafee is one of Rhode Island's political brand names; Lincoln's father, John, was a longtime, beloved senator from the state.

Still, the Chafee name and record may not be enough to save the current senator in November. He faces a tough challenge from former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse (D). Mr. Whitehouse's father roomed with John Chafee at Yale University, a sign of just how small Rhode Island is.

By keeping that race competitive for the GOP, Chafee's primary victory makes it that much more difficult for the Democrats to retake control of the Senate in November. The party needs to make a net gain of six seats to win control.

In other Sept. 12 primaries:

· In Arizona's eighth congressional district, Randy Graf, a conservative running against illegal immigration, defeated the moderate Republican, handing a major opportunity to the Democrats to take over a seat currently held by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R). State Sen. Gabrielle Giffords won the Democratic primary.

· In Maryland, Rep. Ben Cardin defeated former Rep. Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination. Mr. Cardin will face Lt. Gov. Michael Steele (R), one of the handful of African-Americans running for high-level office this November.

· In Washington, D.C., city council member Adrian Fenty handily won the Democratic primary for mayor, and will almost certainly coast to victory in November. At age 35, he would be the youngest mayor in city history, and also the first native Washingtonian to win that position. Washington has had elected mayors since it gained home rule in 1973. Mr. Fenty defeated D.C. council chair and veteran politician Linda Cropp, a sign of voter hunger for change.

· In Michigan, state Rep. Keith Ellison is now in position to become the first Muslim elected to Congress, as well as the first African-American to the House from Minnesota. He won the Democratic primary, in a highly Democratic district, to replace retiring Rep. Martin Sabo (D).

· In New Hampshire's first congressional district, antiwar Democrat Carol Shea-Porter won a primary upset, defeating the party's favored candidate, state House minority leader Jim Craig. Ms. Shea-Porter will face Rep. Jeb Bradley (R) in November. The Bradley seat appears on most lists of competitive House races, and the Iraq war is likely to be a central issue in the general election. Shea-Porter favors a deadline for withdrawal, while Bradley favors withdrawal only after Iraq is stable.

· In New York, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) cruised to renomination, with 83 percent of the vote, over antiwar candidate Jonathan Tasini. Senator Clinton is expected to win reelection easily in November, thus paving the way for her to address the biggest question of her political career: Will she run for president in 2008?

Primaries Sharpen Focus In The Battle For Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063132

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The battle for control of Congress came into sharper focus Wednesday after Tuesday's primaries gave House Republicans an edge in a New Hampshire race, Democrats got a leg up on an open House seat in Arizona and the two parties settled in for a Senate showdown in Rhode Island.

In a display of Republican ability to get voters to the polls, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island rode a record Republican primary turnout to a victory over Mayor Stephen Laffey of Cranston, saving Republicans from prematurely surrendering a seat to Democrats, who need a net gain of six to take over the Senate.

"That would have been one down right there,'' said Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "There was no way that Mayor Laffey could have won the general election.''

Despite Mr. Chafee's penchant for crossing party lines on big issues, national Republicans poured in money and workers in a push to hold the seat, displaying anew why Democrats are worried about the deep pockets and get-out-the-vote operations of their rivals.

But Democrats said the level of support for their candidate in Rhode Island, former Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse — who received more votes than the two Republican candidates combined — left them confident they could unseat Mr. Chafee in November. They also said that Mr. Chafee had been bolstered by his opposition to the war in Iraq and other Bush policies and that Mr. Whitehouse could trump him there.

"Yesterday's election showed that when you're anti-Bush, you win,'' said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, who said Democrats had showed strong enthusiasm even without a contested race.

"This is going to be an uphill fight for them in November,'' Mr. Schumer said of Republicans.

Mrs. Dole and other Republicans said they believed that Mr. Chafee, whose father was a popular Rhode Island senator, would attract substantial Democratic and independent support in November. "He has shown the ability to win with cross-over voters,'' said Senator George Allen of Virginia, who ran the Senate Republican campaign organization two years ago.

In Arizona, Democrats said they believed their chances for winning the House seat in the Tucson area being vacated by Representative Jim Kolbe, a Republican, were enhanced by the primary victory of Randy Graf, a conservative Republican.

The National Republican Congressional Committee had backed Mr. Graf's more moderate opponent, Steve Huffman, as the better candidate for the general election. Mr. Kolbe said Wednesday that he would not endorse Mr. Graf, citing "profound and fundamental differences between his views and mine on several key issues.''

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign arm, said the party would rally behind Mr. Graf, including showcasing him on Thursday before potential party donors. In addition, Mr. Forti said, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, would be contributing $5,000 from his own campaign to Mr. Graf.

Democrats said they were confident that the division within the Republican Party would open the door to their candidate, Gabrielle Giffords, a former state legislator, capturing the seat held for two decades by Mr. Kolbe.

In New Hampshire, Jim Craig, a moderate Democrat who had been backed by his party in the primary to take on Representative Jeb Bradley in the Manchester area, lost to the antiwar candidate Carol Shea-Porter.

"Obviously, that is embarrassing for Democrats,'' said Representative Charles Bass, the Republican who represents New Hampshire's other House district, predicting that Mr. Bradley would now be re-elected.

The Democratic Party's choice in the 19th Congressional District of New York, represented by Sue W. Kelly, a Republican, also lost on Tuesday. Ms. Kelly will now face the singer-songwriter John Hall, who has attracted celebrity backing from the music community.

In a highly publicized primary to succeed Representative Martin Olav Sabo of Minnesota, a Democrat who is retiring, Keith Ellison, a state legislator, won a tough race in the Minneapolis-area district. That puts Mr. Ellison in line to become the first Muslim member of Congress.

Primary Colors (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Hillary Clinton and Eliot Spitzer barely broke a sweat in winning their primaries Tuesday, but that doesn't mean the day lacked drama. Just ask Rhode Island Senator Lincoln Chafee, who staved off a spirited challenge from tax-cutting conservative Stephen Laffey, thanks largely to the national GOP he belongs to but regularly undermines.

Mr. Chafee has caused nothing but headaches for his caucus on everything from tax cuts to Social Security to the war on terror, but he was backed by a White House concerned with keeping the seat nominally Republican and worried that Mr. Laffey was too conservative to win in November. The national party poured millions into attack ads against Mr. Laffey and more or less told GOP voters the party would abandon the seat if he won.

The White House used a similar strategy in 2004, when it backed Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania against a conservative challenge by Pat Toomey. At least Mr. Specter has returned the favor by helping to confirm President Bush's Supreme Court nominees. Now we'll see if Mr. Chafee -- who famously didn't vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito -- is similarly grateful. The first test will be if he votes to confirm John Bolton as U.N. Ambassador.

Meanwhile, the national GOP was on the losing side Tuesday in Arizona, where a primary for an open House seat went to anti-immigration hard-liner Randy Graf. Immigration was the dominant issue in the Tucson district that borders Mexico. Yet Mr. Graf managed a plurality of just 43%, the same amount he received in a primary two years ago in a loss to Jim Kolbe, the 11-term pro-immigration incumbent retiring this year. GOP restrictionists are cheering Mr. Graf's victory, but he is now expected to lose the seat in November. Restrictionists also took a blow as their Arizona candidate for governor, Don Goldwater -- who campaigned at the border, yelling "Mr. Bush, build this wall now!" -- lost handily to a conservative who favors comprehensive immigration reform.

Back East, Maryland Democrats chose Representative Ben Cardin over former NAACP chief Kweisi Mfume in a Senate primary, which means GOP candidate and current Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele has his work cut out. It also means there won't be two black candidates for a Senate seat, although it will be interesting to see what inroads Mr. Steele can make with black Democrats. If he wins the general election, the Senate will have two black Members for the first time in history.

Antiwar Democrats also made themselves heard again. They won in New Hampshire, lifting Carol Shea-Porter, who called for withdrawal from Iraq, over Jim Craig, who heavily outspent her and was backed by the party establishment. They lost in Maryland, but not before putting a scare into Representative Al Wynn, who voted for the war and has voted with the GOP on campaign finance issues and some tax cuts. He won 50%-46%.

Both were electoral surprises likely to push the Congressional Democrats further left on the war. Whether that will help them in November is another story, since Ned Lamont's victory last month over Connecticut Senator Joe Lieberman seems to be helping the GOP retain its three vulnerable House seats in that state. You know it's a volatile political year when the GOP is counting on victories by a pro-war Democrat and an antiwar Republican (Mr. Chafee) to keep control of Congress.

Prudence At The Polls (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The lesson from Tuesday's round of primaries in nine states and the District of Columbia was simple and reassuring. Credentials count. Experience counts. And so does the willingness to engage some serious issues.

For the most part, the candidates nominated for Congress and governor come from the mainstream establishments of their parties. Despite the widespread voter discontent with the political status quo, few mavericks, rebels or true outsiders won places on the November ballot.

In the day's headline event, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, turned back the challenge of Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, a conservative populist.

The margin was not great -- 5,000 votes in a turnout of some 63,000. Chafee probably owes his victory as much to the financial and organizational support supplied by the Republicans' national campaign committees as to his own diffident campaigning. The White House and GOP Senate leaders decided to overlook Chafee's frequent disagreements with the president in hopes of keeping a Senate seat that Democrats have to win to have any chance of capturing a Senate majority.

The Chafee name is honored in Rhode Island, thanks to the legacy of the incumbent's father, the late John Chafee, who served as governor and senator for years. Chafee still faces a serious challenge from the Democratic nominee, former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, in the heavily Democratic state. But the Republicans' chances are far better with Chafee than with anyone else.

In another Rhode Island contest, Brown University professor Jennifer Lawless challenged Rep. Jim Langevin in the Democratic primary, arguing that his support of bills to finance the war in Iraq and his opposition to abortion rights put him outside the mainstream of the party. But this effort failed, as did most other tries inside Democratic primaries to repeat Ned Lamont's upset of Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman. With Lieberman now out front in the race, running as an independent, the idea that Lamont represented the new model for the party looks suspect.

One exception was in New Hampshire, where an antiwar activist, Carol Shea-Porter, who mobilized student and liberal support, beat the party-endorsed legislative leader, Jim Craig, for a House nomination. But she is a long shot against Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley.

The antiwar maverick who tried to upset Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in New York predictably was swamped, as was the estimable Long Island Democratic official, Thomas Suozzi, who challenged Attorney General Eliot Spitzer for governor. Spitzer now becomes a heavy favorite in November.

In another New York race, a seeming outsider, musician and pop composer John Hall, won the Democratic nomination to oppose Republican Rep. Sue Kelly. Hall, who played with the rock band Orleans and co-wrote "Still the One," had to overcome the early favorite, Judy Aydelott, who switched from the GOP in disagreement with President Bush's policies and attracted support from feminist groups and Hollywood types. Hall had stronger ties to the district's Democrats, and the backing of organized labor, so he was really the insiders' choice.

But out in Arizona, the power of another issue -- immigration -- was displayed when Randy Graf, an outspoken advocate of closing the border, won a close victory over party-endorsed moderate state Rep. Steve Huffman, for the Republican nomination to succeed retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe. The Kolbe-backed Huffman might have won, except that another moderate candidate took 12 percent of the vote -- twice Graf's margin. The district now becomes even more of a pickup target for the Democrats.

In Maryland, quiet competence prevailed when Rep. Ben Cardin, a 10-term veteran of the House and one of its most skilled but unflamboyant legislators, won in a large field to pick a successor to retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes. Having defeated Kweisi Mfume, the former head of the NAACP, in the primary, Cardin now faces another attractive African American, Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Maryland usually elects Democrats, but Steele could change the dynamics of the race.

The Sarbanes legacy continues, as the senator's son, attorney John Sarbanes, won the Democratic nomination to succeed Cardin in the House. His dad appeared in the novice candidate's commercials.

Another notable likely Democratic winner is state Rep. Keith Ellison of Minneapolis, the nominee for the seat of retiring Rep. Martin Olav Sabo in a heavily Democratic district. Ellison would be the first Muslim elected to Congress.

All together, the day's results showed commendable discernment on the part of the voters. It augurs well for November.

The GOP's Borderline Politics In Arizona (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

REPUBLICAN LAWMAKERS' internecine battles over immigration policy have already prevented them from acting on one of President Bush's top second-term priorities: comprehensive immigration reform. Now the GOP border split is threatening to cost Republicans at least one seat in the House of Representatives.

On Tuesday, Republican primary voters in Arizona's 8th Congressional District chose former state legislator and pro golfer Randy Graf — who wants to militarize the southern border and who received $40,000 from the vigilante Minuteman Project — over four opponents, most of whom took a more sensible approach on immigration.

Graf may be further to the right than the national GOP, but on issues such as taxes, same-sex marriage and abortion, he's right in line with the Bush administration. Nevertheless, the National Republican Congressional Committee was so worried about his ability to win this marginally Republican district in November that it threw more than $250,000 worth of advertising behind one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman.

The money and national support may have helped Huffman, but not enough. He wound up with 37% of the vote to Graf's 43%; the remaining 20% was divided among the other three candidates. Democrats, meanwhile, threw their support behind former Republican Gabrielle Giffords, who served five years in the state Legislature as a Democrat. Early polls show Giffords leading Graf in the race to succeed retiring Republican Jim Kolbe, who handily defeated Graf in the GOP primary two years ago.

Like Southern Californians, Arizonans experience firsthand the effects of illegal immigration, both bad and good. The labor supply and entrepreneurial energy have become vital to some industries even as schools, hospitals and other public institutions have strained to meet the burdens imposed. These experiences have divided voters and elected representatives. Three Arizona Republicans, including Kolbe, are leading sponsors of comprehensive reform bills that would create a guest-worker program as well as increase border security; four others are members of Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo's Immigration Reform Caucus, which seeks to seal the borders, deny citizenship to American-born children of illegal immigrant parents and slow legal immigration to a trickle.

Though he won, Graf drew fewer votes this year than he did in 2004 against Kolbe. Meanwhile, in the GOP primary for Arizona governor, an immigration restrictionist candidate, Don Goldwater (Barry's nephew), was outpolled, 49% to 41%, by Len Munsil, who took a less aggressive stance on illegal immigrants. So it's hard to argue that either side of the debate is gathering steam. The intriguing question remains whether the tough talk that wins primaries in September will do as well in general elections this November.

In R.I., A Model For Voter Turnout (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

The turnout campaign that Republican operatives used to help pull Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee to victory in the Rhode Island primary was a potent demonstration of how money and manpower can transform a race even in an unfavorable political environment -- and a preview of the strategy that national party officials say they plan to replicate in the most competitive House and Senate races over the next 55 days.

In the past two national elections, in 2002 and 2004, Republicans outperformed Democrats in bringing their backers to the polls, but many Democrats and independent analysts have suggested that the competition may be different this year, in part because of slumping morale among GOP activists. But Chafee's performance -- combined with reports of late-starting organization and internal bickering on the Democratic side -- suggest that the Republican advantage on turnout may remain intact even as many other trends are favoring the opposition.

The Republican National Committee, convinced that Chafee is the party's only chance of keeping a seat in a Democratic-leaning state, spent $400,000 to ship 86 out-of-state volunteers and several paid staff members to Rhode Island. They targeted not just Republicans but also independent voters during the final days of the campaign, following a blueprint developed months ago by the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the Chafee campaign.

The effort helped Chafee survive a spirited challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey by boosting primary turnout to an all-time high. In June, GOP leaders used a similar turnout program to help lobbyist Brian Bilbray win a special California election for the House seat vacated by indicted GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

There were several factors behind Chafee's 54 percent to 46 percent win, including his popularity among independents and his decision to attack Laffey in television ads during the final weeks of the campaign. But it was the repeat success of the GOP voter-mobilization program that had Democrats anxiously examining returns.

"Their turnout operation is exquisite," a senior Democratic strategist said. "We are not going to match them."

While Democrats are confident they are on track to capture the House and possibly the Senate, top party leaders are privately expressing concerns about the RNC's $30 million financial advantage over the Democratic National Committee and how the money will be used to maximize turnout in pivotal races.

Events this week put the GOP edge in sharp relief. While the RNC was fine-tuning its "microtargeting" program in Rhode Island, Democrats were announcing they had finally resolved a months-long dispute between Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) over a budget for mobilizing voters.

The DNC will spend $12 million to help Democrats up and down the ballot this fall. Some party leaders privately acknowledge that House Democrats in particular are only beginning to put in place an operation to turn out voters and that Republicans are many months ahead in planning.

Democratic leaders, who agreed to speak about the matter on the condition of anonymity, said their turnout strategy will be sufficient even if it is not equal. Senate Democrats have already put $10 million into turnout for contested races and began a detailed voter-identification effort months ago, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has brought on grass-roots organizing expert Michael Whouley to head up its turnout efforts. Democrats said they have one advantage this year that Republicans cannot match: voter intensity. Numerous polls show that Democrats, disdainful of President Bush and the Iraq war, are motivated to vote on Nov. 7, while Republicans do not have similar enthusiasm.

Still, Republicans said the combination of the Chafee win and new polling data showing renewed voter confidence in GOP anti-terrorism policies suggest their election plan could limit losses and protect their congressional majorities. An ABC News poll released yesterday found that Bush's relentless focus on terrorism in the run-up to the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks benefited the White House and the GOP. Republicans held an edge of seven percentage points when respondents were asked which party they trust to handle terrorism, a 14-point change from last month.

Fred Yang, a Democratic pollster involved in competitive races this fall, said he was not surprised by Republicans' improving numbers on the fight against terrorism but added: "If this blip holds, it should be something that concerns us."

Chafee, who often clashes with the White House and congressional leaders over policy and political tactics, said the Rhode Island primary shows that the GOP strategy can work. "The proof is in the pudding," he said. He noted that the state saw a record turnout for a Republican primary and said that the turnout operation "made the difference." The RNC lacks the resources to replicate its efforts in Rhode Island in every competitive congressional race. But GOP officials said that the $30 million they plan to spend on turnout will allow them to run aggressive programs in most of them. Already, for example, they have more than 40 paid field experts in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee and nine in Connecticut for the three competitive House races, according to a person familiar with RNC operations.

Near Election Day, they will decide where to deploy thousands of volunteers, some paid, for reinforcements.

Recent history underscores the importance of superior voter-mobilization plans. In 2004, Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.) thought that if he received 190,000 votes it would be impossible for former congressman John Thune (R) to beat him. Daschle won 193,340 votes; Thune got 197,848. In Ohio -- the central battleground in the race between Bush and Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) -- Democrats met all of their projected vote totals but came up more than 100,000 short.

The Rhode Island effort offered a window into how a mobilization program unfolds.

About six months ago, the National Republican Senatorial Committee sat down with the Chafee campaign to construct a voter-turnout program. Weekly phone calls followed and a number of NRSC senior staffers -- including political director Blaise Hazelwood -- made regular trips to the state to ensure the structure was being built. They identified potential Chafee voters and pressed Democrats to change their party identification to "unaffiliated," a move that would allow them to vote in the Republican primary.

As the campaign wore on, Republicans began another slew of phone calls to unaffiliated voters to tell them that they could vote for Chafee and then immediately change their registration back to unaffiliated or Democrat. The RNC road-tested a new technology in the race that officials said is making their targeting program faster and more precise. It is based on a program that allows volunteers to call potential voters, note their political views and preferences on sheet of paper and immediately scan the results into a huge database known as the Voter Vault. Experts in the political practice known as microtargeting can then instantly analyze the results to determine which issues are moving voters and adjust their pitch.

All told, the Chafee campaign spent $500,000 on the effort, while the Republican National Committee chipped in an additional $400,000. The NRSC spent $1.2 million on the race -- primarily on an extended television campaign that attacked Laffey. Heading into the final day, Chafee said he had "deep apprehensions" about his ability to win.

Bill Lynch, chairman of the Rhode Island Democratic Party, said the turnout numbers are worrisome. "It will make for an interesting couple of months," he said.

Democrats Form New Group For Fund-Raising And Ads (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Sensing both political danger and opportunity, a top Democratic operative and a group of major party donors have banded together to deliver a barrage of late advertising and on-the-ground action to secure Democratic victories in November.

The operative, Harold M. Ickes, a top aide to former President Bill Clinton and informal adviser to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, and a group of allies are soliciting money for a new organization called the September Fund.

They hope to raise and spend as much as $25 million to influence not only crucial Congressional races but also other campaigns and ballot initiatives at the federal and state level.

Mr. Ickes was among the chief organizers of several groups that raised more than $200 million from wealthy liberals and labor unions in 2004 to try to defeat President Bush.

After months in which Democrats have fretted about how much support they would get from those sources this time around, Mr. Ickes is turning to many of the same donors in hopes that a surge of spending in the fall campaign's final weeks will cement Democratic gains against a president and a Republican-led Congress whose approval ratings are sagging.

Mr. Ickes has already contacted George Soros, the billionaire financier who gave Democratic committees more than $25 million in 2004. Among others on the fund's list of potential donors are Steve Bing, a Hollywood producer; Linda Pritzker, a member of the family that owns Hyatt hotels; Herb and Marion Sandler, owners of a California savings and loan; and Ted Waitt, founder of the computer company Gateway. All gave multimillion-dollar gifts to the funds Mr. Ickes directed in 2004.

The September Fund, like the groups Mr. Ickes helped organize in 2004, is set up under a loophole in campaign finance law that allows political groups to escape federal donation limits that apply to party committees and candidates. Such groups, called 527 groups for the relevant section of the Internal Revenue Code, cannot advocate the election or defeat of any candidate but can engage in issue advertising that draws distinctions between the two parties.

Federal law bars such groups from coordinating their activities with candidates or party committees, although many of the people running them, like Mr. Ickes, have longstanding ties to top party figures.

Groups formed under Section 527 of the code were major players on both sides of the 2004 campaign. The best-known 527's allied with the Republicans were Swift Vets and P.O.W.'s for Truth (formerly known as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth) and Progress for America.

The Democrats were even more aggressive in 2004 in exploiting the 527 loophole. In addition to the Ickes groups — America Coming Together, the Media Fund and Joint Victory Campaign — major unions, environmental groups and MoveOn.org spent nearly $100 million.

The September Fund is Mr. Ickes's second venture this year to conduct political operations outside the formal structure of the Democratic Party and its chairman, Howard Dean. Earlier this year, he established a database of potential Democratic voters, partly financed by Mr. Soros, that some officials complained diverted resources from the party and could be used to assist a presidential bid by Senator Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0063137

The September Fund's president is Erik Smith, a longtime Democratic operative who directed the Media Fund. The treasurer is Albert J. Dwoskin, a Virginia developer and major party donor.

Mr. Smith said the group began soliciting money less than a week ago and had already secured pledges for several million dollars from individuals and labor unions. He would not name them.

Michael Vachon, a spokesman for Mr. Soros, said Mr. Soros had received a memorandum from the group and was considering a donation. Mr. Soros has already pledged about $3 million to other Democratic groups active in the fall campaign, Mr. Vachon said.

Leaders of the fund include Karen Ackerman, the political director of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., and Anna Burger, chairwoman of the Change to Win labor federation. Others involved are Gen. Wesley K. Clark, retired, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate; Nick Baldick, who managed the presidential campaign of former Senator John Edwards and the New York mayoral campaign of Fernando Ferrer; and Bill Lynch, a New York lobbyist and strategist.

America Coming Together and the Media Fund evaporated after the 2004 election, with many of their donors dispirited and apparently unwilling to participate in this year's election. But Mr. Ickes, an aide said, became alarmed in late August about what he saw as a growing Republican financial advantage and feared a late salvo of negative advertising that could overwhelm Democrats in close races.

In a memorandum to potential donors, Mr. Ickes and the other organizers of the fund warned that while Democrats appeared united in their political goals, Republicans had $80 million more than Democrats to spend on fall races.

If the September Fund achieves its financial goals, it will be one of the largest 527's operating at the federal level this fall, but there are several others in the field.

MoveOn.org, the Internet-based progressive group, plans to spend as much as $25 million on advertising and voter mobilization, particularly in races focusing on the war in Iraq. Majority Action, a project of two former Democratic Party chairmen, Joe Andrew and Don Fowler, is planning to spend $8 million to $10 million on advertisements in several Congressional districts. The Senate Majority Project is setting up a group to help Democrats in close races.

On the Republican side, Club for Growth has supported conservatives in primaries against moderate incumbents in Michigan and Rhode Island. Progress for America is running advertisements on national cable television and in Missouri praising Republican strength in combating terrorism.

Va. Senate Race Goes Negative On 1979 Essay (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 13 -- Virginia's U.S. Senate race turned nasty Wednesday as Republican Sen. George Allen launched a character attack on his Democratic opponent's past views toward women in combat, signaling the start of a two-month barrage of negative campaigning in what has become a close race.

Allen, who is fighting for a second term, organized a news conference with five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said an article written 27 years ago by Allen's opponent, James Webb, prompted harassment by male midshipmen at the academy.

In the Washingtonian magazine article, "Women Can't Fight," the ex-Marine Webb wrote of the brutal conditions during the Vietnam War and argued against letting women into combat. Allen's campaign zeroed in on passages in which Webb described one of the academy's coed dorms as "a horny woman's dream" and said that he had never met a woman he "would trust to provide . . . combat leadership."

Linda G. Postenrieder, a 1982 Naval Academy graduate and a registered Democrat from California, said the article "infected the brigade with hate and divisive anger." Lisa Stolle, an academy graduate from Virginia Beach, said that for women, Webb's article "was like throwing gasoline" on a fire.

Webb, a Naval Academy graduate who was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan, issued a statement saying he was sorry "to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship."

But his campaign also responded aggressively, accusing Allen of opposing the admission of women to the Virginia Military Institute and of once having accepted membership into an exclusive club while he was governor.

The rapid-fire charges from both sides offered clues to the days leading up to the Nov. 7 election. A campaign in which both sides had been trading disagreements about energy policy and the Iraq war is quickly becoming a personal spat between a decorated war hero and a football-loving senator and former governor.

"It's probably a good time to break out the Disney tapes for the kids, because the TV ads aren't going to be pretty," said Charlie Cook, an independent political analyst who edits the Cook Political Report. "Both these guys will do whatever it takes to win. Nobody's going to hold anything back."

DOJ_NMG_0063138

Already Wednesday, an independent veterans group began airing a TV commercial in some parts of Virginia accusing Allen of voting against a $1 billion amendment for high-quality body armor for troops in Iraq. In the ad, as bullets pierce a Vietnam-era flak jacket, an announcer urges voters to oust Allen. Jon Soltz, an Iraq war veteran from Pittsburgh, said his group is targeting Allen because "he let the troops down."

Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said the amendment, which Allen and other GOP senators opposed, was not specifically for body armor. He called the attack "so off the charts, unfair and completely false."

In response to Webb's other charges, Allen aides pointed out that Allen declined membership in Richmond's Commonwealth Club, which admitted no women and few blacks, a few days after he initially accepted it. They also said that Democrats and Republicans had opposed coeducation at VMI before courts ordered the school to admit women. Later, aides said, Allen insisted that female cadets be treated well.

"The difference is that Jim Webb used his position to demean women who wanted to serve their country," said Chris LaCivita, a senior consultant to the Allen campaign, which set up cameras to record the news conference for a possible campaign ad.

Allen has been on the defensive for a month, responding to criticism after calling a young Webb volunteer "Macaca" and fighting old charges of racial insensitivity. In a speech Tuesday to a black educational foundation, Allen again apologized for the comment and attempted to explain his youthful admiration of the Confederate flag.

"What I was slow to appreciate -- and wish I had understood much sooner -- is that this symbol, which for me simply stood for rebellion against authority, and for others stood for regional pride in heritage, is, for black Americans, an emblem of hate and terror, an emblem of intolerance and intimidation," Allen said.

On Wednesday, Allen's campaign went on the offensive. The five women said they were among the first to attend the Naval Academy, which began admitting women in 1976. In Webb's article, he argued women cannot physically endure combat training and military-style hazing. He also raised concerns about fraternization. "Men fight better without women around," Webb said.

"This article was brandished repeatedly. [Men] quoted and used it as an excuse to mistreat us," said Kathleen Murray, a 1984 academy graduate who rose to commander in the Navy and retired to Norfolk.

Murray said she contacted other women and urged them to discuss Webb's article after learning that he was running for the Senate. She described the group as "not partisan," though she acknowledged that Allen's campaign helped to "facilitate" their news conference.

Interviewed later, Dan Proulx, a member of the academy's Class of 1982, said that early classes of women were harassed but that he didn't think Webb's article fueled the problem: "I would say it reflected more the time and spirit of times and the debate than it caused anything."

In his statement, Webb said that his article was written "during a time of great emotional debate . . . in this country." He said he is "completely comfortable" with the role of women in the military today, which he helped achieve by increasing opportunities for women while he was Navy secretary.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said Allen was trying to smear Webb because the Democrat has been gaining in recent polls. "This is all they have, this kind of thing," she said. "It makes sense they would go in this direction."

Female Naval Academy Grads Say Webb Column Caused Harassment (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 14, 2006

RICHMOND — Five female U.S. Naval Academy graduates today said Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb fostered an air of hostility and harassment for them with a magazine article he wrote in 1979.

The women, who attended the academy in the late 1970s and early '80s, said the column in Washingtonian magazine emboldened male midshipmen to humiliate them continuously, and some even wore "Jim Webb Fan Club" T-shirts.

"I was devastated to be told by a war hero that the academy should be shut down rather than accept me and that my very presence was responsible for the degradation of the military," said Jennifer Brooks, a 1982 graduate now retired after 20 years in the Navy.

In a statement released by Webb's campaign, he said he did not anticipate the widespread reaction to his article, "and to the extent that my writing subjected women at the Academy or the active Armed Forces to undue hardship, I remain profoundly sorry."

Webb said in the statement he wrote the article "during a time of great emotional debate over a wide array of social issues in this country, and the tone of this article was no exception." He said he is "completely comfortable" with women's roles in today's military.

DOJ_NMG_0063139

The women spoke at a news conference organized and paid for by Webb's Republican opponent, Sen. George Allen, on a day that marked a sharp negative turn in a race that polls show is about even.

An independent political action committee of Iraq war veterans announced the first television attack ad of the race, accusing Allen of voting in the Senate not to fund lifesaving modern body armor for combat troops. VoteVets.org is not endorsing Webb, just opposing Allen.

The women said Webb's article in Washingtonian magazine, "Women Can't Fight," made almost intolerable the already edgy relationship between male midshipmen and females, first admitted to the military service academies in 1976.

Excerpts from the article, in large bold print, hung against a black drape behind a podium theatrically lit for a camera crew of Scott Howell & Co., the Republican media firm producing Allen's campaign ads.

In the article, Webb describes the horror of combat in Vietnam for himself and the Marine infantry company he commanded and explains why he believes it was no place for a woman. He wrote that he'd never met a woman, including those at the academy who would become Navy officers, "whom I would trust to provide those men with combat leadership."

The article also described an academy residence hall that housed 4,000 men and 300 women as "a horny woman's dream."

"There was no way, ... no method to getting away from the intense, almost palpable resentment," Brooks said. "It was unbelievably demoralizing to be painted as a pampered slut who was just taking up classroom space and predestined to endanger the lives of the brave young men around me."

One of the women, 1982 graduate Linda Postenreider, said she had a telephone conversation with Webb on Tuesday night.

"He seemed willing to consider an apology or at least an acknowledgment to the brigade, especially those who served in the classes of '80 through '89, for his article that caused such grief and destruction," said Postenreider, who now lives in California and said she is a registered Democrat.

None of the women said they filed a complaint over the harassment they say Webb enabled.

Webb's Democratic primary opponent, Harris Miller, also made an issue of Webb's attitude toward military women. During the primary campaign, retired Army Gen. Claudia Kennedy accused Webb of discrimination against women in the military and endorsed Miller.

Cardin, Steele Start General Election Drive (BSUN)

By Matthew Hay Brown

The Baltimore Sun, September 14, 2006

With the primary races finally decided Wednesday, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele launched their general election campaigns for Maryland's open seat in the U.S. Senate, a contest that already is drawing national attention -- and money.

Cardin, who defeated friend and former congressional colleague Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic nomination to the seat held by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, came out firing Wednesday, linking Steele with President Bush while invoking what he described as government failures in Iraq and the Gulf Coast.

"There is a big difference between Michael Steele and me as to the agendas that we will bring to Washington," the 10-term congressman told supporters at a Democratic rally Wednesday in Northwest Baltimore.

"We need the United States Senate to stand up and hold President Bush accountable," Cardin said. "We need the U.S. Senate to stop the blockage of stem cells based upon an ideological wall to be available for research. We need the U.S. Senate to hold President Bush accountable for his efforts to privatize and dismantle Social Security. We need the U.S. Senate to hold President Bush accountable for the mess he's made in Iraq."

Steele, speaking later in the day, rejected attempts to link him to the president.

"If Congressman Cardin wants to run against George Bush, then he should have run for president," he told WBAL Radio. "But the reality of it is, no amount of demonizing of the president, no amount of scaring people about the war, is going to change the reality that we have kids in failing public schools. We have entrepreneurs who are weighted down by heavy tax burdens and regulatory burdens, unable to free up capital to hire people and to expand businesses. We've got a health care crisis staring us in the face. We're living an energy crisis at the moment, and it's going to take leadership that's going to be focused on the realities of everyday life."

The tone of the exchange differed markedly from that of the primary races, when Cardin and Mfume had presided over an amicable contest for the Democratic nomination, and Steele faced no serious opposition for the Republican nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0063140

Early Wednesday, state Republicans issued a release titled "Meet Congressman Ben Cardin," in which they sought to portray him as a career politician beholden to the special interests -- the oil, gas, pharmaceutical and health care industries among them -- that they said had contributed more than $4.5 million to his campaigns since he entered Congress in 1986.

"A lifetime spent as a politician and Washington, D.C., insider has made Congressman Cardin totally out-of-touch with Marylanders and a totally unlikely advocate for change," the Maryland Republican Party said in a statement.

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur accused Republicans of attempting to distract voters.

"Once again we're seeing Michael Steele and his allies launch attacks instead of talking about issues important to Maryland families," he said. "Ben Cardin and Michael Steele have sharp differences on the Bush agenda. Michael Steele supports the president's plan to privatize Social Security. Ben Cardin opposes it. Michael Steele supports the war in Iraq. Ben Cardin voted against it. The Republicans are hoping to distract voters from the clear differences between the candidates in this race."

Such language reflects the stakes in the contest, seen as one of the few opportunities nationwide that the Republicans have this year to take a Senate seat from the Democrats. Both parties are expected to target the state with money and visits from national leaders.

"For Republicans, I can't think of a more important race in the country," said Zach Messitte, director of the Center for the Study of Democracy at St. Mary's College of Maryland. "Here's a chance to pick up a seat that's been in Democratic hands for 30 years."

Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the party's nominee for president in 2004, planned to attend a fundraiser for Cardin and other Maryland Democrats Wednesday night in Clarksville. Steele has received fundraising help from Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, White House political adviser Karl Rove and other prominent Republicans.

Steele launched what he called the "Steele Wheels for Change Bus Tour" Wednesday, making stops at the Park Heights Barbershop in Baltimore, Main Street in Parkville and the Anne Arundel County Fair in Crownsville.

Kevin Zeese, who has won the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties for the Senate, opened what he described as a "three-way race" Wednesday with a speech in Washington at the Palestine Center on reforming Middle East policy.

"The security of Americans demands that we get Middle East policy right," Zeese, the director of the anti-war group DemocracyRising.US, said in a statement. "But too many elected officials refuse to discuss the mistakes the U.S. Government is making in the region."

Messitte said Cardin's and Steele's strategies are now apparent.

"Steele's message has been that it's time for a change," he said. "Cardin doesn't have skeletons in his closet and doesn't have a lot of very controversial votes. So they've positioned themselves as, 'Do you want old, or do you want new?'

"Cardin, on the other hand, his strategy is probably pretty clear, which is, 'This guy is a Republican, and he's a conservative Republican. He may tell you that he's a different kind of politician, but here's where he stood on the stem-cell debate, here's where he stood on abortion.' I'm sure they've got quotes on him talking about Iraq before Iraq became uncool."

In an election between a white Democrat and a black Republican, the African-American community has been seen as a crucial constituency for both sides. Cardin and Steele have worked to woo black voters, many of whom traditionally vote Democratic but could be open to supporting Steele.

"One of the things that the Democrats had better start thinking about carefully is appeals to African-American voters because they have four white males nominated for four statewide offices, and one of them defeated a black candidate," said Matthew A. Crenson, a political scientist at the Johns Hopkins University. "They're going to have to work to get the black vote this time."

Cardin Ready To Face Steele (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday claimed the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat from Maryland, pitting himself against the Republican nominee -- Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- in a general election showdown that will hinge on racial issues and draw attention from across the country.

Just after 2 a.m. yesterday at the Wyndham Baltimore Hotel, Mr. Cardin delivered a victory speech aimed, in part, at shoring up support among black Democrats who may defect to Mr. Steele, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland.

Mr. Cardin, who is white, appeared to have defeated Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in large part with help from party leaders such as House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0063141

With 96 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Cardin had 229,835 votes, or 45 percent, and Mr. Mfume had 206,450 votes, or 40 percent. The Mfume campaign said the candidate would not contest the election results.

As Sly & the Family Stone's "Everyday People" blasted over the hotel's sound system, Mr. Cardin, 62, took the stage and invoked the tragedy of Hurricane Katrina, which critics of President Bush say demonstrated the Republican Party's indifference to poor, black communities.

"Katrina was not the disaster caused by nature. It was the disaster of government's failure to help our most vulnerable people," he said. "I am running for the United States Senate to change the priorities in Washington, to take on the moral challenges of our time and to never ever leave Americans behind."

Later in the day, Mr. Steele, 47, began a statewide bus tour in the mostly black and downtrodden West Baltimore neighborhood of Park Heights, which borders a more affluent Jewish community with the same name in Baltimore County.

"I am no stranger to this neighborhood," Mr. Steele said. "When I go to the United States Senate, I will represent both sides of Park Heights. ... You're going with me to Washington. You will have a seat in the halls of Congress. Your voice will be heard."

Mr. Cardin, who is Jewish, has represented the Park Heights area in the U.S. House for 20 years.

Mr. Steele also delivered a message of economic empowerment and the establishment of legacy wealth in poor communities, which has become a central plank in his campaign.

"If you are not about ownership, then you are not about communities like this," he said. Martin Luther "King made it very clear that we had to have a seat at the lunch counter. Our generation will be the generation that will own the diner. That's what it is about for us in neighborhoods like this."

Henry Wilkerson, a black barber in the neighborhood, said he would cross party lines to vote for Mr. Steele.

"I'm a Democrat, but if the right man says the right thing, I'll be a Republican," said Mr. Wilkerson, 55, who is also a pastor at a nearby Baptist church. "I believe he has moral standards, and I believe he has the spiritual standards that will govern is decision-making."

Old allegiances, however, die hard.

"He's a Republican. I don't mess with Republicans," a woman told her husband over the speaker of his cell phone as he stood in the crowd to see Mr. Steele.

Mr. Cardin is actively cultivating support among black voters, who make up as much as 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland.

He has made Baltimore City Council member Kenneth N. Harris Sr., a black Democrat, a central figure in his Senate campaign and has enlisted the support of black clergy in Baltimore and Prince George's County.

The Rev. Marvis May, pastor of the Macedonia Baptist Church in Baltimore and a strong Cardin supporter in the city's black faith community, said black voters would remain loyal to the Democratic Party and Mr. Cardin despite Mr. Steele's racial appeal.

"It's a done deal," he said. "This is a Democratic state, and we are tired of President Bush. We are tired of Republicans."

Still, Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Late last month, Mr. Steele had $3.1 million in his campaign war chest, compared with Mr. Cardin's $1.6 million. Those totals are likely to be eclipsed by the dollars that will pour into Maryland from the national fundraising wings of the Republican and Democratic parties.

Are Black Voters In Maryland Up For Grabs? (RC)

By Josh Kurtz And Emily Yehle

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

BALTIMORE — Right after declaring victory in Tuesday night's Republican Senate primary — in which he bested his nearest opponent by 84 points — Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele headed to the election-night celebration of Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson, a black Democrat. Then, he drove to the celebration of Johnson's challenger, former state Del. Rushern Baker, another black Democrat.

On Wednesday, the first day of the general-election fight he has been eagerly awaiting, Steele kicked off a statewide bus tour. His first stop: a barber shop in a heavily black West Baltimore neighborhood that ex-Rep. Kweisi Mfume (D-Md.) once represented in Congress.

Now that Mfume has lost to white Rep. Benjamin Cardin in Tuesday's Democratic Senate primary, Steele's strategy for victory is hardly subtle. Even before the primary, Steele began airing a statewide ad aimed at black voters — an ad that his campaign spokesman said is scheduled to run indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0063142

"I think Michael Steele has a real ability to win over voters who don't usually vote Republican," said Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, a Baltimore native.

Several Republican operatives had been open about their desire to run against Mfume rather than Cardin this fall. Mfume, while a talented politician with a magnetic personality, has been unable to escape personal or political controversy throughout his career, and Republicans figured that Steele, a former seminarian, would be able to appeal to a slice of moderates as a safe alternative to Mfume, despite Maryland's Democratic tilt.

But with Cardin as their Senate nominee, the Democrats now have the "safe" candidate. Despite his liberal voting record, Cardin is a proven entity — a soft-spoken, scholarly Congressman with 40 years of public service under his belt who had the overwhelming majority of the state's Democratic establishment supporting him.

Cardin starts out as the favorite over Steele. So in a state that is so strongly Democratic, Steele's only path to victory may be doubling — or even tripling — the 10 percent to 12 percent of the black vote that Maryland Republicans generally attract in statewide elections.

At Mfume's primary night party at the Hippodrome Theater in downtown Baltimore, the potential of Steele's gambit was in abundant evidence. Several black supporters of Mfume's said they were going to vote for Steele in the general election.

"A lot of black professionals will vote for Michael Steele because the Democratic Party totally says to blacks, 'Vote for us, but don't sit at the head of the table,'" said Baltimore attorney Gary Stern.

In Maryland, the resentment among some black voters is particularly acute after the Democratic gubernatorial nominee in 2002, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, bypassed several potentially strong black officials when filling her lieutenant governor slot, choosing instead a white Republican.

Also on Tuesday, a black candidate for state attorney general lost to a white candidate in the Democratic primary by 12 points. Other than the appointed candidate for lieutenant governor, all of the Democratic nominees for statewide office in Maryland are white males.

However, some of Mfume's supporters saw the problem as more than just a racial question. Cardin represents the status quo at a time when voters are clamoring for change, said Walt Mallette, a business developer in Washington, D.C.

Party leaders are "backing [Sen. John] Kerry [D-Mass.] and Cardin instead of [Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard] Dean and Mfume," he said, referring to how establishment support lined up during the 2004 presidential primaries.

That lack of spine is driving black voters away from the party, Mallette said.

"Young black people who were raised as Democrats are increasingly voting as Republicans," he said. "They need a new start. Mfume gives them a new start."

But shortly before 2 a.m. Wednesday, Mfume was ready to call it quits. Although Cardin wasn't officially declared the winner until several hours later, Mfume signaled that he knew how the primary would end up and offered Cardin his support.

"Although I wanted to be Ben's Senator, he might just have to be mine, and he'll be a damn good one," he told the crowd.

Whether Mfume supporters follow his lead remains an open question.

"I'd have to do some really deep soul-searching," said Danielle Mitchell, a second-grade teacher.

And that's why Steele keeps working the black vote. "He's going to campaign aggressively and at unprecedented levels for African-American voters," said Doug Heye, Steele's campaign spokesman.

Cardin has a long record of support for civil rights, and most black Democratic officeholders are expected to join his camp quickly. In fact, just days before the primary, Cardin held an endorsement event in populous Prince George's County — Steele's home turf — featuring several black elected officials.

"Ben Cardin is a man of family and faith," said the highest-ranking Democrat there, Ulysses Currie, chairman of the state Senate budget committee. "He spends a lot of time in our community, understands our needs and has a record of getting results."

The event seemed as much about the general election to come as the primary Cardin had not yet won.

Muslim's Win In Minn. Seen As Step For Community (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Minnesota Democrat who is likely to become the first Muslim elected to Congress says he wants to "promote the idea that America needs friends around the world, not more enemies."

Keith Ellison, an African-American state legislator from Minneapolis, won Tuesday's Democratic primary to replace Rep. Martin Olav Sabo. The son of Norwegian immigrants is retiring after 28 years in the House of Representatives. Ellison beat three other Democrats, including Sabo's former chief of staff and ex-party chairman, Mike Erlandson.

DOJ_NMG_0063143

Although Ellison will face Republican business consultant Alan Fine in November, his election is all but guaranteed, says University of Minnesota political scientist Larry Jacobs. In 2004, 71% of the district's voters backed Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry. Minnesota's most ethnically diverse district is home to veiled Somali women, Russian Jewish immigrants and Hmong refugees, belying the state's image as a homogeneous Scandinavian enclave.

Ellison's victory marks a turning point for American Muslims, according to community leaders such as Ali Khan of the American Muslim Council.

"It says, 'Look, you are part of America,' " says Khan, who notes that until recently the diverse community was "not very organized" or interested in electoral politics.

Estimates of the number of U.S. Muslims vary between 2 million and 6 million. The Council on American-Islamic Relations says about a third are black and another third are from South Asia. One in four are of Arab descent and the rest from Africa and elsewhere.

Ellison, 43, was raised Catholic in Detroit and converted to Islam as a 19-year-old student at Wayne State University before moving to Minnesota for law school.

Islam "makes a lot of sense to me. It works for me," Ellison said in a phone interview Wednesday.

A criminal defense lawyer, he called for an immediate troop withdrawal from Iraq, universal health care and the impeachment of President Bush. Such stands and his passionate oratory recall Paul Wellstone, the Minnesota senator killed in a plane crash in 2002, says Jacobs, although he calls Ellison "pragmatic and someone who can work with others. He won't be what people expect."

Ellison says he never brought up his religion or his race — he would be Minnesota's first black member of Congress — during the campaign. Voters did, however, ask about his position, as a Muslim, on Israel, the separation of church and state, abortion rights and gay rights. He says he supports them all.

Ellison had a tougher time explaining revelations about late campaign-finance reports, unpaid parking tickets and a suspended driver's license. More controversial were his ties to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Ellison worked with his group as an organizer of 1995's Million Man March.

Ellison is "a uniquely polarizing figure the likes of which we've never seen in this state," Minnesota GOP spokesman Mark Drake says.

Jacobs says the Democrat ran an effective grass-roots effort of direct mail and door-knocking, but at times, "It had the smell of a campaign about to collapse."

Ellison, a married father of four, responded by visiting synagogues and apologizing for past statements. He said he never met Farrakhan and repudiated his own defense of the Muslim leader, who has been accused of anti-Semitism by the Anti-Defamation League.

"I take responsibility for the mistakes I made," Ellison says.

The Democrat's apology convinced a Minneapolis Jewish newspaper, which endorsed him.

Pollster John Zogby, a Lebanese-American, says Ellison's victory is a win for an eclectic group that ranges from Pakistani immigrants to native-born blacks.

"American Muslims are now a political constituency," he says, "not just simply a growing group."

Former Texas Gov. Ann Richards Dies At 73 (HC)

By R.G. Ratcliffe And Anne Marie Kilday

Houston Chronicle, September 14, 2006

AUSTIN — Ann Richards, who shed the role of homemaker to rise through Texas politics to become the state's 45th governor and a national celebrity, died today after a six-month battle with cancer. She was 73.

Richards was diagnosed with esophageal cancer in March.

Richards was the quintessential Texas woman, with a sassy homespun charm, sharp wit and tough pioneer spirit. With bright silver hair, a weathered face and an affinity for cobalt blue suits and pearls, Richards was instantly recognizable to national television audiences.

As a Democratic politician, Richards' 1990 race for governor against Republican cowboy oilman Clayton Williams became a battle of the sexes. Her victory symbolically broke down gender barriers for a generation of Texas women who were seeking professional careers.

Richards labeled her administration the "New Texas," appointing more Hispanics, blacks and women to state boards and commissions than any previous governor. She pushed for increases in public education funding and promoted business expansion in the state.

A recovering alcoholic, Richards also pressed lawmakers to increase funding for drug and alcohol abuse treatment programs.

Polls showed Richards was the most personally popular governor in 30 years. But a liberal image kept her job approval rating beneath 50 percent, and she lost her 1994 re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush, the future president.

Late in her term as governor, the Houston Chronicle asked Richards how she viewed her gubernatorial legacy.

"How about, 'She changed the economic future of Texas,'" Richards replied. "And that really beats what I feared my tombstone was going to say, and that was: 'She kept a really clean house.'"

Richards was born Dorothy Ann Willis in the front bedroom of a white frame house in what is now Lacy-Lakeview, a Waco suburb. Her father, Cecil Willis, was a pharmaceutical salesman. Her mother, Ona, was a homemaker.

After earning a bachelor's degree at Baylor University in 1954, Richards did additional course work at the University of Texas to earn a teaching certificate. For a year she taught social studies and history at Fulmore Junior High School in Austin.

Richards married her high school sweetheart, David Richards, while still at Baylor. They had four children: Cecile, Clark, Ellen and Dan. As David Richards praticed law in Dallas, Ann Richards was a full-time mother and homemaker and a part-time political volunteer.

"I was mostly involved with my babies. We did everything by Dr. Spock; if you did not have a Dr. Spock book, you could not raise a child," Richards said in her autobiography, Straight from the Heart.

The Richards family moved to Austin in 1969. Three years later, Ann Richards took her first big step toward becoming a politician, agreeing to help run a legislative campaign for Sarah Weddington.

Weddington was the 25-year-old lawyer who had won the Roe v. Wade case in the Supreme Court legalizing abortion. Weddington wanted to win a seat in the Texas House to push for laws giving women equal rights with men, such as giving a woman a right to credit in her own name and not her husband's.

Weddington won, and in her second term she hired Richards as her legislative director.

The political transformation began in 1975, when a group of Austin activists approached David Richards and asked him to run for county commissioner. When he declined, she decided to run for the seat, defeating an incumbent.

But while Richards' political career was blossoming as a Travis County commissioner, her personal life was deteriorating. Her marriage was failing as they grew apart, and she began drinking heavily in Austin's political bars after work every day.

On Sept. 27, 1980, her family and friends cornered her in the living room of a friend's house and told her she was an alcoholic who needed treatment. Richards received treatment at the St. Mary's Chemical Dependency Center in Minnesota.

Afterward, she became a lifetime advocate for people suffering from alcohol and susbstance abuse problems. She helped pass laws requiring insurance companies to pay for treatment and she convinced legislators to fund expanded substance abuse programs for state prison inmates.

While the alcoholism treatment saved Richards, she said in her autobiography, the change of lifestyle that went along with being sober finished her marriage. She and David Richards split in December 1980 and ultimately divorced in 1984.

She plunged into statewide politics in 1982 after discovering that state Treasurer Warren G. Harding was under investigation by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle for possible misuse of office.

Friends convinced Richards to challenge Harding in the Democratic primary, and she ended up in a runoff with him. But Harding was indicted on charges that he used state employees to send out political mail. He pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor and dropped out of the race, effectively giving Richards her first statewide victory.

As state treasurer, Richards was a little-noticed public official. She managed state investments and the sale of bonds and cash management notes. She was best known on the "rubber chicken" circuit, making humorous speechs to civic organizations, women's groups and Democratic clubs.

Her profile changed dramatically in 1988 when Democratic National Chairman Paul Kirk asked her to be the keynote speaker at the party's national convention that summer. Her speech was to draw differences between the parties and take aim at a fellow Texan: Vice President George Bush, the GOP nominee for president.

Richards thrilled her national audience with some of her feminist humor on the ability of women to equal men: "Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did. She just did it backwards and in high heels."

What became memorable, though, was a line she delivered to show Bush was out of touch with the economic and family issues that were important to poor and middle class Americans.

"Poor George, he can't help it — he was born with a silver foot in his mouth," Richards said.

Bush dismissed Richards' statement, accurately predicting he would carry Texas that fall.

"If you just go nasty, go ugly, that isn't an effective way to do business," Bush said.

That speech set the stage for Richards to run for governor in 1990. She defeated former Gov. Mark White in the primary and then Attorney General Jim Mattox in the runoff.

DOJ_NMG_0063145

The runoff became nasty as Mattox accused Richards of illegally using cocaine and seeing treatment for a cocaine addiction. Richards declined to answer any questions about possible past drug use.

The general election race against Williams became a classic Texas political battle. She was the image of the modern Texas woman, while Williams projected the cowboy aura of the state's heritage.

Williams was a cowboy who had become a millionaire oilman and had expanded his empire into telecommunications and banking.

Richards played off his mistakes. Williams once compared bad weather to rape, saying there is nothing to be done about it, so "relax and enjoy it." He also refused to shake Richards' hand after she had criticized some of his business practices.

The state's male vote gave Williams the edge, but women voted overwhelmingly for Richards.

Richards became the first woman to win the Texas governor's office in her own right. Miriam "Ma" Ferguson had won the office in 1924 as a surrogate for her husband, former Gov. James Ferguson.

During her first year in office, Richards signed a $2.7 billion tax bill to balance the state's budget. The state also adopted the lottery under her.

Her most notable achievement was opening the doors of government to people other than Anglos and men. About 44 percent of her appointees were female; 20 percent Hispanic; and 14 percent black. Her two predecessors in office had given more than 77 percent of their appointments to Anglo men.

The biggest problem that faced Richards was overhauling the state's public school finance system under orders from the Texas Supreme Court.

Voters soundly defeated a proposed constitutional amendment she supported to redistribute wealth from rich school districts to poor ones. Opponents labeled it a "Robin Hood" system.

Richards then urged the Legislature to come up with just about any school finance plan that would save Texas — and her — the embarrassment of forced school closures. Lawmakers responded with a plan that gave wealthier districts five options for sharing their property wealth. That plan also became known as "Robin Hood."

During her tenure, Richards' popularity continued to expand to a national audience. She was featured in Vogue, Glamour, Cosmopolitan, Ladies Home Journal and The New York Times Magazine. Superstar photographer Annie Leibovitz took a portrait of her for Vanity Fair. Richards traded one-liners with late-night talk show hosts Jay Leno and David Letterman.

Richards' personal charm probably played best in the area of economic development. She once described herself as a "two-headed cow," a curiosity that corporate leaders allow through the door just so they can see her.

She could brag about getting General Motors to keep its Arlington plant open, as the company was partly motivated by a package of state incentives. She persuaded Southwestern Bell to move its corporate headquarters from St. Louis to San Antonio. She convinced computer giant Apple to consolidate its customer service operations in Williamson County.

Richards went into her 1994 re-election campaign against the younger Bush with the highest personal popularity ratings of any governor in 30 years, but her job approval ratings rarely topped 45 percent in public opinion polls.

"The polls show the people of Texas want to see Ann Richards on Leno, not in the Governor's Mansion," one of her campaign insiders lamented at the time.

Richards' frustration erupted at one point when she questioned Bush's experience to serve as Texas governor and his criticism of her record. She called him "some jerk who's running for public office."

Bush studiously avoided engaging Richards in a personality contest. Focused on issues and aided by a national tide toward Republicans, Bush defeated Richards.

After leaving office, Richards became a client recruiter and lobbyist from the firms of Verner, Liipfert, Bernhard, McPherson and Hand of Washington, D.C., and then later Public Strategies of Austin. She also was a frequent guest on CNN talk shows, particularly Larry King Live.

In her farewell news conference as governor, Richards said she was ready to move to the next phase of her life. The homemaker-turned-politician wanted to earn the money that would make her secure in retirement.

"Life is like a layer cake," Richards said. "You put one layer on top of the other, and whether you frost it or not is up to you. I'm looking forward now to a little frosting."

In addition to politics, Richards loved her family, Lady Longhorns basketball, and attending the movies. Every week, she would brief reporters on the latest movie she had seen.

Evan Smith, the editor of Texas Monthly magazine, had become close friends with Richards through her love of the movies. Smith is the co-founder of the Texas Film Hall of Fame, and Richards emceed four of the five ceremonies sponsored by that group.

``As a personality, if you think about the nature of politics today, they don't make them like Ann Richards," Smith said. ``Ann Richards was one of the truly funniest people God ever put on this earth."

DOJ_NMG_0063146

``Ann was obligated, chemically and biologically, to say what was on her mind, even if the truth was uncomfortable. Ann's honesty and candor is one of the great things about her that will be missed," Smith said.

``God bless her, there were times when Ann Richards was a divider, not a uniter," Smith said. ``And God bless her for that."

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) -- Former Gov. Ann Richards, the witty and flamboyant Democrat who went from homemaker to national political celebrity, died Wednesday night after a battle with cancer, a family spokeswoman said. She was 73.

She died at home surrounded by her family, the spokeswoman said. Richards was found to have esophageal cancer in March and underwent chemotherapy treatments.

The silver-haired, silver-tongued Richards said she entered politics to help others -- especially women and minorities who were often ignored by Texas' male-dominated establishment.

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone,'" Richards said shortly before leaving office in January 1995.

She was governor for one term, losing her re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush.

Her four adult children spent Wednesday with her, said family spokeswoman Cathy Bonner, a longtime family friend.

"They're a strong group of people but they're broken-hearted, of course," Bonner said.

Her family said as governor she was most proud of two actions that probably cost her re-election. She vetoed legislation that would allow people to carry concealed handguns, automatic weapons and "cop-killer bullets." She also vetoed a bill that would have allowed the destruction of the environment over the Edwards Aquifer.

She grabbed the national spotlight with her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic National Convention when she was the Texas state treasurer. Richards won cheers from delegates when she reminded them that Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did, "only backwards and in high heels."

Richards sealed her partisan reputation with a blast at George H. Bush, a fellow Texan who was vice president at the time: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

Four years later, she was chairwoman of the Democratic convention that nominated Bill Clinton for president.

Richards rose to the governorship with a come-from-behind victory over millionaire cowboy Clayton Williams in 1990. She cracked a half-century male grip on the governor's mansion and celebrated by holding up a T-shirt that showed the state Capitol and read: "A woman's place is in the dome."

In four years as governor, Richards championed what she called the "New Texas," appointing more women and more minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors.

She appointed the first black University of Texas regent; the first crime victim to join the state Criminal Justice Board; the first disabled person to serve on the human services board; and the first teacher to lead the State Board of Education. Under Richards, the fabled Texas Rangers pinned stars on their first black and female officers.

She polished Texas' image, courted movie producers, championed the North American Free Trade Agreement, oversaw an expansion of the state prison system, and presided over rising student achievement scores and plunging dropout rates.

She took time out to celebrate her 60th birthday by earning her motorcycle driver's license.

Throughout her years in office, her personal popularity remained high. One poll put it at more than 60 percent the year she lost to Bush.

"I may have lost the race," Richards said after the defeat. "But I don't think I lost the good feelings that people have about me in this state. That's tremendously reassuring to me."

Richards went on to give speeches, work as a commentator for CNN and serve as a senior adviser in the New York office of Public Strategies Inc., an Austin-based consulting firm.

In her last 10 years, Richards worked for many social causes and helped develop the Ann Richards School for Young Women Leaders, scheduled to open in Austin in 2007.

Born in Lakeview, Texas, in 1933, Richards grew up near Waco, married civil rights lawyer David Richards and spent her early adulthood volunteering in campaigns and raising four children. She often said the hardest job she ever had was as a public school teacher at Fulmore Junior High School in Austin.

Richards served on the Travis County Commissioners Court in Austin for six years before jumping to a bigger arena in 1982. Her election as state treasurer made her the first woman elected statewide in nearly 50 years.

But politics took a toll. It helped break up her marriage. And public life forced her to be remarkably candid about her 1980 treatment for alcoholism.

"I had seen the very bottom of life," she once recalled. "I was so afraid I wouldn't be funny anymore. I just knew that I would lose my zaniness and my sense of humor. But I didn't. Recovery turned out to be a wonderful thing."

The 1990 election was rough. Her Democratic primary opponent, then-Attorney General Jim Mattox, accused her of using illegal drugs. Williams, an oilman, banker and rancher, spent millions of his own money on the race she narrowly won.

After her unsuccessful re-election campaign against Bush, Richards said she never missed being in public office.

Asked once what she might have done differently had she known she was going to be a one-term governor, Richards grinned.

"Oh, I would probably have raised more hell."

Survivors include her children, Cecile Richards, Daniel Richards, Clark Richards and Ellen Richards; their spouses; and eight grandchildren.

She went on to give speeches, work as a commentator for CNN and work at a consulting firm.

Ms. Richards grew up near Waco, Tex., married civil rights lawyer David Richards, volunteered in campaigns and raised four children. She and her husband later divorced.

In the early 1960s, she helped form North Dallas Democratic Women, "basically to allow us to have something substantive to do; the regular Democratic Party and its organization was run by men who looked on women as little more than machine parts."

DOJ_NMG_0063148

Ms. Richards served on the Travis County Commissioners Court in Austin for six years before jumping to a bigger arena in 1982. Her election as state treasurer made her the first woman elected statewide in nearly 50 years.

But politics took a toll. It helped break up her marriage. And public life forced her to be remarkably candid about her 1980 treatment for alcoholism.

"I had seen the very bottom of life," she once recalled. "I was so afraid I wouldn't be funny anymore. I just knew that I would lose my zaniness and my sense of humor. But I didn't. Recovery turned out to be a wonderful thing."

The 1990 election was rough. Her Democratic primary opponent, then-Attorney General Jim Mattox, accused her of using illegal drugs. Williams, an oilman, banker and rancher, spent millions of his money on the race Ms. Richards narrowly won.

After her unsuccessful reelection campaign against Bush, Ms. Richards said she never missed being in public office.

Asked once what she might have done differently had she known she was going to be a one-term governor, Ms. Richards grinned.

"Oh, I would probably have raised more hell."

Texas Ex-Gov. Richards Dies At 73 (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) -- Former Gov. Ann Richards, the flamboyant Democrat who went from homemaker to national political celebrity, died last night after a battle with cancer, a family spokeswoman said. She was 73.

She died at home surrounded by her family, the spokeswoman said. Mrs. Richards was found to have esophageal cancer in March and underwent chemotherapy treatments.

She said she entered politics to help others -- especially women and minorities who she said were often ignored by Texas' male-dominated establishment.

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone,'" Mrs. Richards said shortly before leaving office in January 1995.

She was governor for one term, losing her re-election bid to Republican George W. Bush.

She grabbed the national spotlight with her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic National Convention when she was the Texas state treasurer. Mrs. Richards won cheers from delegates when she reminded them that Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did, "only backwards and in high heels."

Mrs. Richards sealed her partisan reputation with a blast at the elder George Bush, a fellow Texan who was vice president at the time: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

Four years later, she was chairwoman of the Democratic convention that nominated Bill Clinton for president.

Mrs. Richards rose to the governorship with a come-from-behind victory over millionaire cowboy Clayton Williams in 1990. She cracked a half-century male grip on the governor's mansion and celebrated by holding up a T-shirt that showed the state Capitol and read: "A woman's place is in the dome."

In four years as governor, Mrs. Richards championed what she called the "New Texas," appointing more women and more minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors.

Ann Richards, Former Governor Of Texas, Dies (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy And Stuart Silverstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

Former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, a Democrat known for her freewheeling oratory who famously branded the first President George Bush as being "born with a silver foot in his mouth," died Wednesday night after a battle with cancer. She was 73.

A family representative said Richards died at home in Austin, Texas, surrounded by her family. She had been undergoing chemotherapy treatment after being diagnosed in March with cancer of the esophagus.

The silver-haired, charismatic Richards became a well-known national political figure with her keynote address at the 1988 Democratic National Convention. Richards, at the time Texas' state treasurer, took aim at the elder Bush, vice president at the time and the presumptive Republican candidate for president.

In the address that July night at the Omni in Atlanta, she zinged Bush, declaring: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

Bush went on to win the election that November. But Richards also advanced politically, winning a come-from-behind battle for governor two years later over Republican millionaire rancher Clayton Williams and serving two years after that as chairwoman of the Democratic convention that nominated Bill Clinton for the presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0063149

Still, her political comeuppance came two years later when she ran for a second term and was defeated by George W. Bush, putting him on the political trajectory that took him to the White House.

Richards, instantly recognizable with her white hairdo, was still a political question mark to most of her listeners when she delivered her 1988 keynote address. But she went on to become one of the most prominent women politicians in the United States.

"I wanted Ann to be more than she was, but for her generation she was something special," said Garry Mauro, a longtime friend of Richards who ran and lost against Bush in the 1998 Texas gubernatorial campaign. "When a young girl heard Ann Richards speak, she became a believer in her own ability to succeed in America. She was the icon for women with any doubts about their own self-image."

Her victory in the 1990 governor's contest against Williams was one of the most brutal, dirty campaigns in Texas history.

Despite winning, she was bruised politically and was reluctant after that to pursue national office.

During her term as governor, Richards developed a reputation for fighting for expanded rights for women and minorities. She also worked to streamline government and reform the education system, while establishing the Texas state lottery as a means to fund the public schools.

She also sought to change the Texas prison system by creating inmate substance abuse programs and by releasing fewer violent criminals.

Richards always emphasized her country roots, often expressing criticism with the phrase "that dog won't hunt."

Richards grew up in Lakeview, a small town outside Waco in central Texas, the daughter of a pharmaceuticals salesman. In those days, she went by Dorothy Ann Willis and in her autobiography, "Straight From the Heart," she said her parents put more stock in personality than scholarship.

"I learned early on that people liked you if you told stories, if you made them laugh," she wrote.

Richards' family moved to Waco for her high school education and she had only to go across town to enroll in Baylor University, the nation's largest Southern Baptist institution, where she won a debating scholarship.

At 19, Richards married David Richards, whom she had dated since high school. For the next two decades, she was a wife and mother of four who taught high school to put her husband through law school.

In 1975, while the family was living in Austin, a group asked David Richards to run for county commissioner. Her husband wasn't interested, but Ann Richards was.

She won the election with ease in 1976 and remained in public office until she was defeated by Bush.

Richards' marriage of almost 30 years ended in divorce in 1984, prompted in part by her longtime struggle with alcoholism. She underwent a monthlong treatment at St. Mary's Hospital in Minneapolis and had remained sober afterward.

In 1982, Richards was drafted to run for state treasurer and won handily, becoming the first woman to hold a statewide office in Texas in 50 years. Her reelection four years later was even more resounding, which set the stage for the 1988 speech in Atlanta and her gubernatorial victory in 1990.

Survivors include her children, Cecile Richards, Daniel Richards, Clark Richards and Ellen Richards; their spouses; and eight grandchildren.

Overhauls Proposed In Benefits For Jobless (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

The nation's unemployment insurance system, which has hardly changed since its inception in 1935, should be revamped to aid more workers displaced by a transforming economy, economists said this week as they released overhaul proposals.

Currently, because of tight state eligibility requirements and because a growing number of workers do not have long-term, full-time jobs, unemployment insurance is paid to just over a third of those who are laid off, government data show, and coverage is less likely among the lower-income workers who most need it.

"The nation's unemployment insurance program is seriously out of date, given the changes over the last 70 years in the U.S. labor market," said Lori G. Kletzer, an economist at the University of California, Santa Cruz. Dr. Kletzer and Howard Rosen of the Institute for International Economics in Washington are the authors of one of two proposals for revamping the system that were released on Tuesday by the Brookings Institution in Washington.

The system was intended to provide workers with half their former wages during temporary periods between jobs, though it seldom reaches that level today. In 2004, some 8.8 million workers who qualified received an average weekly benefit of $262, often for up to 26 weeks, though benefits varied by state. The costs, which totaled $41 billion that year, are paid by federal and state payroll taxes paid mainly by employers.

Benefits are seldom available to the self-employed, to those working intermittently or to many of the lowest-paid workers.

DOJ_NMG_0063150

At the same time, Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen said, the nature of unemployment is changing. In the last six years, despite lower overall rates of unemployment, the average period of joblessness for laid-off workers was 16 weeks, compared with 12 weeks in the 1970's.

Because of globalization and changes in the economic structure, more workers are forced to change industries and a significant minority take jobs paying less than before, indicating a trend "from temporary layoff to permanent displacement," according to the paper by Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen.

They propose stronger federal guidelines to end the wide disparities in eligibility and benefit rules among the states and to extend coverage to a broader group of workers.

They call for a new system of personal accounts for self-employed workers, allowing them to contribute pretax money, with matching grants from the federal government up to $200 a year, to help cushion income drops or pay for job training and searches.

They also propose a wage insurance program to help offset declines in income for a period of years when workers switch to jobs paying less than they had been making. This would apply only to workers making $15 an hour or less.

To help pay some $13 billion in added costs for these programs, Dr. Kletzer and Dr. Rosen suggest raising the federal unemployment tax, which for 22 years has been levied on only the first $7,000 of each worker's income. After tax credits are counted, employers now pay a maximum of $56 a year for each covered worker, the scholars said.

In the second paper, Jeffrey R. Kling, an economist at the Brookings Institution, proposed a more radical overhaul. Dr. Kling would scrap the existing unemployment insurance system and replace it with personal accounts and loans to help people through short-term joblessness and a large program of wage-loss insurance to help low- and moderate-income workers when they are forced to take new jobs at lower salaries.

By curbing government payments to those who experience only short-term joblessness, he said, this new plan could operate with the same total money as the current system but would provide more help to the neediest.

States Give Tax Breaks To College Savers (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 14, 2006

Giving another boost to 529 college-savings plans, a growing number of states are allowing their residents to take state-tax deductions for contributions they make to other states' 529 plans.

Pennsylvania, Maine and Kansas have approved such tax breaks, and a handful of other states are considering similar measures. Previously, these states offered either no tax deduction or a deduction only if a resident contributed to the state's own 529 plan.

The states' move toward tax parity for all 529 contributions is likely to make it simpler and more appealing for residents to save for their children's college educations. A new law that makes permanent the 529s' federal tax benefits has also helped spark more interest in these plans.

The 529 plans — named for a section of the federal tax code — have gained popularity by allowing parents and grandparents to put away money for college and pay no federal tax on withdrawals if the money goes for tuition and books. In many cases, the money can be used for any college or university, not just a school in the state that sponsors the 529.

More than half of states provide deductions — generally ranging from $2,000 to $12,000 — on state income-tax returns for 529 contributions.

Over the past four years, 529 assets have more than quadrupled, to about $93 billion as of June 2006, compared with about $22 billion at the same time in 2002, according to the College Savings Plans Network, an organization of states that sponsor 529s.

In Kansas, Treasurer Lynn Jenkins says the move to expand the state-tax deduction for Kansans starting in 2007 to all 529 contributions, rather than just those to the in-state plan, means the "playing field is entirely level" for investors.

The change "may make our plan even better," Jenkins says. "It forces me to make sure that happens."

College-financing experts recommend that investors compare investment options and expenses — in addition to state tax benefits — before socking away money in any one 529 plan.

The trend isn't likely to catch on in every state. After all, states will see less tax revenue if they extend deductions to contributions to out-of-state 529 plans. Pennsylvania estimates a loss of $25 million a year in tax revenue from the state's 529 tax change, which took effect this year.

"There's no question that in any instance, a tax break is going to reduce revenue," says Pennsylvania Treasurer Robert Casey. Still, "I think that when you're providing an incentive to save for college now, it's an exchange many people think is a good strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0063151

There may also be a downside for some investors. Should many residents of a state decide to bypass its 529 plan in favor of out-of-state plans, that state plan's investment management fees could rise to compensate for fewer assets in the plan, says Joseph Hurley, founder of Savingforcollege.com, a website that compares states' 529 plans.

Same Mission, New Look For Islamic Group (WP)

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

With too many Americans viewing their Muslim fellow citizens with suspicion because of the 9/11 attacks and other terrorist acts, the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a civil rights and advocacy group, decided to launch "a new brand identity and logo."

In a letter to the American Muslim community, CAIR board Chairman Parvez Ahmed said the group after 12 years of service is "reaffirming our core values and recommitting ourselves to three central aspects of CAIR's mission -- enhancing understanding of Islam, protecting civil liberties and empowering American Muslims." Those values include promoting pluralism for a better America, justice and dialogue.

The new logo, Ahmed wrote, "affirms that we are one human family, created by God into different nations and tribes so that we may come to know each other and not despise each other."

Ahmed said in an interview that the timing of the new branding effort was "not particularly interesting." But he said that "a handful of extremists are distorting the image of Islam."

"We needed to think of new ways of becoming more effective, a much better way of communicating how [we are] part of the American mainstream," Ahmed said. "It is important that they [other Americans] have a clear understanding of us."Coalition to Market America

Also in the Getting-to-Know-You-Better category: A coalition of high-powered business executives has formed the Discover America Partnership, a multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign designed to boost the number of visitors -- by 10 million a year -- to the United States.

Their aim is to help improve America's image abroad and bolster national security by introducing more people from other countries to us. "In the effort to win hearts and minds, we have a unique card to play," Jay Rasulo , chairman of Walt Disney Parks and Resorts, said in a statement. "That card is an invitation . . . to visit America, meet our people and experience our values."

Geoff Freeman , executive director of Discover America, said the campaign intends to educate lawmakers and other policymakers about the need to attract foreign visitors, and it will work to smooth out visa and airport policies that may discourage travel. But he said the group "by no means" wants to lessen security standards. "It makes good business sense. It makes good policy sense. There's no shame in it," Freeman said.

Among the coalition's leaders: Rasulo; Steven C. Anderson of the National Restaurant Association; August A. Busch III of Anheuser-Busch Companies Inc.; Roger Dow of the Travel Industry Association of America; Michael D. Gehrisch of Destination Marketing Association International; J.W. Marriott of Marriott International Inc.; Joseph A. McInerney of the American Hotel & Lodging Association; Bud Nocera of Visit Florida; Howard C. Nusbaum of American Resort Development Association; Stevan D. Porter of the InterContinental Hotel Group; Andrew C. Taylor of Enterprise Rent-a-Car; and Jonathan M. Tisch of Loews Hotels Inc.

Also working on the campaign: Fleishman-Hillard , a PR company; Charles L. Merin of BKSH & Associates , who specializes in travel and tourism clients; and C. Stewart Verdery Jr. of Monument Policy Group LLC , who represents the Travel Industry Association and served as assistant secretary of homeland security.And Meridian Hill Makes Three

The Tiber Creek lobby shops have added a third: a new company named Meridian Hill Strategies Inc. , formed by Alix Burns , former vice president of TechNet. Burns was finance director for major states for Vice President Al Gore's presidential bid in 2000.

Tiber Creek was started in 2003 as a partnership of Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart Inc. and Ickes & Enright Group.

Jeffrey Peck said Burns was instrumental in developing ties between high-tech firms and House Democrats. Johnson Madigan, a bipartisan shop, has strong ties to the Senate; Harold Ickes and Janice Enright were Clinton White House aides.

"As we look to the November elections, she'll be essential," Peck said, referring to an expected increased presence of Democrats in the House, if not a Democratic takeover.Here and There

Moving about town . . . Christopher Staszak , a former assistant counsel to New York Gov. George E. Pataki (R), has joined the D.C. office of Bracewell & Giuliani .

Mary-Lacey Reuther , special assistant to Mark McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, has joined the GOP lobby shop of Barbour Griffith & Rogers as a vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0063152

Former diplomat Terry Snell has joined King & Spalding as a senior international government relations adviser. Most recently, he was political adviser to the U.S. European Command, and earlier he was deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in Berlin. Also at the law firm: former senator Daniel R. Coats (R-Ind.), who was ambassador to Germany.

Democrats Vs. Wal-Mart (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

EVERGREEN PARK, Ill. -- This suburb, contiguous with Chicago's western edge, is 88 percent white. A large majority of the customers of the Wal-Mart that sits here, less than a block outside Chicago, are from the city, and more than 90 percent of the store's customers are African American.

One of whom, a woman pushing a shopping cart with a stoical 3-year-old along for the ride, has a chip on her shoulder about the size of this 141,000-square-foot Wal-Mart. She applied for a job when the store opened in January and was turned down because, she said, the person doing the hiring "had an attitude." So why is the woman shopping here anyway? She looks at the questioner as though he is dimwitted and directs his attention to the low prices of the DVDs on the rack next to her.

Sensibly, she compartmentalizes her moods and her money. Besides, she should not brood. She had lots of company in not being hired: More than 25,000 people applied for the 325 openings.

Which vexes liberals such as John Kerry. (He and his helpmeet last shopped at Wal-Mart when?) In 2004 he tested what has become one of the Democrats' 2006 themes: Wal-Mart is, he said, "disgraceful" and symbolic of "what's wrong with America." By now Democrats have succeeded, to their embarrassment (if they are susceptible to that), in making the basic numbers familiar:

The median household income of Wal-Mart shoppers is under $40,000. Wal-Mart, the most prodigious job-creator in the history of the private sector in this galaxy, has almost as many employees (1.3 million) as the U.S. military has uniformed personnel. A McKinsey company study concluded that Wal-Mart accounted for 13 percent of the nation's productivity gains in the second half of the 1990s, which probably made Wal-Mart about as important as the Federal Reserve in holding down inflation. By lowering consumer prices, Wal-Mart costs about 50 retail jobs among competitors for every 100 jobs Wal-Mart creates . Wal-Mart and its effects save shoppers more than $200 billion a year, dwarfing such government programs as food stamps ($28.6 billion) and the earned-income tax credit ($34.6 billion).

People who buy their groceries from Wal-Mart -- it has one-fifth of the nation's grocery business -- save at least 17 percent. But because unions are strong in many grocery stores trying to compete with Wal-Mart, unions are yanking on the Democratic Party's leash, demanding laws to force Wal-Mart to pay wages and benefits higher than those that already are high enough to attract 77 times as many applicants than there were jobs at this store.

The big-hearted progressives on Chicago's City Council, evidently unconcerned that the city gets zero sales tax revenue from a half-billion dollars that Chicago residents spend in the 42 suburban Wal-Marts, have passed a bill that, by dictating wages and benefits, would keep Wal-Marts from locating in the city. Richard Daley, a bread-and-butter Democrat, used his first veto in 17 years as mayor to swat it away.

Liberals think their campaign against Wal-Mart is a way of introducing the subject of class into America's political argument, and they are more correct than they understand. Their campaign is liberalism as condescension. It is a philosophic repugnance toward markets, because consumer sovereignty results in the masses making messes. Liberals, aghast, see the choices Americans make with their dollars and their ballots and announce -- yes, announce -- that Americans are sorely in need of more supervision by . . . liberals.

Before they went on their bender of indignation about Wal-Mart (customers per week: 127 million), liberals had drummed McDonald's (customers per week: 175 million) out of civilized society because it is making us fat, or something. So, what next? Which preferences of ordinary Americans will liberals, in their role as national scolds, next disapprove? Baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet?

No. The current issue of the American Prospect, an impeccably progressive magazine, carries a full-page advertisement denouncing something responsible for "lies, deception, immorality, corruption, and widespread labor, human rights and environmental abuses" and for having brought "great hardship and despair to people and communities throughout the world."

What is this focus of evil in the modern world? North Korea? The Bush administration? Fox News Channel? No, it is Coca-Cola (number of servings to Americans of the company's products each week: 2.5 billion).

When liberals' presidential nominees consistently fail to carry Kansas, liberals do not rush to read a book titled "What's the Matter With Liberals' Nominees?" No, the book they turned into a bestseller is titled "What's the Matter With Kansas?" Notice a pattern here?

Extreme Tuberculosis (NYT)

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

Tuberculosis is outrunning us. In the last few months, 53 patients in the South African province of KwaZulu-Natal were found to have a form of the disease resistant to enough existing drugs that it is virtually incurable. All but one of those patients have died. Airborne and deadly, extensively drug-resistant TB is a nightmare disease. It has been found worldwide, including in the United States.

The accelerated pace of resistance comes from the world's neglect of tuberculosis, which is best cured with a cocktail of four drugs, with medicines taken daily for six to nine months. But most patients who start this difficult regime fail to complete it, leading to resistance. Of the 9.5 million new TB cases globally every year, about 425,000 of them are resistant to the standard medicines.

While a course of these drugs costs as little as $11, the medicines needed to cure resistant TB can cost up to a thousand times as much, can have harmful side effects, and must be taken for as much as two years. The really bad news, however, is that even these backup drugs are starting to fail, as they have in KwaZulu-Natal. Globally, about 6 percent of resistant TB cases are also resistant to second-line drugs — 15 percent in the former Soviet Union.

The development of antibiotics had allowed wealthy nations to dismiss TB as a disease of the past. But H.I.V. and AIDS have changed that calculus. In Africa, active TB cases are rising by 4 percent a year, largely because H.I.V. activates latent TB infection. TB is the leading cause of AIDS-related deaths. Every patient tested in the KwaZulu-Natal study was H.I.V.-positive — and more than a quarter of those who died were taking antiretroviral therapy.

African health officials gathered in South Africa last week to discuss extreme tuberculosis, but they are hobbled by the world's indifference. It is crucial, for example, to find out quickly where else extremely resistant TB lurks. But surveillance in Africa is poor, there have been no new diagnostic tests invented in the past 50 years, and the tests in use can take months. Efforts to make sure patients complete their treatment reach less than a third of TB victims. New drugs are needed to replace current ones, which are all at least 40 years old. But TB drug research had dried up until a few years ago.

A group called the Global Alliance for TB Drug Development has six compounds in the pipeline, but a treatment for extremely resistant TB is not likely before 2012. Money for clinical trials would speed things. But donors have always slighted tuberculosis. According to a new report by Results International, an advocacy group, the World Bank spent only $3.5 million directly on TB in Africa in 2005. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation are big donors, but much more is needed. Stinginess created this problem. Generosity is needed to fix it.

Bush, Roh To Meet Amid Tension Over North Korea (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and President Bush will try to downplay the strains between their countries over how to deal with the North Korean nuclear standoff when they meet Thursday at the White House.

The White House is pushing a hard line in trying to get the strident North Korean government to return to six-party talks designed to halt its nuclear program. South Korea, which has sought to engage North Korea since 1998, is seeking a softer diplomatic approach toward its reclusive communist neighbor.

The United Nations Security Council has approved a resolution condemning North Korea for conducting ballistic missile tests in July that bans any deals with the Pyongyang government that might help its arms trade. The Bush administration wants that policy applied firmly, while South Korea is wary of being too confrontational.

To complicate Thursday's meeting further, it comes amid reports that North Korea is preparing for an underground nuclear test, which some U.S. intelligence officials think may come before the end of the year.

"The expectations of a significant breakthrough between the U.S. and ROK (Republic of Korea) are not there," said Michael Green, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right research center. He was Bush's senior adviser on Asia until last December. "In general, the South Koreans would like the U.S. to be more accommodating to the North."

North Korea walked away last November from talks with the United States, Japan, China, Russia and the European Union, partially citing American restrictions imposed on a Macau-based bank accused of laundering money, counterfeiting and other illicit activities for Pyongyang.

Worried that the restrictions could prompt North Korean President Kim Jong Il to take desperate measures, South Korean officials would like the Bush administration to talk to the North Koreans about the counterfeiting issue as a prelude to resuming the six-party talks, according to Donald G. Gross, a State Department adviser during the Clinton administration.

Not wanting to be seen as rewarding bad behavior, White House officials said Wednesday that they had no intention of lifting the restrictions.

"Look, the United States has worked with its allies and made clear to the North Koreans that they have obligations," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We have said, `You need to get back to the table.' There are incentives awaiting the government if it behaves well. That remains the proper approach, and it also remains a proper approach to say to those in the neighborhood, `You're closest; you have the most influence. You need to step up as well.'"

That was a veiled reference to China primarily.

Bush and Roh are also likely to touch on a proposal, controversial in South Korea, whereby Seoul would take over wartime command of its troops from the United States. It surrendered command of its troops to U.S.-led U.N. forces during the Korean War. It regained peacetime control of its troops in 1994.

Roh has pushed for the move, saying the time has come for South Korea to defend itself. But his nation's political conservatives, veterans and Christian activists oppose the proposal, saying it would erode American-South Korean relations and weaken the country's defense capabilities as tensions with North Korea escalate.

Roh calls for transferring military authority by 2012. U.S. officials said the handoff could be done by 2009, a counterproposal that some analysts construed as another sign of strain between Washington and Seoul.

Gross and other Asia analysts predict that Bush and Roh will attempt to gloss over their differences. For example, American and South Korean officials agreed not to issue a joint statement after Thursday's meeting. Such statements are common practice after two leaders meet to discuss a wide range of issues.

White House officials said a joint statement would be redundant because Bush and Roh issued one that covered the North Korea nuclear issue after they met in South Korea last November during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperative forum.

"A lack of a joint statement shows they want to work around hard issues and focus on areas of agreement," Gross said. "If they had a joint statement, they'd have to talk about North Korea."

U.S. To Roll Out Tepid Welcome For President Of South Korea (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — As President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea prepares to visit President Bush on Thursday morning, the two men have rarely been further apart on the central issue that long ago turned their relationship so frosty.

Mr. Bush is determined to squeeze North Korea with every financial sanction possible until it gives up its nuclear capacity and other illicit activities, or, some believe, until it collapses. Mr. Roh insists the only course is to coax the country out of its isolation.

In the weeks leading to the visit here, Mr. Bush's aides have been using a new United Nations Security Council resolution, passed after North Korea's missile tests in July, to prepare a list of banks it can press to cut ties with North Korea.

Mr. Roh has been playing down the missile launching as a meaningless, attention-grabbing temper tantrum by the North Koreans, and he has resumed South Korean aid and investment to the country, in hopes of preventing what his country fears would turn into collapse or confrontation.

In past meetings, Mr. Bush has done his best to paper over the differences. But his aides acknowledge that the gap has grown so much in recent months — "as wide as the Sea of Japan" one senior official said Wednesday — that it will be almost impossible to hide.

Mr. Roh will receive treatment that contrasts sharply with the warm embrace extended in June to Japan's prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. Mr. Koizumi got long meetings, a glittering dinner and a trip to Graceland; Mr. Roh, leader of the other major United States ally in Asia, is getting an hour in the Oval Office and a quick lunch.

It is a symbol of the enormous strains in the alliance, strains so great that Mitchell B. Reiss, the director of policy planning at the State Department during part of Mr. Bush's first term, wrote in an op-ed column in The Los Angeles Times on Wednesday that the two leaders "should agree to disagree on North Korea and move onward."

Asked how they could avoid the security issue that has been the cement of their alliance since 1950, Mr. Reiss, now a vice provost at the College of William and Mary, said in an interview, "They don't have a choice, because you can't let it erode the foundations of the alliance."

Mr. Bush has a polite but distant relationship with Mr. Roh, whom current and former White House aides say Mr. Bush believes is wedded to a doomed policy of appeasement toward a country that runs prison camps and regularly threatens its neighbors by expanding both its nuclear capacity and the range of its missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0063155

The missile defense system that the administration has deployed in rudimentary form in Alaska and aboard ships is geared toward deterring a North Korean attack, though White House officials say their bigger fear is that the country, perpetually broke, might sell a weapon to a terrorist group.

Mr. Roh, however, appears to view Mr. Bush's approach as a dangerous failure, more likely to prompt North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, to lash out than disarm. Ahead of this trip, South Korean officials said in interviews that they believed Mr. Bush's policies prompted Mr. Kim to produce the fuel for six or eight new nuclear weapons; American officials say North Korea would have done so anyway.

Speaking on Wednesday at the United States Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Roh said he was "quite aware" of concerns about the state of American-South Korean relations.

Mr. Roh authorized 3,000 troops for Iraq. But he was widely criticized for the decision at home, where polls show that the country is almost as distrustful of Washington as it is worried about the North Koreans.

What further complicates Thursday's meetings, however, is growing speculation that North Korea may be preparing for another test: this time, an underground nuclear test, which it has never before conducted.

"For the North Koreans, it would be the next logical step in managed escalation," said Richard L. Armitage, the former deputy secretary of state. "The irony of the situation is that the farther away you are from the peril, the more concerned you are about it."

Roh Says U.S.-S.Korea Alliance Changing (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 13, 2006

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said Wednesday that while his country's five-decade alliance with the United States is changing, Seoul will continue to support the U.S.-led fight against terrorism.

The South Korea-U.S. "alliance will in part change according to the times," Roh said through an interpreter. "But the very fundamental basis of this alliance will not change."

Roh noted he will meet with President Bush Thursday to discuss the state of the alliance and ways to settle a tense nuclear standoff with North Korea.

Both Roh and Bush want the North to return to stalled negotiations aimed at persuading Pyongyang to scrap its self-proclaimed nuclear bomb production program. But bickering has flared occasionally on just how to achieve that.

Roh told business leaders at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that he was "quite aware that in Korea and the United States, we have many people who are quite concerned about the state" of the U.S.-South Korea relationship.

But "in all areas where the United States has been fighting to establish order and freedom, Korea has always been at the United States' side," he said.

South Korea deployed nearly 3,600 troops in Iraq in 2004, making it the second-largest U.S. coalition partner after Britain. It plans to withdraw about 1,000 of its 3,200-member contingent by the end of the year.

Roh met Wednesday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, with both leaders underlining that U.S.-South Korean cooperation was needed to resume stalled nuclear disarmament talks, according to South Korean officials. Roh was scheduled later Wednesday to visit the Korean War Memorial and to meet with U.S. lawmakers.

How the two allies handle the North Korean nuclear crisis matters because some believe mixed messages from Washington and Seoul have allowed the reclusive North to boost its nuclear arsenal while falling into deeper isolation.

Efforts to restart the disarmament talks have gained greater urgency in recent weeks as leaders worry about a potential North Korean nuclear weapons test, and after the North decided in July to test launch seven missiles. But so far, no resumption of the negotiations by the Koreas, the United States, Russia, Japan and China is in sight.

"The most important thing is that they can get along, and project that to the world," Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow of foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution, said in looking ahead to Roh's meeting with Bush.

"They just totally see the world differently," O'Hanlon said, calling the Roh-Bush relationship perhaps "the single rockiest" of Bush's tenure and "probably the one with the greatest consequences."

Roh's time in Washington will be a low-key affair, in marked contrast to a June trip by the leader of another major U.S. ally in Asia, Japan. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi spoke publicly of his "heart-to-heart" friendship with Bush during that visit, and Bush treated Koizumi to a rare presidential tour of the home of the prime minister's musical hero, Elvis Presley, in Memphis, Tennessee.

During their meeting, Roh and Bush will discuss an ambitious U.S.-South Korean free trade proposal and Seoul's desire to retake wartime command of its troops from the United States. The focus, however, will be on North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0063156

Bush favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside of the six-nation talks, which Pyongyang has boycotted since November. Roh has tried to engage Kim Jong Il's communist government.

"North Korean policy has been foundering, in part because North Korea sees the huge gap between Seoul and Washington and drives right through it," O'Hanlon said.

Separately, U.S. lawmakers were expected to consider on Wednesday a North Korean nonproliferation measure and a resolution asking Japan to accept responsibility for the sexual exploitation of women in Korea and other Asian countries during World War II.

Michael Green, Bush's senior adviser on Asia until December, said that Roh and Bush have a good working relationship, but he noted that there will be intense pressure on Roh from some in Seoul to emphasize differences with Washington about North Korea.

In the past, Roh has lobbied Bush to change the tone of U.S. policy on North Korea, an attempt to cater to South Koreans who favor expanding ties with the North, said Green, now an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Seoul Backs Censure Of North (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon yesterday said Seoul strongly supports the United Nations' condemnation of North Korea for its recent missile tests, and denied that South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun was trying to play down the missile tests when he described them recently as tests carried out by the communist North for political, not military effect.

"I do not know if the United States and others have fully made up their positions, but the South Korea government will faithfully implement the U.N. Security Council resolution [1695]. We fully supported it," Mr. Ban said.

Mr. Ban spoke with reporters from The Washington Times on the eve of an Oval Office summit today between President Bush and Mr. Roh.

Mr. Ban acknowledged there was a "perception gap" between the two allies on North Korea and other issues, a gap often exaggerated by South Korea's domestic press.

He said the alliance remained fundamentally healthy and that public opinion in South Korea toward the United States had improved in recent years.

On other issues, the South Korean offered the following thoughts:

·The South Korean government is "firmly committed" to a new bilateral free-trade agreement with the United States. He said Seoul hoped to have a deal by spring, despite strong opposition in South Korea from farmers and other groups.

·He said Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh would not nail down at today's meeting an accord to transfer operational control of South Korean forces in wartime. Details of such an accord would be left to military officials meeting next month.

But he said South Korea should assume responsibility as a sovereign country.

"When you are making fundamental changes, it's better that they be done as soon as possible and not to leave a long period of uncertainty," he said.

Mr. Roh, who last met Mr. Bush 10 months ago on the sidelines of a summit of Asia-Pacific leaders, will hold a one-hour Oval Office meeting and have an hourlong working lunch with Mr. Bush today. He met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday and will also visit San Francisco before returning home.

The short, low-key summit is in sharp contrast to the warm welcome Mr. Bush recently extended to Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, one of the U.S. administration's closest allies in the region.

That visit included a trip by the two leaders to Memphis, Tenn., to tour Graceland, home of Mr. Junichiro's musical idol, Elvis Presley.

U.S. and South Korean officials have dismissed the idea of fundamental problems with the alliance, despite clear tactical differences in recent months over how to deal with North Korea.

But Mr. Roh, in a speech yesterday to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, acknowledged there was considerable talk in both capitals about strains in the alliance forged in the early days of the Cold War.

"I am quite aware that in Korea and the United States, we have many people who are quite concerned" about the state of bilateral ties, Mr. Roh said, speaking through an interpreter.

But "in all areas where the United States has been fighting to establish order and freedom, Korea has always been at the United States' side," he added.

Among the delicate issues on the bilateral agenda: how tough a line to take with North Korea; a proposed U.S.-South Korea free-trade agreement; and Seoul's efforts to reclaim operational control of its military forces in wartime from U.S. command.

DOJ_NMG_0063157

Mr. Ban, in an interview with South Korean journalists last month, conceded there were "a number of perception gaps" between Seoul and Washington.

"The upcoming summit is important," he said then. "Once a perception is formed, it is difficult to remove it."

Mr. Roh's government, beset by scandals and worries over North Korea policy, has hit historic lows in recent South Korean polls.

The South Korean president's five-year term ends in December 2007, but Mr. Ban, minister of foreign affairs and trade since January 2004, may be in line to move to a bigger stage.

The 62-year-old career diplomat and government minister announced in February his candidacy to succeed U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, whose term ends Dec. 31. Mr. Ban topped an unofficial Security Council straw poll held in July.

Just Say No (To Roh) (WSJ)

By Jin Ha Hwang

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

North Korea is no longer a threat to South Korea. The wartime operational control (OP-CON) of 680,000 Korean troops will be transferred back to South Korea by 2009, and the U.S.-Republic of Korea Combined Forces Command (CFC) will be consequently dismantled.

At least that is what the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea think will happen in the next three years. But they would be making a grave mistake.

It may seem natural for a sovereign nation like South Korea to exercise wartime control over its military. It is also natural, however, for a sovereign nation to work with other countries to increase its ability for deterrence against an unpredictable and ever-present adversary, especially when other countries share common goals. Such is the rationale behind the 1978 establishment of the CFC, and it has served most successfully over the years in deterring military aggression by North Korea. In its inception, the presidents of the U.S. and South Korea, under an understanding of mutual benefit and operational efficiency, agreed to delegate power to the commander of the CFC to exercise wartime control.

Given its history and prime importance to the survival of South Korea, not to mention the benefits of peace in Northeast Asia, both Koreans and Americans must be aware of what risks the transfer of wartime OP-CON would bring to the U.S.-South Korea combined defense posture, and whether this would spell further uncertainty for Northeast Asia's future. That the current uproar in South Korean society over this issue was fuelled by a few pro-North Korean politicians makes the issue doubly concerning.

While certain leaders wish to make this issue a national priority, the Korean people themselves have not called for the transfer of wartime operational control, nor do most desire dismantlement of the robust and effective U.S.-ROK Combined Forces Command. We must also find out what the Korean and U.S. military field commanders think about the issue.

Transfer of the wartime OP-CON, and the consequent dismantlement of the CFC, is a dangerous move that would not only increase chances of instability, but could may well benefit North Korea in the long run. Here's why:

· First, the security situation on the Korean peninsula is more fragile than ever. It was only March of this year when the commanding general of the U.S. Forces Korea, Gen. Burwell B. Bell, testified at the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee that "North Korea poses a variety of threats to regional and global stability." His testimony tells us that we need a strong alliance with a well-coordinated combined defense posture, and most Koreans, military or civilian, agree. Furthermore, North Korea is still trying to develop ICBM missiles and nuclear weapons.

· Second, a transfer might encourage North Korea to step up its rogue tactics. For the past half-century, North Korean leaders have persistently called for the withdrawal of American troops and dismantlement of the Combined Forces Command. Pyongyang has also continuously insisted that it would not discuss any military issues with a Seoul that does not even have wartime control over its military. The North's regime would undoubtedly see the transfer as a victory, and use it to strengthen their otherwise dissipating domestic legitimacy, perhaps even emboldening them to make further demands.

· Third, the concept of "independent operation" is no longer applicable for 21st-century wars. All the militaries of the world are cooperating and delegating responsibilities and commands to one other. This is seen clearly in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Operations of the NATO Allied Command are controlled by the commander of the U.S.-European Command. The U.S. and Japan have two separate commands, but this is because Japan's Constitution prohibits its Self-Defense Forces from being a part of any combined war operations. The Korean peninsula is the most fortified and politically complex region in the world, and an alliance with two separate military commands would lose cohesion during a major crisis.

Even as politics may have changed on the Korean peninsula, the security situation, in terms of the need for deterrence, has not changed one bit. North Korea's asymmetric threats still pose a grave danger to South Korea's security, as well as to countless U.S. economic and political interests. What about the possibility of a major crisis like the North's sudden collapse? Now is the time to keep the alliance intact and strengthen its combined defense capabilities.

The wartime OP-CON is a delegated power granted with consent of the commanders in chief of the two countries, for the purpose of fulfilling a nonpolitical but essential technical need. No national pride is lost because of it. Yet South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun wishes to politicize the issue by linking it with words such as "sovereignty" or "destiny." He is also playing a dangerous game of dangling the OP-CON transfer issue in front of North Korea to open up a channel for communication, since the dismantlement of the CFC was one of the three preconditions North Korea suggested to the South for any serious inter-Korean talks. The results of this year's local elections say most South Koreans do not support Mr. Roh's stance. So for whose interests is he pushing forward the transfer?

The U.S.-ROK Combined Forces Command is a mechanism designed to deter war, and also to fight and win a war should deterrence fail. It is a military structure that has functioned admirably for the benefit of both South Korea and the United States. Should we let it go because of domestic political interests? Who has the last laugh then?

Iran And European Union Postpone Talks (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 14, 2006

The European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's top nuclear negotiator on Wednesday abruptly postponed talks on easing tensions over the refusal of the Tehran regime to suspend uranium enrichment.

Cristina Gallach, spokeswoman for EU foreign policy official Javier Solana, did not say what prompted the decision to downgrade Thursday's meeting in Paris to the level of aides to Solana and Ali Larijani, Iran's senior nuclear negotiator.

But the decision of the two principals to stay away from what would have been their third meeting in a week suggested snags had developed from their direct contacts over the weekend.

The absence of Solana and Larijani was bound to dampen high expectations for the meeting. Their two sessions in Vienna had been described by both men as making progress toward solving the impasse over Tehran's defiance of a U.N. Security Council that it freeze enrichment.

Members of delegations familiar with the outcome of the talks Saturday and Sunday had said Iran suggested it was ready to consider suspending enrichment for up to two months.

But the officials also told The Associated Press that Iran continued to refuse pressure to stop enrichment before talks with a six-nation alliance meant to resolve the nuclear standoff, even though those nations conditioned starting negotiations on a freeze.

In Dakar Senegal, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his country's nuclear standoff with the West can be solved through dialogue, and called for unspecified "new conditions" in negotiations.

Ahmedinejad, on an hours-long stopover in Senegal en route to Cuba for a summit of the Nonaligned Movement, said the debate over Iranian nuclear enrichment could be solved peacefully.

"We're partisans of dialogue and negotiation. We believe that we can resolve our problems in a space of dialogue and justice — together," he told reporters.

Oil-rich Iran says it needs uranium enrichment to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that would generate electricity. Enrichment can also create material for atomic bombs, however, and the United States and other nations suspect that is Tehran's real goal.

Gallach, the EU spokeswoman, said the results of the meeting Thursday would be reported to Iran's capital and EU headquarters before a decision on scheduling further talks between Solana and Larijani.

In a telephone call from the EU offices in Brussels, Belgium, Gallach said the two aides meeting Thursday — EU negotiator Robert Cooper and Javad Vaeidi, deputy head of Iran's powerful National Security Council — had also held talks in Vienna on Tuesday.

Different interpretations of what was achieved at the weekend talks were reflected earlier in the day.

In moderate language, Britain, France and Germany only alluded to the threat of Security Council sanctions if Iran continues to enrich uranium and called on the Tehran regime to negotiate the dispute with the international community.

The United States, in contrast, said it was time for the council "to back international diplomacy with sanctions."

The relatively soft tone of the European statement at a meeting of the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency appeared focused on keeping confrontation low a day ahead of what then was still thought to be a Solana-Larijani meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0063159

Diplomats accredited to the IAEA meeting, who agreed to discuss the matter only if granted anonymity, said that while France and Britain favored a tougher approach, Germany wanted a more toned-down text.

The need for bargaining among the Europeans — and the sharper tone of the U.S. statement — reflected uncertainties about Iranian intentions after Tehran suggested during the talks Sunday that it was ready to consider a short-term enrichment freeze.

"We continue to extend an open hand to Iran," the European statement said. It added that if Iran met the demand on enrichment, "we will ask to suspend action in the Security Council."

The three said the Solana-Larijani meetings had "helped clarify some misunderstandings."

But the chief U.S. delegate, Gregory L. Schulte, accused Iran of "a history of deception, lack of transparency, provocative behavior and disregard for its international obligations."

"The time has come for the Security Council to back international diplomacy with international sanctions," he said.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will take up the sanctions issue with other diplomats when the U.N. General Assembly meets next week in New York.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — along with Germany have offered Iran economic and political rewards if it agrees to consider a long-term moratorium on enrichment and commits to an enrichment freeze before talks to discuss details of their package.

Reflecting differences over how to deal with Tehran, they gave up an attempt to jointly criticize Iran's defiance Tuesday, after China and Russia refused to endorse U.S.-backed tough language, diplomats said.

Those two countries have resisted U.S.-led efforts to move to sanctions quickly, despite the passing of the Security Council's Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to freeze work on developing enrichment technology. They favor continued negotiations.

Foreign Ministers To Meet In New York On Iranian Sanctions: Rice (AFP)

AFP, September 14, 2006

Foreign ministers from the six major powers involved in the nuclear standoff with Iran will meet soon in New York to discuss imposing sanctions against Tehran, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice will travel to New York next week for talks on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly meeting and she said this would be the opportunity to press ahead with the sanctions if Iran continues to reject demands it freeze its suspected nuclear weapons program.

"There will be a meeting in New York of the ministers of the P5-plus-1," she said, referring to the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, plus Germany -- the coalition that has led efforts to halt Iran's nuclear program.

"I think that is a natural time to assess where we are and make some movement forward," she said following a meeting at the State Department with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution in July giving Iran a month to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing program or face sanctions.

Washington and some other governments believe the enrichment is aimed at producing material for nuclear weapons.

Iran insists the work is only to make fuel for electricity generation and has rejected the UN demand, although negotiations have continued between Iran and European Union officials acting as intermediaries in the dispute.

Rice said the way forward for Iran was clear, it can either suspend its uranium enrichment as a prelude to broader negotiations on improving economic and diplomatic ties with the international community, or face new UN Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions.

"We have always believed that the path was very clear: suspend and go down the path of negotiations or the international community will go down the path of the Security Council," she said.

"We are working on that track," she said, noting that senior diplomats of the P5-plus-1 governments have been holding discussions in recent days on specific sanctions measures.

"If the Iranians wish to suspend, and begin negotiations, obviously that would be a good thing," Rice said.

But she said that in light of a decision by Iran to cancel without explanation a planned meeting Thursday between Tehran's lead negotiator, Ari Larijani, and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana, "I don't really know that that option is still available".

Earlier Wednesday the State Department spokesman brushed aside new indications that key allies in the P5-plus-one group were wavering on the issue of imposing sanctions.

"We have full confidence" the six will back sanctions, spokesman Sean McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0063160

He was speaking after the six failed to agree Tuesday on a joint statement on Iran at a meeting in Vienna because "the United States was too tough" and Russia and China did not want the word "sanctions" mentioned, a Western diplomat told AFP.

Livni, speaking alongside Rice, also referred to the danger of a split in the coalition confronting the Islamic government in Iran, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist.

"The United States shows its determination (for sanctions), but there's a need to get more states on board and there are some hesitations, unfortunately, from other parts of the world," she said after a closed door meeting with Rice.

"But our expectation is that the international community will show more determination on this issue on the understanding that this is not a threat to Israel but a threat to the entire free world."

U.N. Inspectors Dispute Iran Report By House Panel (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

U.N. inspectors investigating Iran's nuclear program angrily complained to the Bush administration and to a Republican congressman yesterday about a recent House committee report on Iran's capabilities, calling parts of the document "outrageous and dishonest" and offering evidence to refute its central claims.

Officials of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency said in a letter that the report contained some "erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated statements." The letter, signed by a senior director at the agency, was addressed to Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, which issued the report. A copy was hand-delivered to Gregory L. Schulte, the U.S. ambassador to the IAEA in Vienna.

The IAEA openly clashed with the Bush administration on pre-war assessments of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Relations all but collapsed when the agency revealed that the White House had based some allegations about an Iraqi nuclear program on forged documents.

After no such weapons were found in Iraq, the IAEA came under additional criticism for taking a cautious approach on Iran, which the White House says is trying to building nuclear weapons in secret. At one point, the administration orchestrated a campaign to remove the IAEA's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei. It failed, and he won the Nobel Peace Prize last year.

Yesterday's letter, a copy of which was provided to The Washington Post, was the first time the IAEA has publicly disputed U.S. allegations about its Iran investigation. The agency noted five major errors in the committee's 29-page report, which said Iran's nuclear capabilities are more advanced than either the IAEA or U.S. intelligence has shown.

Among the committee's assertions is that Iran is producing weapons-grade uranium at its facility in the town of Natanz. The IAEA called that "incorrect," noting that weapons-grade uranium is enriched to a level of 90 percent or more. Iran has enriched uranium to 3.5 percent under IAEA monitoring.

When the congressional report was released last month, Hoekstra said his intent was "to help increase the American public's understanding of Iran as a threat." Spokesman Jamal Ware said yesterday that Hoekstra will respond to the IAEA letter.

Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.), a committee members, said the report was "clearly not prepared in a manner that we can rely on." He agreed to send it to the full committee for review, but the Republicans decided to make it public before then, he said in an interview.

The report was never voted on or discussed by the full committee. Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the vice chairman, told Democratic colleagues in a private e-mail that the report "took a number of analytical shortcuts that present the Iran threat as more dire -- and the Intelligence Community's assessments as more certain -- than they are."

Privately, several intelligence officials said the committee report included at least a dozen claims that were either demonstrably wrong or impossible to substantiate. Hoekstra's office said the report was reviewed by the office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

Negroponte's spokesman, John Callahan, said in a statement that his office "reviewed the report and provided its response to the committee on July 24, '06." He did not say whether it had approved or challenged any of the claims about Iran's capabilities.

"This is like prewar Iraq all over again," said David Albright, a former nuclear inspector who is president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security. "You have an Iranian nuclear threat that is spun up, using bad information that's cherry-picked and a report that trashes the inspectors."

The committee report, written by a single Republican staffer with a hard-line position on Iran, chastised the CIA and other agencies for not providing evidence to back assertions that Iran is building nuclear weapons.

It concluded that the lack of intelligence made it impossible to support talks with Tehran. Democrats on the committee saw it as an attempt from within conservative Republican circles to undermine Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has agreed to talk with the Iranians under certain conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0063161

The report's author, Fredrick Fleitz, is a onetime CIA officer and special assistant to John R. Bolton, the administration's former point man on Iran at the State Department. Bolton, who is now ambassador to the United Nations, had been highly influential during President Bush's first term in drawing up a tough policy that rejected talks with Tehran.

Among the allegations in Fleitz's Iran report is that ElBaradei removed a senior inspector from the Iran investigation because he raised "concerns about Iranian deception regarding its nuclear program." The agency said the inspector has not been removed.

A suggestion that ElBaradei had an "unstated" policy that prevented inspectors from telling the truth about Iran's program was particularly "outrageous and dishonest," according to the IAEA letter, which was signed by Vilmos Cserveny, the IAEA's director for external affairs and a former Hungarian ambassador.

Hoekstra's committee is working on a separate report about North Korea that is also being written principally by Fleitz. A draft of the report, provided to The Post, includes several assertions about North Korea's weapons program that the intelligence officials said they cannot substantiate, including one that Pyongyang is already enriching uranium.

The intelligence community believes North Korea is trying to acquire an enrichment capability but has no proof that an enrichment facility has been built, the officials said.

Political, Tech Hurdles Muddle Iran Oil Industry (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 14, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — Nobody worries about spilling a little as they fill 'er up here at the gas station on Vali Asr Avenue. Why should they? With gas costing less than 40 cents — that's right, cents — a gallon, leaving a little on the pavement is no big deal.

“It's very cheap,” says Feridoun Mansouri, 52, with a laugh. The retired government worker tops off the tank of his silver sedan for 12,000 rials, or about $1.35.

Perhaps it's no surprise that a country sitting on 132 billion barrels of oil, the world's third-largest total, enjoys cheap gasoline. But the scene at this urban filling station suggests an abundance that couldn't be further removed from the grinding reality of Iran's oil industry.

From wellhead to gas pump, Iran's fabulously endowed petroleum industry confronts debilitating political and technological headwinds. Aging oil fields are starved of the most advanced technology because U.S. sanctions and pervasive political uncertainty limit investment by major oil companies. A shortage of domestic refining capacity means oil-rich Iran must import 40% of its gasoline. That dependence is one of the country's chief vulnerabilities as it faces the potential imposition of new sanctions over its controversial nuclear research program.

Yet, Iran remains defiant. Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei has threatened to halt his country's oil exports if the U.S. slaps sanctions on Iran because of its uranium enrichment efforts, which the Bush administration suspects are intended to produce nuclear weapons. Europe, Japan and China purchase two-thirds of Iran's exports. Though the U.S. buys no Iranian oil, a cutoff of Iranian shipments, or a broader clamp-down on oil tankers leaving the Persian Gulf, could be a catastrophe for the global economy.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has dismissed the danger, arguing that Iran depends almost entirely on oil export revenue to keep its economy and government afloat. And Wednesday in Vienna, Iran oil minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh reaffirmed Tehran's commitment to supplying global crude markets despite the standoff over its nuclear program, the Associated Press reported.

Others aren't so sanguine. “The Iranians would have no difficulty starving themselves to prove a point. They are terribly cognizant of image, face and respect,” says Kent Moors, chief executive of Asida Group, a Pittsburgh-based oil industry consultant.

Domestic political jockeying has further complicated Iran's oil field management. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office one year ago vowing to root out a corrupt “oil mafia” he accused of stealing the nation's patrimony. But parliament balked at his first three oil minister nominees, regarding each as long on Islamic fervor and short on petroleum expertise.

Only after a three-month showdown did Ahmadinejad tap veteran oil man Vaziri-Hamaneh for the job. Few posts are more vital: Oil sales account for 85% of Iran's export earnings and more than 40% of government revenue.

Vaziri-Hamaneh and other Iranian oil officials responsible for holding the industry together are well regarded by global oil pros. Massaging ancient fields to squeeze out every last drop of oil is no easy task given that the best technology and expertise in the global industry remains off-limits.

But Ahmadinejad's continuing bid to exert political influence over the oil ministry is raising alarms in some industry circles. Amid continued infighting, the pace of activity has slowed. “The management is not so quick in their decisions. … It takes longer,” says Hamid Zaheri, general manager of United Arab Emirates-based Crescent Petroleum's Tehran office.

DOJ_NMG_0063162

The oil ministry denied a request to interview Vaziri-Hamaneh or other senior ministry officials.

Ahmadinejad also has stirred concern among oil professionals by awarding several billion dollars in oil and gas industry contracts to companies affiliated with Iran's Revolutionary Guards, the paramilitary force charged with safeguarding the Islamic revolution. More awards are likely.

The Revolutionary Guards' preferential access to state financing allows them to underbid private firms, says Bijan Khajehpour, chairman of Tehran-based Atieh Group, which advises foreign firms on the Iranian market.

The Revolutionary Guards, which number the president among its veterans, developed significant experience managing large infrastructure projects after the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. But Khajehpour says that the organization lacks specific oil business know-how, and they fear "that some technologically difficult projects would not be efficiently managed by such companies."

Still, it's not all bad news. Thanks to high oil prices, government coffers are bulging: Oil export revenue for the 12 months ending in March is expected to total $49.7 billion vs. $19.4 billion four years ago.

That enables Iran to afford an estimated $5.8 billion bill for imported gasoline this year, plus additional subsidies to keep prices low on food and fertilizer, according to the International Monetary Fund.

So far, rising revenue has outpaced mushrooming public expenditures. But government spending, which has doubled in three years, appears certain to continue rising under the populist Ahmadinejad.

For Iran, remaining sufficiently flush to continue affording the presidential spending spree may depend upon reaching unrealistically ambitious oil production goals. In its current five-year development plan, the government calls for boosting output from 4.1 million barrels a day to 5 million a day by 2009 and 7 million by 2024.

That won't be easy. A $2 billion project for a Japanese consortium to develop Iran's largest new discovery since the late 1960s, the massive Azadegan field, remains in limbo two years after the contract was signed. A Japanese consortium headed by Inpex has refused to start work on the field, saying that landmines left over from the Iran-Iraq war remain in the area.

Some Iranian officials, believing the Japanese actually are waiting for a resolution of the nuclear controversy, have set a deadline for action. If work doesn't begin by Friday, they say, they will solicit new bids, giving preference to domestic companies.

Output at Iran's aging fields, most of which are in the southwestern province of Khuzestan, is declining each year by about 300,000 barrels a day. And Iran is drilling few new exploration wells. "Iranian oil field output is dropping very seriously, not because the government is mismanaging them, but because the fields are old. The Iranians have to struggle to keep things where they are," says Fereidun Fesharaki, an Iranian oil official in the 1970s who is now an industry consultant.

To reverse the decline, Iran must attract an enormous surge of foreign investment. A critical need is outside cash and expertise to boost recovery rates — the percentage of a field's total reserves brought to the surface — from Iran's 24%-27% to the 35% global average, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Since 1995, U.S. sanctions have barred American oil companies from major investments in Iran. Additional sanctions enacted one year later were intended to extend the prohibition to bar foreign energy firms from helping Iran upgrade its oil and gas industry.

But amid howls from European allies, the United States granted waivers for foreign firms such as France's Total. Since 1997, foreign firms have plowed $15 billion into Iranian oil and gas projects.

That's a fraction of the $162 billion the International Energy Agency estimates Iran will need by 2030. Securing that much foreign capital is unlikely given unfavorable Iranian contract terms and political uncertainty surrounding Iran's controversial nuclear program.

"The issue is not that the industry came to a halt because of U.S. sanctions. It hasn't. The industry's potential with no sanctions is the issue. … The potential of Iran has not been met," says Narsi Ghorban, a prominent local energy expert and managing director of NarKangan Gas-to-Liquid International.

Iranian officials late last month acknowledged they likely will fall short of their production goals, perhaps increasing crude oil production to only 4.5 million barrels a day by 2010.

"We are not close to the 5 million (barrels per day) target. … More than 80% of the current total oil output is being provided from aged oil fields that need serious investment to increase production," said Hossein Nozari, managing director of National Iranian Oil, the BBC reported.

Barring an additional oil price spike, the failure to significantly increase production means Iran likely will face a tough choice between painful cuts in spending and allowing already high inflation to spike, says Djavad Salehi-Isfahani, an Iranian-born economist at Virginia Tech University.

"(Ahmadinejad) may be able to manage this year … but the chickens will come home to roost in the fall of '08," he says.

Meanwhile, back at the gas station, absent-minded motorists pay no attention as gas sloshes onto the pavement and trickles away into the gutter. For now, government efforts to reduce the bill for Iran's gasoline imports are limited to colorful billboards urging motorists to stop pumping before gas spills onto the pavement. (Pump nozzles here lack the automatic shut-off features common in the USA and Europe.)

Proposals to discourage consumption by trimming costly subsidies, thus raising pump prices, have foundered amid politicians' well-founded fears of popular unrest.

"If they lift the subsidy, the price will go higher (and) we will have higher inflation," says motorist Mansouri, turning grim. "The people will be very upset."

U.S., Israel Cool To Proposal For Palestinian Unity Government (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni reacted skeptically yesterday to a proposed unity Palestinian government that would include Hamas, saying the militant group must first renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist before restrictions on international aid can be lifted.

The Palestinian Authority has teetered near collapse since foreign governments largely cut off aid after the radical Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, unexpectedly won legislative elections in January. President Mahmoud Abbas, of the more moderate Fatah faction that lost the elections, this week reached a deal with Hamas to form a government that would empower him to negotiate with Israel -- in effect sidestepping Hamas's pledge to destroy the Jewish state. The Palestinian cabinet resigned yesterday to clear the way for a new unity government.

Some European officials have greeted the announcement as a possible breakthrough, potentially allowing for increased aid. The Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay civil salaries, which about 1 million Palestinians rely on for their livelihood.

But Rice and Livni, speaking to reporters after a meeting at the State Department, reiterated that the new government must meet conditions that were set by the United States and its allies after the Hamas victory.

"The outcome of the process is not clear," Rice said. "It goes without saying that it's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist. It goes without saying that it's hard to have a process for peace if you do not renounce violence."

Livni, who is also deputy prime minister, said that Israel is still committed to helping create a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel. "Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy," she said. But she added that it is up to the Palestinians "to meet these requirements fully and completely, and we believe that these requirements are not negotiable."

Abbas plans to meet President Bush on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly meeting next week, and Livni put the onus on Abbas to produce results. "Now is a moment in time in which Mahmoud Abbas has to decide whether the Palestinian Authority will operate on his terms or on the terrorists' terms," she said.

Livni's visit to Washington is the first by a senior Israeli official since a U.S.-brokered cease-fire helped end a month-long war between Israel and the radical Shiite group Hezbollah in southern Lebanon. The war was sparked by the capture of two Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah as Israel was battling militants in the Gaza Strip. The soldiers have not been released.

Despite complaints from other nations that Israel's response was disproportionate, the Bush administration firmly backed Israel in its fight with Hezbollah. Livni praised Rice's "determination not to come back to the dangerous status quo that we faced before the unprovoked attack on Israel." But she said it is unclear whether "the window of opportunity" could be seized to fully implement a U.N. resolution that calls for the disarmament of Hezbollah.

Assistant Secretary of State C. David Welch yesterday gave the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a relatively upbeat assessment of the situation in Lebanon, saying Hezbollah has difficulty obtaining new weapons and 4,000 foreign troops have begun peacekeeping missions. He noted that, for the first time in four decades, the Lebanese army has moved into southern Lebanon, which has long been firmly under the control of Hezbollah.

Earlier this week, however, the House International Relations Committee put a hold on tens of millions of dollars in announced assistance to Lebanon, arguing that the Lebanese government was not adhering to the "spirit of the relevant resolutions" of the U.N. Security Council. The move was initiated by Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, after he returned from Lebanon two weeks ago. Lantos said he told the Lebanese prime minister and defense minister that they can have their money as soon as they request that the international force be deployed on the Syrian border.

A State Department official said the administration will work to address the committee's concerns, adding that there is "shared interest in both the Congress and the administration to ensure that Lebanon's borders are secure."

Palestinian Cabinet Makes Room For Planned Unity Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063164

JERUSALEM, Sept. 13 — Palestinian cabinet members submitted their resignations Wednesday night to allow for the creation of a national unity government that is expected to include a broad range of factions, Palestinian officials said.

The new government may not be in place for weeks, and it is not clear whether Western countries will be prepared to restore assistance that was halted when the militant Islamic movement Hamas came to power earlier this year.

Isolated by the West, starved of funding and squeezed by Israel, Hamas has not been able to govern and agreed this week to the unity government. Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said Wednesday night that cabinet ministers had offered their resignations to Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, of the rival Fatah faction, says he plans to dismiss the government formally in the coming days, though he intends to ask Mr. Haniya to form the new government.

"As I said in the beginning of the week, the government will be formed soon," Mr. Abbas said.

While the departing cabinet was dominated by Hamas, which won the Palestinian elections in January, the unity government is expected to include members of Fatah. Smaller factions, independents and technocrats are also considered likely to be part of the new cabinet.

Mr. Abbas said Wednesday that he would send a delegation to the United Nations General Assembly next week in an effort to restart a dialogue with Israel.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel says that he is willing to meet with Mr. Abbas, but that the Palestinians must release a captured Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, before there can be progress.

Hamas says that it does not object to Mr. Abbas's holding talks with Israel, but the group remains committed to its positions, including a refusal to recognize Israel.

Mr. Haniya said that he saw little point in any Palestinian politician meeting with Israeli officials. "We do not want to relive the experience of past negotiations," he said. "Before talking about negotiations, we should ask ourselves: Do the Israelis recognize the rights of Palestinians? Will the refugees return? Will the prisoners be released? Will Israeli occupation and aggression end?"

Local Conflicts Cloud Palestinian Pact (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

Tensions Boil Over in Teachers' Strike Even as Top Leaders Prepare to Share Power

TULKAREM, West Bank -- The two rival factions vying for control of the Palestinian government appear headed for a shotgun wedding that has the potential to breathe life back into a peace process.

But tensions being played out in towns and neighborhoods continue to smolder. Among the most high-profile is a teachers' strike, now in its second week, that has closed schools for hundreds of thousands of Palestinian children. How local conflicts such as these are resolved could determine whether the new unity government succeeds or fails, with major implications for Israel and the West.

The announcement this week by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas that his Fatah organization and rival Hamas had agreed to form a unity government was the first glimmer of progress in the Palestinian situation in months.

Hamas, which came to power in elections in January and whose leader Ismail Haniya is the Palestinian Authority prime minister, has agreed to share power with Fatah. The agreement doesn't explicitly say whether Hamas will meet the demands of Western powers that it renounce terrorism and recognize Israel, but its rapprochement with Fatah could mark the beginning of the end of the international boycott of financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority that was imposed after Hamas came to power in January and has contributed to seething tensions in the West Bank and Gaza.

Among those tensions, since Sept. 2, tens of thousands of teachers, whose salaries haven't been paid in months, have been on strike in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Many here say the strike was orchestrated by Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction to pressure Hamas to yield control of the government. That in turn may have ended crippling economic sanctions, which were imposed on the Palestinian government because the U.S. and others have designated Hamas a terrorist organization and which have kept it from receiving hundreds of millions of dollars of international aid and tens of millions in tax revenue withheld by Israel since Hamas swept the January elections.

The strike hasn't held easily. In Tulkarem, a city located on the western edge of the West Bank, one family said their children showed up for school during the first week of the strike and found masked gunmen chasing away teachers -- believed to be Hamas loyalists who showed up for work to break the strike. There have been other reports of similar confrontations across the territories over the past two weeks.

Ayman Khalil, a 42-year-old father of six, says that during the first week of classes in early September, he rushed to their neighborhood school to find people he knew to be Fatah militiamen firing their guns and intimidating teachers and children.

DOJ_NMG_0063165

Mr. Khalil fears the violence at the schools foreshadows an inevitable showdown between Hamas and Fatah over how to divide the newly proclaimed unity government. "Their differences will be resolved by the gun," he says.

The strike continued yesterday, according to the Palestinian teachers union, and will continue until the workers receive their salaries.

But local residents say a small number of Hamas teachers are still showing up to teach. Mr. Khalil's 17-year-old daughter attends a public school where classes are being taught by Hamas loyalists. She says on some mornings, teachers use wire cutters to break into the classrooms that have been locked down by Fatah supporters.

Hamas also supports, through its charities, private schools that continue to operate during the strike and are taking in new students who are shut out from the public schools.

While these private schools are relatively small in number -- less than 10% of the roughly 3,000 schools in the West Bank and Gaza -- they have become a powerful symbol among Palestinians of Hamas's ability to provide services to its people even in dire economic conditions.

To be sure, Hamas's political leadership has been hurt by the arrest of several of its lawmakers by the Israeli military, and Fatah officials cite local polls showing many Palestinians growing frustrated with the Hamas government. But whether the militant Islamist group's long-term popularity has eroded is less clear.

Mr. Abbas hasn't yet detailed how the new coalition government's ministries will be divided between the factions, and taking control of the public-school system could be one way for Hamas to shore up its base of support and continue to exert its Islamic influence on Palestinian society. Hamas might insist on controlling the social institutions, such as schools and health care, while the ministries of finance and foreign affairs, which would interface with Israel and Western nations, could go to Fatah.

But leaving educational duties to Hamas poses the risk that under the religious group's guidance, the Palestinian population could become even more extreme, which is something Fatah, which wants to see a secular Palestinian society, could find hard to swallow. "Education will be one thing they will fight over," says Ron Pundak, director general of The Peres Center for Peace in Tel Aviv. "Education is where you influence the future. This is at the heart of what kind of Palestinian society that we will see for generations to come. But I don't think this will be a hurdle too high for the government."

At one private school in Tulkarem, which local residents say is supported by Hamas, the airy classrooms have fresh coats of paint and there is a swimming pool, and a computer lab wired to the Internet. At the entrance, there is a small carpeted room where the children come to pray. They are building a language lab to help the students learn English and beefing up the science lab. Children's poems and riddles adorn the walls. One small sign, decorated with hearts, reads: "If you want peace, be prepared for war."

The headmaster says the school isn't run by Hamas or any other political party. "Our main target is quality education," said headmaster Munir Abu-Safia. He says funding for the school comes from tuition, and that about 20 additional students have joined the school during the strike at the public schools.

Security analysts say these private schools are more of a political gift to Hamas loyalists, rather than a breeding ground for suicide bombers and militants. For that, they say, Hamas relies on recruits drawn mostly from mosques and refugee camps.

The broad appeal of Hamas, and its schools, may lie less in its religious nature and more in the overall quality of its institutions. Many people say they want to send their children there because they say the academics are strong.

Even some Fatah loyalists, like Mr. Khalil, sent their children there. But then the school started raising tuition beyond what he could afford. He had to send his children to the public school, until it was shot up by the Fatah gunmen. He says the militia went too far. "Even the Israelis don't shoot in our school yards," he says.

U.S., Israel Warn Palestinian Factions (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 13, 2006

U.S. and Israeli diplomats warned on Wednesday that Palestinian leaders cannot assume their proposed unity government will gain international acceptance unless they renounce terrorism and accept Israel's right to exist.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni responded cautiously to Palestinian efforts to resolve an eight-month political standoff that has frozen foreign aid vital to the Palestinians.

"We will see what the outcome is here," Rice said, referring to efforts by the radical Hamas group and the moderate Fatah Party to form a coalition Palestinian government.

On Iran, Rice was skeptical about Tehran's suggestion it temporarily might suspend uranium enrichment as a condition for beginning talks about its nuclear program with the U.S. and Europe.

"They canceled the meeting for tomorrow and that should tell us something," Rice said. A session had been scheduled between the European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's top nuclear negotiator.

DOJ_NMG_0063166

Rice said the U.N. General Assembly meeting next week would be a "natural time to assess where we are" regarding possible penalties if Iran does not suspend its nuclear activity.

Focusing on the Mideast, Rice said the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, "is someone with whom we can work and with whom we are working." But, she added, a Palestinian coalition must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements between Palestinians and the Israelis.

Those internally accepted principles are the "very essential elements" of a solution, Rice said. "It's hard to have a partner for peace if you don't accept the right of the other partner to exist."

Rice and Livni indicated their governments could continue to deal with Abbas as part of a coalition, but it is not clear whether that arrangement would prove more workable than the current impasse.

The U.S., Israel and the EU consider Hamas a terrorist organization; the U.S. and Israel have sworn off any dealings with Hamas.

Livni offered assurances that Israel wants to make headway on the stalled plan to make peace with an eventual independent Palestinian state, despite the disarray in the Palestinian territories since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January.

"Stagnation is not the Israeli government policy," she said.

Livni said it was Abbas' responsibility to make progress.

"Now is a moment in time in which Mahmoud Abbas has to decide whether the Palestinian Authority will operate on his terms or on the terrorists' terms," she said.

President Bush is expected to meet with Abbas when the leaders attend the U.N. session in New York.

Livni saw Bush and other administration officials Wednesday as attention in the Middle East shifted to Palestinian humanitarian and political crises following Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

The president joined Livni's meeting with the White House national security adviser, Stephen Hadley. Bush reiterated his strong support for Israel's security and discussed with Livni "the threat posed by the Iranian and Syrian regimes," said Hadley's spokesman, Frederick Jones.

Livni is the most senior Israeli to visit Washington since a month of battles against Hezbollah ended in August with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire but without a decisive victory for Israel.

The U.S., Israel's closest ally, was its firmest defender during the cross-border war. U.S. allies and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan wanted a cease-fire much earlier in the fighting that killed 159 Israelis and at least 854 Lebanese, most of them civilians.

The Palestinian aid cutoff and Israel's refusal to transfer taxes it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority have to a severe financial crisis in Palestinian towns and left the government unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 workers for the past six months.

Palestinians agreed on Monday to form a national unity government to revive peace talks and end their international isolation.

The Palestinian Authority is effectively broke, with a monthly deficit in the tens of millions of dollars. Palestinians are the biggest per capita recipients of foreign aid in the world. In 2005, the first year the authority was not headed by Yasser Arafat, overseas donors contributed about $1 billion of the authority's approximately $1.9 billion budget.

U.S. direct aid was a small part of that — $70 million last year. Separately, the U.S. spent $225 million for humanitarian projects through the U.S. Agency for International Development last year, and gave $88 million for refugee assistance.

Gazans Go Unpaid, And Children Go Hungry (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

KHAN YUNIS, Gaza Strip, Sept. 12 — For the last week, Zidan Abu Reziq has been sleeping outside, next to his plantings on a small square of sand he expropriated.

The Abu Reziqs, like many of the large, destitute refugee families in this shrapneled, tumbledown slum, need to plant to eat. They took the land and planted it with vegetables, an investment of about $50, most of the money that the United Nations Relief and Works Agency gave them to buy school uniforms for the children.

Zidan's wife, Tamam, admits her 51-year-old husband sleeps with his plants because he needs to protect their investment in the lawless chaos of Gaza, where his own small theft of land, 20 square yards that belongs to the government, is dwarfed by the huge expropriations by gangs and families and militia groups that have taken over much of the best land left behind when the Israelis pulled out their settlers a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0063167

It is difficult to exaggerate the economic collapse of Gaza, with the Palestinian Authority cut off from funds by Israel, the United States and the European Union after Hamas won the legislative elections on Jan. 25.

Since then, the authority has paid most of its 73,000 employees here, nearly 40 percent of Gaza's work force, only 1.5 months' salary, resulting in a severe economic depression and growing signs of malnutrition, especially among the poorest children.

Few here are using the United Nations grants for school. The Abu Reziqs are carefully investing the rest of their relief money. More than $20 went straight to the local grocer, Tamam said, as a down payment on the credit extended to the family, which still owes more than $200. About $11 went to buy the ingredients, including two chickens, for the couscous dish that Tamam and her daughter, Fatma, 29, are making early this morning, kneading relief agency flour in big aluminum bowls, pouring in relief agency oil, rubbing the flour over a screen to get the right consistency.

The result will serve 15 people, Tamam said. "We want to feed the people who helped us with the land," she said, and some of their neighbors, even worse off than they.

Gaza's situation has worsened since Palestinian gunmen, including those from Hamas, killed two Israeli soldiers and captured a third on June 25. Israel reinvaded Gaza, and has since killed more than 240 Palestinians, many of them in gun battles.

An Israeli airstrike on Gaza's only electrical power plant means that most Gazans now get only 7 to 12 hours a day of electricity, at unpredictable hours, with running water largely dependent on electric pumps.

Fishermen, now prevented from going more than a few hundred yards from shore by the Israeli Navy, are using hand-thrown nets from the beach to catch a few sprats and sardines.

Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary for humanitarian affairs, said that Gaza was "a ticking time bomb." The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development warned Tuesday that the economy could shrink next year to the level of 15 years ago, and unemployment could rise to over 50 percent. The World Bank expects gross domestic product to decline by 27 percent this year.

These pressures have forced Hamas to agree to a proposal by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, for a national unity government, led by the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, which could allow Israel and the West to resume transferring funds and aid.

The Abu Reziqs are hopeful, like many Palestinians, that a new government will be better, but they are reluctant to blame Hamas, which, Zidan said, "was never given a chance to succeed." Still, it is unclear whether the new government, when there is one, will be seen to meet Western demands that it recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Hamas promised security in its victorious election campaign. But it has failed at that, said Hamdi Shaqqura of the Palestinian Center for Human Rights. "There is security chaos and no respect for law," he said, and a prime reason is the involvement of the police and security forces, many of them from Fatah, in the lawlessness, and the constant clashes with militia and gunmen affiliated with Hamas.

"People who are supposed to protect the law are the people who break it," he said, "and no one is brought to justice." For this chaos, he said, "I must blame the Palestinian Authority," not Israel.

Tamam, 49, recalls a near riot here when cooking gas was in short supply and there was a delivery of canisters. The police were called, she said. "They took canisters for themselves and then left," she said, shrugging.

Zidan used to work in the nearby Israeli settlement of Neve Dekalim. But after the outbreak of the second intifada in 2000, he was not allowed to enter the settlement. Now, Zidan is lucky to get three days a month of casual construction work.

His son Muhammad is a Palestinian Authority policeman who is supposed to make $340 a month, but who has been paid only $500 since Feb. 1. Now, Fatma says, "he spends little time at home, because he hasn't a shekel in his pocket, and he's ashamed."

The small welfare check Fatma, a divorced mother, used to get has stopped coming, and the women's group for which she used to do embroidery has collapsed with the death of its leader.

Tamam's son Suleiman, 20, watches television, until the electricity suddenly dies. "I'd like to have any job," he said simply. "Any job at all."

The United Nations is now helping to feed 830,000 people in Gaza, an increase of 100,000 since March, but to receive the relief agency's aid they have to be classified as refugees, who make up 70 percent of Gaza's 1.4 million people. The increase is largely refugees who work for the government and did not need assistance before.

The World Food Program helps to feed the poorest of the nonrefugees and now has 220,000 beneficiaries, an increase of 25 percent since March, which includes 136,000 people considered to be the "chronic poor," who are not getting previous welfare benefits from the Authority.

DOJ_NMG_0063168

"We have a complete deterioration of the economic situation in Gaza," said Kirstie Campbell of the agency. "People can't afford the basic things." Seventy percent of Gazans now depend on the United Nations for food aid.

In northern Gaza, in Beit Lahiya, where Israeli troops fought Palestinian gunmen during July, Atemad Abu Leilah, 33, lives in a hovel with her 11 children and her handicapped husband. He used to get $68 a month from the welfare ministry, but has received nothing for four months, she said.

She is a not a refugee, so is ineligible for refugee aid and like many here, gets by on casual work and the charity of neighbors.

She taps into wires in the street to take electricity illegally, and she has not bought her children school uniforms for the new school year. "I can't afford to buy them notebooks," she said.

She feeds her children greens, herbs, lentils and eggplant, and sometimes gets flour given by the World Food Program. "Forget about meat," she said. "The last time we had chicken was a month ago.''

Her relative, Ghalia Abu Leilah, 60, came by with a pot of yogurt she bought for her husband, who is dying of cancer, with money from a neighbor, she said.

A year ago, when the Israelis left, "We were very happy," Atemad Abu Leilah said. "I voted for Hamas, for reform and change and improvement. But now I look at my kids and I regret my vote."

Nearby, stalls sell flour and sunflower oil given as aid by the refugee agency and the World Food Program, most of it earmarked as gifts of the European Union and the United States, and labeled "not for sale." Iyad Baaker, who works at one stall, said that people needed cash, so sold the aid.

In Khan Yunis, Fatma Abu Reziq seemed distracted and sad, and brushed away a question about her daughter, Aya, 9. Later, she explained.

A week ago, her former husband took Aya away. He said it was easier to feed Aya himself than find the cash for child support.

Israeli Military Studies Hezbollah's Resilience (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, September 14, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israel's military has ordered a series of investigations to examine why its armed forces were unable to crush Hezbollah militants during a month of fighting in Lebanon.

Hezbollah guerrillas proved a resilient foe for Israel's vaunted military, inflicting casualties and firing missiles into Israel despite a punishing air campaign. Even after Israel sent thousands of troops into Lebanon, Israeli military commanders were still surprised by Hezbollah's capabilities.

"This is by far the greatest guerrilla group in the world," said Brig. Gen. Guy Zur, commander of Division 162. His division lost 12 soldiers during an effort by Israel to gain ground days before a United Nations-brokered cease-fire went into effect Aug. 14.

Israel's forces — better armed, better trained and more numerous than Hezbollah fighters — inflicted more casualties than Hezbollah, according to Israel's military. By Israel's tally, the military killed 500 to 700 militants, while losing 118 of its soldiers.

Throughout the 34 days of fighting, Hezbollah was able to continue firing missiles into Israel.

Hezbollah, a Shiite militia backed by Iran and Syria, achieved a strategic victory by appearing to stand up to Israel, says Ephraim Kam of the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies in Tel Aviv and a former colonel in military intelligence.

Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, emerged as a hero in the Arab world. "Israel underestimated the enemy," Kam said. "As a result, Hezbollah achieved a victory and appears by its survival to have emerged victorious."

The Israeli Defense Force is studying the conduct of its air force, navy and ground forces to learn from possible mistakes.

At the top of Israel's concerns is the success Hezbollah militants had in fighting Israel's armored forces. Brig. Gen. Halutsi Rudoy, head of Israel's armored forces, said Hezbollah laid ambushes throughout southern Lebanon's hilly terrain, hitting Israel's tanks with some of the world's most advanced anti-tank missiles.

The military had 400 tanks in Lebanon at the peak of the offensive. More than 50 were hit by Hezbollah-fired anti-tank missiles, killing 30 tank crewmen and disabling 22 tanks. Israel uses the Merkava tank, among the world's best-protected armored vehicles.

"We knew they had the best anti-tank missiles in the world," Rudoy said. "But we were surprised by the amounts, which at times seemed endless."

Militants were equipped with Kornet and Metis anti-tank missiles supplied by Iran and Syria. The weapons don't produce a large dust ball — or "signature" — when fired, making it hard for tank crews to see who is firing at them.

DOJ_NMG_0063169

Israel's military has asked the government for $2.5 billion to purchase a system capable of detecting and tracking anti-tank missiles and countering them with a launched projectile.

"We need this system for the next war," said Brig. Gen. Moshe Lipel, the top financial adviser to Israel's chief of staff.

The Israeli offensive was triggered by a cross-border attack July 12 during which militants abducted two Israeli reservists.

Israeli attacks began with a massive air campaign, which knocked out Hezbollah's long-range missiles: None was fired at Israel during the 34 days of fighting.

Israeli warplanes were unable to deal with Hezbollah's short-range Katyusha rockets. The Shiite militia was able to fire up to 200 Katyusha rockets a day into Israel.

In response, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ordered ground forces into Lebanon to locate and destroy guerrilla strongholds. According to some military experts, Olmert's decision to send the ground troops into Lebanon came too late into the war.

"It was a mistake from the beginning to use the air force to hunt and destroy the short-range rockets," said retired major general Uri Saguy, a former head of Israeli military intelligence. He said a ground operation was needed from the outset to hunt and destroy the Katyushas.

Some of the Hezbollah rockets were fired from civilian homes and underground bunkers, he said. "There were thousands of them, and it was impossible to find all of them from the air," he said.

Boaz Ganor, director of the Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Israel, said Hezbollah began the war with nearly 15,000 short-range Katyusha rockets and several hundred long-range Iranian-made Zelzals and Fajrs.

Ganor estimates Hezbollah still had 10,000 short-range rockets at the end of the conflict.

The orders the forces received from their commanders in Israel were confusing, Saguy said, and were sometimes changed on an hourly basis. In some cases, brigades on the ground in Lebanon were told to begin advancing and then as they did they received orders telling them to stop.

Israel, Ganor said, should have waited and prepared its forces before invading Lebanon. A planning period of several months, he claimed, could have limited the confusion and lack of clarity in the orders. He said there was no reason to react immediately to the cross-border raid by Hezbollah militants.

"Israel was dragged not ready into this war by the initial military response," Ganor said.

Israel withdrew from Lebanon in 2000 after an 18-year occupation in the south. Hezbollah used the past six years to build a complex network of tunnels and other fortifications in southern Lebanon. Some of these bunkers were found a couple hundred yards from the border with Israel.

Israeli troops, Saguy said, walked into traps Hezbollah had been preparing for six years.

Hezbollah is rearming after Israel lifted the sea and air blockade of Lebanon, allowing the group to get smuggled weapons, some experts say.

"Hezbollah is working to recover its arsenal and will be in several months where it was before the war," Ganor said.

Survivor Of Attack On U.S. Embassy Dies In Syria (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

DAMASCUS, Sept. 13 — The sole survivor of the four-man team that attacked the American embassy here Tuesday died of his wounds without being questioned, Syria's official news agency reported.

The assailant's death left Syrian authorities with only the physical evidence to piece together the origins and motivations of the attack. The country said all four men were Syrian citizens. It gave no other details and both the Syrian government and the United States embassy here declined to comment on the investigation.

No group has yet claimed responsibility for the attack, in which the four men apparently planned to strike both the front and the rear of the embassy compound simultaneously. As three of the men stormed an employee entrance at the rear of the compound, the fourth left a pickup truck laden with improvised explosives at the embassy's front gate. He was wounded while running to the aid of the other attackers, and the explosives in the truck failed to detonate. One Syrian security official died and 13 people were injured in the ensuing gun battle.

Syria's news agency said that the fourth assailant was critically injured and did not respond to any questions before he died. That information appeared to contradict comments from the State Department late Tuesday, which said that the man was cooperating with Syrian authorities.

Syrian officials said Tuesday that they believed Islamic extremists were to blame for the attack.

Syria was quick to emphasize its security forces' role in foiling the assault before the attackers could break into the embassy compound. The country appeared eager to use the incident as an opening for improving Syria's already poor relations with the United States, which have worsened in recent weeks as a result of the Israeli-Lebanese war. Syria is a staunch supporter of Hezbollah, the Shiite militant group whose militia set off the war with a cross-border attack on Israeli soldiers.

Syria's ambassador to Washington, Imad Mostafa, said his government was ready to talk.

"There is a chance to improve these relations because Syria has always believed in dialogue as a means to solving all problems and pending issues," Mr. Mostafa told the official Ath-Thawra newspaper. "The ball is in the American court."

A political analyst in Damascus said today that Washington's past efforts to isolate Syria diplomatically had only hardened the country's resolve. "As long as the Syrian regime feels that its head is on the block, it will play the nasty guy," said the analyst, who asked not to be quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the subject in the country.

He said that Washington had more to gain from political engagement with Damascus.

Meanwhile, the United States embassy remained closed today, an embassy spokesman said. He said it would reopen with all normal services on Thursday. Washington withdrew its ambassador to Syria in early 2005 after the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafik Hariri. The United States believes Syria was behind the killing, and preliminary results of a United Nations investigation have suggested as much.

Many people in Syria say that they expect the United Nations investigator, Serge Brammertz, to conclude that Islamic extremists linked to Al Qaeda were responsible for the assassination. His final report is due by the end of the month.

Syrian Dies Of Wounds After Embassy Raid (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, September 13, 2006

The bold attack on the U.S. Embassy has thrown new light on what President Bashar Assad calls the growing threat in Syria from Islamic extremists. But some critics say the regime is exaggerating the problem for its own political gain.

With questions still unanswered about the assault, the only attacker captured in the gunbattle died from his wounds before police could question him, officials said Wednesday, leaving the investigation's future unclear.

The state-run Syrian Arab News Agency said the dead man and three other gunmen killed during Tuesday's attempt to storm the embassy compound were all Syrian citizens.

Only a few years ago, such attacks were almost unthinkable in Syria, whose secular regime led a tough crackdown on Muslim fundamentalists in 1982 that killed thousands of people in the city of Hama. For that reason, Sunni Muslim extremist groups like al-Qaida despise Assad's regime.

Syrian officials often say they long ago recognized the danger of Muslim radicals and dealt with them — a reference to the assault on Hama.

Syria's four strong security agencies keep a firm grip on the country, with the power to detain suspects without warrants under emergency laws in place since the Baath Party took power in 1963. Membership in the Muslim Brotherhood, which was targeted in Hama, can be punished by execution.

Still, attacks by Muslim extremists and clashes with security forces have become more common the past three years. One of the most serious battles came in June, when anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Defense Ministry in central Damascus in a clash that killed five people.

There was no claim of responsibility for the embassy attack, but suspicion immediately fell on an al-Qaida offshoot called Jund al-Sham, Arabic for Soldiers of Syria, which has been suspected in previous violence.

Syrian officials say the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq turned many Arabs into hard-liners who want to fight America and fueled Islamic extremists who have turned their weapons on the government in Damascus.

"Fanatical groups are present now, in great part thanks to America, which turned Iraq into a reservoir for international terrorism," said Mohammed Habash, head of the Islamic Studies Center in Damascus and a Syrian legislator.

"Now that authorities have crushed the attackers (at the embassy) we might find that an extremist group will hit a government institution in retaliation," he said.

But some critics say the real threat from extremism is hard to judge since Syrian security agencies rarely give information — and suspect the government may be playing up the danger for political reasons.

Human rights activist Haitham Maleh said Syria is a country "with no transparency."

"The government might say that we are being subjected to terrorism and for that reason persecute some groups," said al-Maleh, former head of the Human Rights Association in Syria, the country's oldest non-governmental rights organization.

Dissidents in exile contend Assad's regime exaggerates militant activity in hopes of easing pressure from the United States or providing a pretext to try to reassert influence in neighboring Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0063171

Assad warned earlier this year that al-Qaida militants were finding refuge in Lebanon, suggesting they were taking advantage of the absence of Syrian troops, which withdrew last year under international and Lebanese pressure after a nearly three-decade occupation.

Washington accuses Syria of supporting terrorism because of its backing for the Lebanese Shiite guerrilla group Hezbollah and Palestinian militants, including Hamas.

The United States and the Iraqi government have also accused Syria of not doing enough to stop insurgents crossing its border into Iraq to fight U.S. troops. Syria denies that, saying it is impossible to fully control the long desert border.

Habash said that because of Syria's anti-U.S. stance, al-Qaida and other extremists may not focus as much on Syria.

"It is impossible for any group to defeat the government through violence. Still there might be attacks on Western interests or Syrian security interests," Habash said.

On Wednesday, traffic was normal near the U.S. Embassy, but plainclothes security agents were seen around the compound as well as in the streets leading to it. The street was cleaned but two slightly damaged four-wheel-drive vehicles were still there.

A closed bulletproof door to the embassy and the wall around it were riddled with bullet holes.

Rebels Say They May Abandon Darfur Pact (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

GRAI Commanders from the only rebel group that signed a peace accord in May for Sudan's Darfur region are prepared to resume fighting if African Union peacekeeping troops leave as scheduled at month's end and are not replaced by a United Nations force, according to more than a dozen senior rebel officials interviewed Wednesday.

Rebel commanders predicted that such a resumption of combat would spell the end of Darfur's tattered peace agreement and quickly escalate fighting to an intensity not seen since the early days of the conflict in 2003 and 2004.

Their comments came as the African Union force of 7,000 is preparing to depart and as Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir is vigorously resisting pressure to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force of up to 22,500 to enter the country, threatening to attack them if they try. At a meeting scheduled for Sept. 18, officials of the 53-country African Union are to reconsider their decision to withdraw their soldiers

Abdulrahaman Abdallah, a commander of the rebel group's military police, said that without a strong international force here, "the government will go back to its strategy, which is genocide, and inevitably we will go back to the bush."

Since the fighting began in 2003, war and disease have killed as many as 450,000 people in Darfur and driven more than 2 million from their homes. Sudan's impoverished western flank has become a patchwork of military positions and ragged camps for families displaced by war.

The peace deal, brokered in part by U.S. officials in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, was supposed to end the fighting between the Sudanese government and the three rebel groups active here. But only one group, led by Minni Minnawi, signed. Those that did not complained that the government provided insufficient restitution and that the agreement did not provide a reliable means to enforce its terms.

The government vowed to end the conflict through the use of nearly 30,000 soldiers and police officers, who are gradually augmenting the government-backed militias known as the Janjaweed that have been terrorizing civilians in Darfur.

Since the peace accord was signed, rebel forces allied with Minnawi have been assisting in some government military operations, often providing crucial on-the-ground intelligence, but his commanders are increasingly reluctant to help.

The commanders interviewed Wednesday said they were so angry about recent attacks on civilians, including the bombing of villages by Antonov planes and rocket attacks by Mi-24 helicopter gunships, that they were prepared to abandon the peace deal. They said they would not be swayed even if Minnawi decided to keep his senior job with the government in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum.

His group, while having less political support than the most popular rebel group in Darfur, was widely regarded as the most potent fighting force among the rebels. It remains strong in Darfur's southern and western areas.

"It's not our desire to go back to the bush, but if there is no choice, we will go," said rebel Gen. Ali Marmar, speaking in Graida, a rebel stronghold in South Darfur. Marmar said Minnawi would be replaced if he broke with the will of his commanders: "We have thousands like Minni."

The conflict began with attacks on police and military outposts by mostly non-Arab rebels who claimed discrimination by the Arab-dominated government. At issue are ancient disputes over grazing rights and land claims but, more broadly, the political and economic dispossession of a poor and nearly roadless region the size of Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0063172

The ferocity of the government response provoked an international outcry. The U.S. government and many other observers have labeled it genocide.

Combat has escalated sharply in recent days, with heavy bombing and clashes near the North Darfur town of Kutum and in an area north of El Fasher where, according to African Union reports, government forces sustained heavy losses this week.

The African Union mission has been widely criticized by rebels, civilians and analysts as lethargic. The Janjaweed and government forces have repeatedly broken the cease-fire with impunity, even waving their guns at A.U. troops.

This week, the government seized a tanker full of African Union jet fuel in El Fasher and used it to fill its own military aircraft, African Union sources said, speaking on condition their names not be published.

Investigations of major breaches of the cease-fire, meanwhile, have been stymied. That includes an incident Saturday in which villagers who had been attacked by Janjaweed militiamen two weeks earlier gathered near the ruins of their homes in South Darfur to speak to A.U. investigators set to arrive by helicopter.

But the helicopter turned back because of severe rain, and the Janjaweed attacked again, killing 18 of the survivors of the earlier assault and dispersing as many as 25,000 into a remote southern region far from humanitarian assistance or military protection, rebel leaders here said.

Minnawi complained to top African Union officials about the incident, and the group's cease-fire commission twice scheduled investigative trips to the site of the atrocities, only to cancel them as commission members quarreled over the importance of the journey.

"The African Union is too weak to act," Abdallah said.

Adoma Ahmed Haggar, a rebel field commander based here, said, "There are no signs of peace on the ground. The A.U. is not able. Our only hope is pinned on the United Nations."

The U.N. Security Council approved the peacekeeping force for Darfur on Aug. 31, and intensive diplomatic pressure continues from the United States and other governments to persuade the Sudanese government to allow the force to enter the region.

Sudanese officials have called the U.N. proposal a violation of national sovereignty and an impediment to peace. Many outside analysts contend that the government wants to remove all outside observers from Darfur so it can pursue a military solution, including stepped-up attacks on civilians in areas where the rebels have popular support.

The government has also issued new restrictions against aid groups and journalists. Many humanitarian organizations have curbed their operations in the face of rising violence that has led to the deaths of 12 aid workers since the peace deal was signed. The U.N. World Food Program has reported that 355,000 residents of Darfur are going without food because it is not safe to reach them.

Rebel commanders say they will not tolerate such attacks and deprivations much longer. Minnawi's group has about 50 senior commanders. Asked how many would resume fighting if an effective international force did not arrive soon, Marmar said, "All of them."

California Vs. Sudan (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 14, 2006

THE GOONS WHO RUN SUDAN have proved deaf to appeals from the Western world that they stop slaughtering tribespeople in Darfur. The only change in attitude produced by years of diplomacy has been a shift from sullen foot-dragging to open defiance. The best response, short of intervention, is to hit them harder in a place that will really hurt: their wallets. The state of California is poised to do just that.

On Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk is a bill patterned on a divestment program approved this year by the University of California. It directs the boards of the two large state retirement funds to identify companies in their investment portfolios that do significant business with the government of Sudan or sell it the weapons used to cut a bloody swath through Darfur. The boards then must notify these companies that they have 90 days to end their involvement with Sudan. If they don't, or fail to respond, the pension funds must divest.

Five states have passed similar divestment plans, two more have nonbinding resolutions and about 15 others have legislation pending. Not all have handled the matter well. First off the divestment block was Illinois, which passed an absurdly broad law forbidding state investment in any company with ties to Sudan, no matter how remote. The law is so all-encompassing that it applies to U.S. companies such as Coca-Cola and Xerox, which have no direct business with Sudan. (In fact, Americans have been forbidden to do business directly with Sudan since 1997.)

California's AB 2941 avoids the Illinois law's pitfalls. It applies only to those companies identified as the worst offenders, all of which are foreign — mainly Chinese — and are well known to have deep financial ties to Khartoum while bringing little benefit to the Sudanese people.

DOJ_NMG_0063173

The United Nations has been powerless to halt a government-sponsored program of murder and rape in Darfur that President Bush has rightly labeled genocide. Although the Security Council on Aug. 31 approved a resolution calling for a U.N. peacekeeping force for Darfur, it can't be deployed without permission from the Sudanese government, which refuses to grant it. The crisis is coming to a head because the only peacekeeping force now in the country — 7,000 troops from the African Union — will see its mandate expire at the end of this month.

It's unknown how much money California stands to divest under AB 2941, but it's thought to be in the hundreds of millions of dollars. That might be enough to make Khartoum, and the Chinese interests that do business there, stand up and take notice.

Paulson Calls On China To Reform Economy (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, September 13, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson urged China to undertake a broad range of economic reforms and said the country's failure to overhaul its currency system could raise the threat of a protectionist backlash.

But Paulson let it be known that the Bush administration would firmly oppose any efforts by Congress to erect trade barriers in response to America's large and growing trade deficit with China, which last year hit a record $202 billion.

"Protectionist policies do not work and the collateral damage from these policies is high," he said Wednesday in a speech in Treasury's ornate Cash Room. "We will not heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism."

Paulson sought to lower expectations that he will achieve any major breakthroughs when he visits Beijing for two days of talks with Chinese officials next week.

While former Treasury Secretary John Snow, Paulson's predecessor, pursued an increasingly tough line that China needed to move more quickly on the currency issue, Paulson, who took over from Snow in July, adopted a less confrontational approach.

He mentioned the currency issue as one of a number of economic reforms that China needed to pursue along with modernizing its farm economy, opening up its financial system and pursuing domestic-led growth rather than relying so much on exports.

"These changes will help create the millions of jobs that China needs to generate annually and will help create markets for U.S. exports of goods and services," Paulson said.

Analysts said they believed Paulson, who gained his expertise on China from the 70 trips he made to the country as head of investment giant Goldman Sachs, was dialing down the rhetoric in hopes of achieving better results.

"The Chinese never want to be in a position where they are seen as moving in response to external pressure," said Nicholas Lardy, a China expert at the Institute for International Economics.

Paulson sought to put the need for a more flexible currency in the context of a move that would help the Chinese government prevent a "boom and bust" economic cycle in its own country as well as dampening protectionist pressures around the world.

"To be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition," Paulson said.

Democratic critics have charged the administration has not done enough to deal with the soaring trade deficits, which they blame as a major contributing factor in the loss of nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs since President Bush took office.

One bill being pushed by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., would impose 27.5 percent tariffs on all Chinese imports unless China does more to allow its currency to rise in value against the dollar as a way of boosting U.S. exports to China and reducing Chinese imports to this country.

Schumer said that he was not concerned by Paulson's apparent change of tone, saying he had been effective at Goldman Sachs in dealing with the Chinese.

"But if he comes up empty-handed, we will be disappointed," Schumer said, saying he still intended to push for a vote on his legislation by the end of this month if there is not more movement on the currency issue.

American manufacturers contend that China's currency is undervalued by as much as 40 percent against the dollar, making Chinese goods cheaper in the United States and American products more expensive in China.

Frank Vargo, vice president for international affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers, said he was not worried that Paulson was downgrading the currency issue.

"Paulson is putting his own style on this," Vargo said. "His way is not to get out a big baseball bat and start beating them."

To underscore the importance of the Beijing talks, Paulson will be accompanied by Allan Hubbard, chairman of President Bush's National Economic Council.

DOJ_NMG_0063174

Treasury officials said that Paulson spent the past several weeks working on the speech, including receiving briefings from China experts from both parties and holding a number of staff meetings at his home.

Paulson said the United States has nothing to fear from China's emergence as a global economic power, one that is expected to overtake the United States as the world's largest economy at some point in the coming decades.

He said the message he will deliver next week will be, "We want you to succeed."

He will travel to Beijing for talks on Thursday and Friday after first attending the annual meetings of the 184-nation International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Singapore.

Paulson Says China Hurts Itself With Economic Policies (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — In the administration's toughest warning yet to China on economic issues, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said on Wednesday that Chinese leaders were imperiling their nation's future by engaging in policies that Americans and others see as unfair.

Speaking as he prepared for his first trip to Beijing since taking office this summer, and one day after China's monthly trade surplus set another record, Mr. Paulson said that the United States had "a huge stake in a prosperous, stable China" and that "we are not afraid of Chinese competition."

But he used forceful language in saying that China had kept the value of its currency artificially low in relation to the dollar, which a growing number of economic analysts say is making China's exports cheaper and its imports more expensive.

Mr. Paulson also repeated longstanding administration demands for China to loosen regulations and controls on foreign investment and the activities of its banks.

"Maintaining and relying on an overly rigid exchange rate and outdated administrative controls increases the risk of boom and bust cycles," Mr. Paulson said. Also, he added, China's "currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

Mr. Paulson did not say so, but aides said he was referring to legislation that would place tariffs on imports from China if its government did not act to let the yuan rise in relation to the dollar.

The sponsors of the measure, Senators Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, have held back pending Mr. Paulson's trip. But they vow to press for its passage this fall if Mr. Paulson fails to get action from the Chinese.

Treasury officials say that in his few months as secretary, Mr. Paulson, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs who made scores of trips to China as a business executive, has been surprised by the growing protectionist sentiment in Congress toward China, abetted by anti-Chinese sentiment on several issues.

Leaders of both political parties accuse China of not cooperating on American efforts to prevent North Korea and Iran from amassing nuclear weapons and to stop the civil war in Darfur. The administration has also deplored China's military buildup.

Mr. Paulson's speech was unusual for a Treasury secretary in that it embodied an extensive analysis of China's economic policies and structure. He repeatedly praised China for liberalizing its economy even as he implored its leadership to do more.

Mr. Paulson said he learned in 32 years at Goldman Sachs that "those nations that reform their economies and open themselves to competition benefit their citizens greatly" and "have better jobs, improved living standards and greater opportunity."

But he said that protectionist sentiment was preventing China from doing more to open itself up to competition, and was in turn breeding protectionist sentiment in America.

"Ironically," he said, "this protectionist sentiment comes from many quarters in those nations — including in the United States and China — which have benefited the most from the economic growth generated by global competition."

Mr. Paulson said the United States would not "heed the siren songs of protectionism and isolationism," but that China had to do its part by changing its heavily subsidized industries and farms, allowing capital to flow freely and guiding Chinese to spend more and save less — a step that economists say would increase imports.

Before going to China, Mr. Paulson plans a stop in Singapore to meet with the world's finance ministers and to press for giving China more of a voice in the international agency that oversees the global economy and rescues countries whose economies collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0063175

The administration's proposal to expand the role of China and other developing countries at the agency, the International Monetary Fund, has run into some difficulties. Brazil, India, Indonesia and some other countries oppose the change out of fear of being left out.

The administration needs 85 percent of the votes, which are assigned in a complex quota system to 184 countries, to have the change enacted at the fund. Treasury officials say there are some "rumbles" of protest but they predict success.

Although Mr. Paulson was in Vietnam last weekend for a meeting of Asia-Pacific nations, the trip to Singapore and China represents what some officials call his debut on the international scene. Accordingly, it was notable that he began the trip with a warning.

"I believe that if China doesn't move quickly to continue reforming its economy," he said, "it will face a backlash from other economic stakeholders. This backlash would not benefit any of us."

In an interview after his 35-minute speech, Mr. Paulson cautioned against expectations that his trip to China would produce immediate results.

The best policy in advance of this trip, he said, was to "diminish expectations" for any quick move by China to allow the value of its currency to appreciate.

"I believe that most things that are worthwhile take a period of time," Mr. Paulson said.

It's Showtime For Paulson In Meetings With Chinese (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 14, 2006

Can the Bush administration's new Treasury secretary pull off a feat in China that eluded his predecessor -- and save American jobs in the process?

Henry M. Paulson Jr., leaves today on a trip to Asia that is to include his first visit to China since taking the helm in July. Hopes are high, in Congress and in the business world, that the former Wall Street titan can use his powers of persuasion to secure changes in Chinese policies that critics view as unfair.

U.S.-China economic relations is an area where Paulson seeks to make an impact, based on his long experience doing business with the Chinese when he headed the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs.

His predecessor, John W. Snow, tried and largely failed to get China to adjust the value of its currency enough to help American manufacturers. Many members of Congress, U.S. business executives and economists have long complained that the Chinese yuan is kept at an artificially low level -- about 8 per dollar -- that makes the nation's exports too cheap, to the detriment of American workers in competing industries.

The first big rollout of Paulson's message to the Chinese came yesterday in a speech he delivered amid much pomp in the Treasury's ornate Cash Room.

In substantive terms, his remarks echoed the themes that Snow used to stress. While vowing to resist protectionism, he exhorted China to embrace market-oriented policies, an approach he said was in China's interest as well as that of the United States and the global economy.

"When I visit China in coming days I will discuss these issues with the Chinese leadership, and I will use a Chinese saying indicating that it is for the good of both of our economies that they undertake these changes," he said. "I will say . . . 'We want you to succeed,' " attempting the phrase in Chinese.

Specifically, he said, Beijing must take steps to combat piracy of patented products, shift its economy away from dependence on exports and toward greater consumer spending, and open its financial system to foreign competition. As for the currency issue, he called it one of "several critical, immediate challenges" that China faces.

"Maintaining and relying on an overly rigid exchange rate and outdated administrative controls increases the risk of boom-and-bust cycles," he said. "Also to be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

None of that was a departure from Snow's arguments, Treasury officials acknowledged. But they cited one difference: The speaker was Paulson, who boasts close ties with Chinese leaders and deep knowledge of the country's financial system, not Snow, the former railroad executive reputed to have had little clout at the White House.

"You're right, we have said in the past that these reforms are in China's interest," a senior Treasury official said at a briefing for reporters. "But that may be interpreted one way when it comes from someone who is relatively unfamiliar to them. Having Hank Paulson say to them, 'These things are in your interest' carries a different level of meaning to the Chinese." The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of concern for keeping the focus on Paulson's comments.

Asked whether this meant the Chinese would be more likely to act, another senior official said: "Relationships matter, and he matters. I don't think tomorrow the situation is going to change. But to have someone of his experience and stature make the case -- it will make a difference."

The Chinese are known for brushing off demands for change from outsiders and viewing themselves as the best judges of their own interests. Few experts believe China will change its currency policy during Paulson's trip or even soon after, for fear of appearing to cave to foreign pressure. But even some of the most prominent agitators for a higher yuan said they were pleased with the Treasury chief's approach.

"I can't second-guess him. He knows everybody in China; they trust him," said Franklin J. Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers. "He has an inside track that his predecessors did not."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), the ranking minority member on the House Ways and Means Committee, issued a laudatory press release on the speech with the headline, "Past experience leaves Paulson well-positioned for results on currency reform."

Paulson also drew encouraging words from Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who has co-sponsored legislation that would impose punitive tariffs on Chinese goods if Beijing fails to let the yuan rise significantly. The Treasury chief has maintained the department's staunch opposition to Schumer's bill. But the threat of congressional passage has helped prod the Chinese toward concessions, some analysts assert.

"When I spoke to Hank Paulson last night, we discussed how important his trip is in the fight to get China to play fair," Schumer said in a statement. "Today in his speech, he said if China does not move, it does so at its own peril. No truer words were spoken. I hope the Chinese were listening."

Paulson Urges Beijing To Reform (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson gave a forceful defense of the benefits of trade even as he issued a tough warning to China, the nation's most controversial trading partner, that it faced “peril” unless it enacted further economic reforms.

Paulson, who visited China more than 70 times while at the helm of Goldman Sachs, is making that country a major focus of his Treasury Department tenure. He praised China for more than a quarter century of ambitious reform, saying it “deserved recognition for what it has become.”

But in a passage that won quick praise from China's critics, he warned Beijing that keeping its currency virtually fixed in value against the U.S. dollar invites a political backlash. “To be underestimated only at China's own peril is the fact that their currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition,” he said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., one of the authors of legislation that would slap punitive tariffs on Chinese imports unless the yuan is revalued, applauded Paulson's remarks. “That's pretty strong stuff. That made us feel good,” he said in a brief telephone interview.

Paulson spoke before his departure for a week-long Asia sojourn. He will stop first in Singapore for meetings with finance ministers from the G-7 nations and the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Then, on Tuesday, he is scheduled to fly to China for three days of talks with Chinese leaders.

Much of Paulson's address Wednesday could only have been welcomed by the Chinese, who explain their failure to more quickly adjust currency policy by citing the danger of undermining job growth.

“The tasks faced by Beijing are so daunting that the biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the U.S., but that China won't move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth and to address the very serious problems facing the nation,” Paulson said.

Paulson rejected the idea that China, now growing at an annual rate of more than 10%, can speed ahead indefinitely. The Chinese economy, stuck midway between central planning and the market, is “becoming increasingly difficult to manage,” he said.

But, Paulson said, further economic reform is in China's interest because it would encourage more sustainable growth and defuse protectionist sentiment in the United States. Modernizing the financial sector would let the market, not government officials, steer capital to its most productive use. And spurring domestic consumption would increase Chinese consumers' appetite for imports, helping whittle the politically combustible U.S. trade deficit.

Paulson Sets Out New China Strategy (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0063177

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, September 14, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, on Wednesday laid out the framework for a comprehensive new strategy towards China, emphasising the need to take a "generational" view of the US-China relationship.

In an interview, Mr Paulson told the Financial Times he wanted to "strike a balance" between tackling pressing short-term issues while maintaining a strategic perspective on China's emergence as a leading player in the global economy. "We have a common interest," he said, arguing that many of the steps the US wanted China to take were in its own best interest.

The interview followed a landmark speech by the former Goldman Sachs chairman ahead of his first trip to China as Treasury secretary, in which he said he would tell his counterparts in Beijing: "We want you to succeed."

Mr Paulson said: "The United States has a huge stake in a prosperous, stable China – a China able and willing to play its part as a global economic leader." He said the US and China shared areas of economic interest, highlighting energy and the environment as two specific areas where the two nations should work together.

He added that the US looked to China to be its "co-operative partner" in reviving the Doha trade talks. Officials said Mr Paulson would push hard on Doha in meetings with world finance ministers in Singapore later this week.

"The biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the US but that China will not move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth," Mr Paulson declared. The Treasury secretary told the FT: "I wanted to put the relationship and these economic issues in a longer-term focus. But I also needed to emphasise how important certain steps were going to be in the short term."

For example, he said, on the currency front "the intermediate-term viewpoint is that it is very, very important to open up their capital markets, to have healthy competition within the domestic financial system, so they can have a currency that is freely tradeable".

But he added: "They also need to show more flexibility in the short term."

His speech did not dwell on the currency as a standalone issue, framing it as part of a necessary shift towards more market-based management of China's economy. But Mr Paulson warned the Beijing authorities that they underestimated "at China's own peril" the extent to which the currency was "viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition".

He called on China to press ahead with liberalisation across a broad front, including financial sector reform, fiscal and regulatory policies to reduce excess savings, market-based macroeconomic management and intellectual property rights. "We are taking a comprehensive approach," he said. "We are collectively pulling it together." Mr Paulson said China had become a lightning rod for fears about globalisation, but insisted: "This is manageable."

In his speech, Mr Paulson praised China's record of economic reform, and said China already "deserves to be recognised as a leader". This, he said, was why the US backed plans to give China and other emerging markets a much bigger say in the International Monetary Fund.

But Mr Paulson said: "With leadership comes responsibility." He urged China to abide by the "spirit and letter" of the rules of the IMF and promote free trade. And he suggested these responsibilities "go beyond the economic arena" to include human rights and non-proliferation. The speech positions Mr Paulson in the role of honest broker between China and its critics in Congress. He characterised the fundamental division as not one between the US and China, but between liberalisers in both the US and China, and their protectionist opponents.

He defended open markets, saying: "Globalisation and interdependence are here to stay. No nation can turn back the clock." But he warned: "If China does not move quickly to continue reforming its economy it will face a backlash from other international economic stakeholders."

Mr Paulson will stop en route to Beijing in Hangzhou to meet Zhejiang provincial party secretary Xi Jingping. US officials said Mr Paulson regarded Mr Xi as a rising star of Chinese politics.

Paulson Takes China To Task Over Its Energy Use, Green Record (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's speech on the global economy yesterday drew notice for its breadth as well as the explicit concern Mr. Paulson expressed about China's energy consumption and its environmental record.

Mr. Paulson, an environmentalist and bird-watcher, focused much of his 40-minute speech on the benefits of globalization and the need for Chinese economic reforms, but devoted several minutes to China's "severe environmental hazards" and the need for that country, along with the U.S., to reduce dependence on foreign oil from unstable regions.

"China's severe environmental hazards not only are harming the health of its people and ecosystems, they are also harming China's long-term economic potential," he said, a week before heading to China. "Economic development without regard for environmental protection is not sustainable."

While those comments drew praise, some observers noted that Mr. Paulson didn't offer any suggestions for what the U.S. should be doing to bolster environmental protection. "He talked about what China needs to do for the environment, which is certainly a horrendous problem, but he was silent on what the U.S. needs to do," said Kenneth Rogoff, an international economist at Harvard University and occasional economic adviser to Republicans. "A problem that the U.S. has had in its dealings with China is this position of 'We're doing everything perfectly, and you need to be more like us,' and that's true in many ways. But maybe the Chinese don't see it that way."

Fred Krupp, president of the advocacy group Environmental Defense, added: "Until the U.S. agrees to cap its own greenhouse-gas emissions, it's hard to imagine that we have much equity to lecture the Chinese." Although China's air-pollution problems are legendary, Mr. Krupp noted that in some areas -- such as energy-efficiency requirements for cars -- China has tougher standards than the U.S. "If the United States would adopt energy-efficiency standards like China, that would be a big advance for us."

Still, the fact that Mr. Paulson spent several minutes talking about the environment -- and that he brought it up even before delving into China's currency -- suggested that he plans to take an active role in international issues beyond finance and economics narrowly defined. "This makes it clear that he's taking lead on a broader agenda," said Daniel Rosen, of China Strategic Advisory, a consulting firm. "He has a longtime personal commitment to the topic of environmental stewardship that he is not going to be shy about bringing to the table."

The speech, delivered in the Treasury Department's historic Cash Room to academics, ambassadors, politicians and business representatives, didn't have much effect on financial markets -- and that almost certainly was what Mr. Paulson and his aides had hoped. While Mr. Paulson didn't talk specifically about the U.S. dollar, he reiterated the administration's position that China needs a more flexible currency and said China's "currency exchange rate is increasingly being viewed by their critics as a symbol of unfair competition."

One of the strongest critics of China's currency, Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.), said Mr. Paulson needs to achieve tangible results on the yuan. "If he comes back empty-handed, we'll be deeply disappointed," said Mr. Schumer, who has proposed a tariff on Chinese imports in response to what he believes is a deliberate attempt by China to increase exports by keeping its currency low. "It's good to care about the Chinese economy as a whole.... It's equally important that they understand their responsibility."

Democratic Rep. Sander Levin of Michigan, a state that has been hard hit by manufacturing-job losses, added that while Mr. Paulson is correct in wanting a stronger U.S. relationship with China, "he also needs to make clear that the inflexible currency has created unfair competition."

Separately, Mr. Paulson has tapped Deborah Lehr, president of China consulting firm Stonebridge Capital, to join him at Treasury where she will personally advise him on China issues. Ms. Lehr is an economist who served as a director of Asian affairs at the National Security Council.

Bombs Fail To Incite As Indian Imams Urge Calm (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, September 14, 2006

NEW DELHI

The smell of explosives was still lingering in the air when the discussion began. Malegaon's streets had just been seared by three bombs that killed at least 30 people, and as the crowds began to seethe with anger, the city's most revered Muslim leaders gathered to decide what to do.

There was little question about the purpose of last week's attack: Malegaon is one of India's few Muslim-majority cities, and the bombs were planted near a mosque on a holy day when thousands of worshipers would come to pray.

Yet even before police arrived, the imams had made a choice. They used the loudspeakers of their mosques to spread a blanket of audible calm over the frayed city, imploring patience and forbearance. And for the second time in two months, a bombing apparently designed to ignite Hindu-Muslim riots failed.

For a nation whose past has lurched from one riot to another, the response to this summer's bombings in Malegaon and Mumbai (Bombay) is no small shift, suggesting that - at least for the moment - the forces of calm are eclipsing those that would sow chaos.

The balance is a tenuous one at best, and experts do not suggest that India has put its violent past behind it. Even Wednesday, police found an unexploded bomb in Malegaon, though it was not yet clear whether the device was new or had simply failed to go off in the initial attack. But some say that an array of factors - from imams voicing reason in Malegaon to a less divisive political discourse nationwide - has helped India break its cycle of revenge violence in recent years.

"With all these things, the timing has to be right," says Dipankar Gupta, a sociologist at Jawaharlal Nehru University in New Delhi. For anger to kindle into a riot, he adds, "all the pieces have to fit."

Those pieces have not fallen into place since the Gujarat riots of 2002, when more than 1,000 Muslims were killed in response to an attack on a trainload of Hindu religious campaigners. The nationwide revulsion at the atrocities committed there has partly laid the groundwork for today's more inclusive political tone, some say. An improved political climate

Though the extremist elements of the Hindu right are still a potent force in India, "the political climate is much more conducive to tolerance," says Teesta Setalvad, editor of the magazine Communalism Combat.

In the past year alone, terrorists aiming to weaken and divide India have bombed a Hindu temple in Varanasi and preparations for a Hindu festival in New Delhi. The lack of riots points to the fact that, for the time being, the political calculus has changed.

"As much as people like to make out that riots are spontaneous, they are rarely spontaneous," says Ms. Setalvad, agreeing with several other experts. "The parties responsible for hatemongering are on a downward slide." Riots throughout Indian history

In the past, riots have been common enough to become waymarks of Indian history. The birth of India in 1947 brought its separation from Pakistan - and the related riots that killed at least 2 million Indians and Pakistanis. After former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was assassinated by her Sikh bodyguards in 1984, more than 3,000 Sikhs were killed in Delhi alone, according to a government inquiry.

More recently, Mumbai descended into riots in 1992 after the destruction of a Muslim mosque. In 1993, bombs rocked the city, killing 257 people, in an attack that some say was tied to the rioting. An Indian court is expected to deliver sentences Thursday on the first four people to be convicted in the bombing.

Riots also broke out in Malegaon in 2001 after anti-US protests got out of hand.

Now, these two cities in the state of Maharashtra are again linked, with law-enforcement officials hinting that the same terrorists responsible for the Mumbai bombing in July have simply changed their tactics: Now they are targeting Muslims to see if they can provoke a response.

If true, the claim suggests that Muslim terrorists are now willing to attack fellow Muslims in an attempt to destabilize India. With an estimated 145 million Muslims, India is home to the world's third-largest Muslim population.

For his part, Abdul Rehman simply wants those responsible caught - whether Hindu or Muslim.

His father, Maulana Abdul Bari, is the imam of the Hamidiya Mosque that was attacked last weekend in Malegaon. Mr. Rehman watched as the throngs outside seemed to be spiraling toward anarchy. "The situation was out of control," he says. "The people wanted to know ... what the police was doing. This is why they were angry." Tense situation calmed

Indeed, immediately after the bombing, there were several reports of attacks against policemen. Malegaon, it seemed, needed only the smallest spark to ignite. Says Rehman: "If the police had done something [aggressive], then the crowds would have been provoked."

That was when his father took to the mosque's loudspeaker.

"The Ulema [Muslim elders] said, 'The police are conducting their investigation,' " Rehman recalls.

" 'Let the ... investigating team do their job, and after they do their work, we'll certainly put pressure on them to give their report."

It was a decisive moment, and Malegaon's religious leaders - including Mufti Mohammed Ismail, the president of the Ulema council of Malegaon - have won praise for their part in keeping the peace so far, though the situation is still tense.

"The religious leaders in Malegaon played a moderating role," says Maj. Gen. Dipankar Banerjee (ret.), director of the Institute of Peace and Conflict Studies in New Delhi. Indians seeing through the tactic

Yet he also suggests that the Indian people have grown wise to the terrorists' aims. "Because we see this again and again, people begin to see through it," says General Banerjee. "If we respond in a manner that the terrorists are trying to encourage, then we are playing into their hands."

Like many others, Banerjee is wary of making too much of the recent calm. "One cannot take it as a trend," he says. "One must be careful."

But perhaps it is an opportunity for all Indians to examine the thinking that often divides them. "What this gives us is a moment toforge ahead on many issues," says Setalvad. "It is a moment of deep introspection."

Blair Blasts Anti-American 'Madness' (AFP)

AFP, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063180

British Prime Minister Tony Blair blasted his fellow European politicians for their anti-American "madness" in dangerous times as he urged a complete strategy rethink to defeat extremism.

None of the world's most pressing problems could be fixed "or even contemplated" without US involvement, he wrote in a 37-page document spelling out the challenges facing the world and his answers for dealing with them.

He urged the international community to unite around a shared set of values, tackling climate change and trade justice as well as extremist terrorism in the pamphlet "A Global Alliance For Global Values" for the Foreign Policy Centre, a Blairite think tank.

"The strain of, frankly, anti-American feeling in parts of European politics is madness when set against the long-term interests of the world we believe in," Blair wrote.

"The danger with America today is not that they are too much involved. The danger is if they decide to pull up the drawbridge and disengage.

"We need them involved. We want them engaged. The reality is that none of the problems that press in on us can be resolved or even contemplated without them."

Calling for a global policy overhaul, Blair appealed for an alliance of moderates from all religions in order to defeat extremists and build a future where different societies could live in harmony.

"The situation we face is indeed war, but of a completely unconventional kind. And it can't be won in a conventional way. We will not win the battle against global extremism unless we win it at the level of values as much as force.

"Doing this requires us to change dramatically the focus of our policy. We must commit ourselves to a complete renaissance of our strategy to defeat those that threaten us.

"A great danger is that global politics divides into 'hard' and 'soft': the 'hard' get after the terrorists; the 'soft' campaign against poverty. That divide is dangerous because interdependence makes all these issues just that: interdependent," Blair wrote.

"The answer to terrorism is the universal application of global values. The answer to poverty is the same. That is why the struggle for global values has to be applied not selectively, but to the whole global agenda."

On resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Blair said: "Nothing else is more important to the success of our foreign policy."

Moderates are not succeeding in conquering the challenges facing them because they are not being bold, consistent and thorough enough in fighting for their values, Blair argued.

He wrote: "This is the moment for reconciliation in the international community around this agenda. It needs passion as well as policy. We are engaged in a struggle which will determine our collective future.

"It is one which, together, we can and must win."

Honoring The 'Iron Lady' (WT)

By Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

The Washington Times, September 14, 2006

On Sept. 12 the "Iron Lady," Margaret Thatcher was honored in the U.S. as she announced the establishment of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, to be administered in the United States by the Heritage Foundation.

During her administration, then-Prime Minister Thatcher and President Ronald Reagan led the free world to vanquish the tyranny of our Cold War enemies. Establishment of the Thatcher Center in the U.S. is an outstanding occasion to reflect on how together the United States, Britain and our freedom-loving allies defeated a common enemy -- an evil empire that threatened our nation's safety and global security and sought to replace freedom and democracy with tyranny and oppression.

In doing so, we can gain a better understanding of the nature of the threat we face today and the commitment that is necessary in our current struggle against Islamic fascism.

It is difficult to derive anything positive from the destruction wreaked on New York and Washington five years ago by adherents of radical Islam. But past experiences often give wisdom for meeting future challenges.

The thwarting of another unspeakable plot last month by British antiterrorism officials in collaboration with our own U.S. intelligence is evidence that allied forces have the capacity to connect the dots to distill some of the important lessons of the September 11 tragedy.

Assimilating seemingly disparate chains of events, wherever they occur, is our best defense against the transnational enemy against whom we fight. This process, both in Britain and in the United States, was driven by the events of September 11, and the July 7 bombings in London. Just as both nations faced and defeated common enemies in the global conflicts of the last century, so too will we prevail together in the fight against extremism.

So, what are these lessons learned for the United States, for Britain, and for all of those who stand with us against Islamofascism? First, the victory over terrorism that resulted in the foiling of last month's plot to blow up commercial airliners between the United Kingdom and the United States is the supreme example of connecting the dots. Joint intelligence resulting from the synthesis of multi-sourced data and intelligence sharing on both sides of the Atlantic, along with the exemplary skill of British officials, impeded agents of extremism from carrying out a subsequent catastrophic mission.

Second, certainly in the United States and Britain, and with hope that eventually continental Europe will follow suit, there is a realization that threats do not come exclusively from abroad, but that, in the implementation of the jihadist agenda, the threats can come from within and are home grown.

The tentacles of Islamic extremism have slithered unnoticed into our own communities where apprentice suicide bombers train domestically to fly planes and make explosives. At the same time, carnage was being spread by extremists in far-away places in East Asia and Africa, but we did not feel its impact directly. Horrific and regrettable, the September 11 attacks on our nation were a necessary wake-up call alerting us to the nature and reach of the enemy that seeks our destruction and world domination. The response required an intertwining of foreign and domestic policies here in the United States and a similar response in the U.K. that are proving effective in making us safer.

Third, we are now better informed about the true components of our borderless enemy: extremist Muslim fanaticism and its national and organizational components: These include, among others, Iran, Syria, the Taliban, Hezbollah and Hamas. Those who say this is a war between the Arab world and the West get it wrong, for they ignore the many Muslims and moderate Middle East nations who abhor Islamist extremism as much as the United States, Britain and our other Western allies.

As such, our approach has not focused on short-term goals of removing the immediate threat but fomenting freedom and promoting democracy over despotism.

Critics will say we are trying to impose our way of life where it is not welcome. These naysayers should reflect for a moment that no human being, no matter what system he has grown up under, prefers autocracy to liberty. Misguidedly, many in Britain, who are quick to blame Prime Minister Tony Blair, join their voices with the anti-U.S.-apologist crowd.

What will it take for the world to believe that one cannot appease or negotiate with these Islamist extremists or their state sponsors, those fanatics who scream "Death to America" and "Bomb the U.K.", who threaten to wipe entire countries off the map and who incite others to jihad against all those who refuse to bow to their ideology of hatred?

What will it take for all freedom-loving nations to undertake the necessary sacrifices, to join forces and to focus on defeating this enemy? Lady Thatcher recently said in a statement released during her visit accompanying President Bush and the first lady at the September 11 remembrance ceremony: "That heinous attack on America was an attack on us all." Indeed, we are bound together by the extremists' hate of our noble values.

We must be encouraged by and continue to learn from the successes with which we have collaboratively thwarted events like the foiled air plot, and must not waiver in our collective mission to overcome the fanatics. Our very survival depends on it.

Wolfowitz Corruption Drive Rattles World Bank (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 — In his first 15 months as president of the World Bank, Paul D. Wolfowitz has made the fight against corruption in poor countries a hallmark issue, waging an aggressive campaign that has led to the suspension of hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and contracts to nations including India, Chad, Kenya, Congo, Ethiopia and Bangladesh.

It is a new incarnation for Mr. Wolfowitz, a neoconservative intellectual who was a primary architect of the Iraq war during four years as deputy secretary of defense.

At the World Bank, Mr. Wolfowitz, 62, has maintained an assertive but soft-spoken style, saying recently that the bank's mission was "to send children to school, to help mothers be healthier, to provide jobs for poor people — not to have resources siphoned off into the hands of the corrupt and greedy."

In recent months, however, his campaign has run into a host of critics, both at the bank and among financial officials outside the United States, who say that developing countries are being threatened with arbitrary punishment in a way that jeopardizes the bank's longtime mission to reduce poverty.

Few here at the World Bank dispute the idea that corruption is a serious problem, but the rift over Mr. Wolfowitz's approach has grown deep and bitter, according to more than a dozen bank officials interviewed recently.

The backlash at the bank against Mr. Wolfowitz's approach centers not on his intentions or goals, but on a widespread fear that countries will be categorized in the future as corrupt or not corrupt, and that lending will be shut off in a selective way.

"Anticorruption efforts are an essential part of development finance," said Roberto Dañino, a senior vice president of the bank until early this year. "But getting rid of corruption is not a silver bullet. The bank should not overemphasize its anticorruption agenda at the expense of other policies required for development."

Mr. Wolfowitz acknowledges that his decisions to suspend or delay loans, contracts and debt relief funds for many countries have provoked outcries, but he says that in almost every case, the funds were restored after safeguards were set up.

He has begun firing back at the critics at internal meetings and in public statements. He notes, for example, that the bank's lending under his leadership actually rose slightly last year, to nearly $23 billion.

Mr. Wolfowitz says he has tried to rebut what he calls the myth that combating fraud is "somehow at odds with development or becomes an excuse not to provide assistance."

While no one knows how much of the bank's resources have been improperly diverted, informal estimates range from 10 percent to the 25 percent that Mr. Wolfowitz says went to corrupt cronies and family members of Indonesia's leadership in the 1990's.

During the Reagan administration, Mr. Wolfowitz served as assistant secretary of state for East Asia, and, in the Clinton years, as dean of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

Some bank officials say that the widespread concern about Mr. Wolfowitz's approach reflects lingering doubts among many international aid specialists about his selection for the bank post by President Bush.

The doubts center on Mr. Wolfowitz's role as a leading advocate of the American invasion of Iraq, with many critics contending that his zeal on corruption reminds them of what they say was his messianic but unrealistic faith that installing democracy by force in Iraq, and by other means through the Middle East, would bring stability to the region.

The criticism has been especially sharp among Europeans at the bank, where many officials say that judgments about what constitutes "good governance" could rupture the bank's delicate relationships with aid recipients, especially if the judgments are based on information gathered from dissidents and other critics in those countries.

"We must not use corruption as an excuse for a massive withdrawal of our help," a senior French finance official involved in discussions with the bank said. The official was among many who agreed to discuss the internal debate only on condition of anonymity.

In recent months, Mr. Wolfowitz and his aides have been negotiating with skeptical members of the bank's board of 24 executive directors from around the world on guidelines for handling corruption issues. Several of the meetings have been contentious, participants say.

This week, the board forwarded a draft of the guidelines and policies for approval by the world's finance ministers at the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which begins Thursday in Singapore. But many officials said they expected the arguments to continue there and into the future.

Several longtime bank officials say they cannot remember when board members wrangled over the wording of a policy paper with a bank president. At recent meetings, directors demanded that Mr. Wolfowitz agree to a greater role for the board in any future decisions on cutting off aid.

In addition, members forced the deletion of language suggesting that the United Nations' goal of reducing world poverty 50 percent by 2015 would have to take second place to the bank's drive against corruption.

Still, Britain and other European and developing countries remain skeptical on what may happen when the document is approved, bank officials said.

"The bank," a board member said, "should not become a world policeman pointing its moral finger and conditioning everything on whether or not a country is believed to be corrupt. The more the bank goes beyond its old mandate of reducing poverty, the more problems will come up."

In an interview, Mr. Wolfowitz acknowledged that the idea of drafting a paper on bank corruption policies had been urged on him out of fear that he would punish countries without consulting the board. He said he did not take the criticism as personally directed at him or his record on Iraq.

"I think some of the board members," Mr. Wolfowitz said, "are legitimately afraid that as soon as you start criticizing, the next thing you're going to do is wag your finger and say, 'You're not going to get money unless you behave.' That's not our objective. Our objective is to make the lending go up."

Past actions taken on behalf of the bank have involved a variety of presumed improprieties. For example, aides to Mr. Wolfowitz said he suspended debt relief talks with Congo because he was dissatisfied with audits of its state oil company. They said he expressed indignation over news reports about extravagant hotel bills incurred by Congo's president during United Nations General Assembly meetings in New York last September.

The bank has looked at, among other things, accusations of corrupt bidding practices for road projects in Bangladesh, kickbacks to politicians in Argentina and the resignation of high officials in Kenya linked to projects there.

By all accounts, a pivotal moment in Mr. Wolfowitz's campaign came last year when the bank suspended $800 million in loans for maternal and children's health in India in response to assertions that illicit payments had been going to officials.

Nancy Boswell, president of Transparency International USA, a nongovernmental monitoring group that strongly supports Mr. Wolfowitz's efforts on corruption, said, "It sent a tremor through the bank that Wolfowitz was serious, that he was going to ask hard questions, look at the track record of countries and make some changes."

But many at the bank complained that the action had been taken without consultation, and protests were lodged by top aides to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, bank officials said.

Few would characterize the bank's 10,000 employees, 70 percent of whom work in Washington, as enthusiastic supporters of the Bush administration. Since taking office, Mr. Wolfowitz has told staff members that he wants to listen to them. He has impressed many with his trips to Africa and advocacy of debt relief for the poorest countries.

But distrust of Mr. Wolfowitz remains high, in part because, according to some, he has not given enough credit to his predecessor, James D. Wolfensohn, who spoke out against corruption and set up the bank's first investigative unit in the late 1990's.

When Mr. Wolfowitz arrived, he acknowledged Mr. Wolfensohn's efforts, but also complained that the fraud unit had more than 300 unresolved cases. He increased its budget nearly 50 percent and appointed a new director. He has also set up a program for companies to disclose bribes they paid in order to avoid sanctions.

Currently, about 330 companies accused of corruption have been barred from bank-financed business or been otherwise penalized. The bank is trying to get nations and other international aid agencies to take similar action.

Mr. Wolfowitz's management style also grates on some bank officials, with a number of them complaining that he has relied on a small coterie of loyal aides. "He presumes," said Mr. Dañino, the former bank senior vice president and once prime minister of Peru, "that anyone who opposes him is either incompetent or corrupt."

But supporters say Mr. Wolfowitz is determined to shake up the bank and was inspired to move on corruption by staff members, especially those posted outside Washington and Europe. They say he has had to battle a mentality that emphasizes loan programs, not crackdowns on corrupt individuals.

"Let's face it, promotion at the World Bank comes from spending money,'' said John Githongo, a onetime campaigner against corruption in Kenya who has fled to safety in Britain and is now an adviser to Mr. Wolfowitz. "If you're in the field, and too many complaints about corruption interrupt the spending, it has an impact on your career trajectory.''

Can Karen Hughes Change America's Image? She's Trying (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke, Roll Call Executive Editor

Roll Call, September 14, 2006

Charlie Wick, the ex-Hollywood agent and producer, took no end of guff when then-President Ronald Reagan appointed him to head the U.S. Information Agency. But Wick proved his critics wrong.

He had Reagan's ear, he had energy, and he understood the importance of communications in Reagan's ideological struggle against communism's "evil empire."

Wick won huge increases in USIA's budget, expanded exchange programs, launched a global satellite television network and founded RadioMarti, which broadcasts to Cuba. Even jaded government bureaucrats ended up cheering his achievements.

Unfortunately, when the Cold War was won and it looked as though ideological struggle was passé, the Clinton administration helped right-wing Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) kill the USIA by folding it into the State Department, where public diplomacy was a backwater.

But now, the Charlie Wick spirit is back in the person of Karen Hughes, President Bush's former White House communications director, who last year became undersecretary of State for public diplomacy.

Critics, as they did with Wick, are laughing at the idea of a presidential crony, an alleged foreign policy naïf, trying to combat an international adversary with images — in this case, fighting terrorists by visiting with Muslim women and getting the president to talk respectfully about Islam.

But, like Wick, Hughes has the president's ear. She has energy. She understands that what people overseas think is a vital part of foreign policy. She's TV-savvy, and she's launched a stream of initiatives designed to improve America's position in what Bush calls "the great ideological struggle of the 21st century."

The initiatives include, for the first time, giving American ambassadors and military commanders overseas a daily, one-page Rapid Response set of talking points on hot topics in the world, encouraging U.S. diplomats to get on television and organizing a top-level interagency committee to combat terrorist ideology.

DOJ_NMG_0063184

She also got Bush's former White House personnel chief, Dina Powell, an Egyptian-American, to head up an expanding international exchange program aimed at inviting strategic personalities, such as clerics, teachers and journalists, to visit the United States.

Hughes is planning to launch a large-scale program to foster the teaching of English to children around the world, giving them both a key economic tool and means to access American messaging.

She's in the process of improving U.S. Internet communications, including participation on foreign chat rooms, and has set up three message "hubs" in London, Dubai and Brussels. She's also sending Muslim-Americans on speaking trips abroad.

In a controversial move within the administration, Hughes and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice seem to have persuaded Bush — temporarily, at least — to drop the label "Islamic-fascism" from his speeches; diplomats say that Muslims hear it as an attack on their religion, thereby validating the extremists' false charge that the U.S. is at war with Islam.

Unfortunately, unlike Wick, Hughes is serving as the nation's top propagandist at a time when enemy ideology is ascendant in the world. In Wick's day, communism was headed for the ash heap of history, even if only Reagan recognized the fact at the time.

"I like her and respect her a lot," said one Member of Congress who oversees Hughes' activities. "But what she's doing is like fighting an apartment fire with one hose. In fact, the whole world is on fire."

Bush himself told NBC's Brian Williams last month, "Of course, I worry about America's image. We're great at TV, and yet we are getting crushed on the PR front."

The latest Pew Global Attitudes survey showed that only 21 percent of Jordanians have a favorable attitude toward the U.S., as do 23 percent in Turkey and Pakistan.

A top official at America's two leading broadcasting channels to the Arab world, Radio Sawa and Alhurra television, told me he thinks the U.S. definitely is "losing" the ideological struggle with radical Islam.

For one thing, the U.S. broadcasts no TV to much of the non-Arab Islamic world, relying on radio broadcasts by the Voice of America.

And, even though Sawa and Alhurra are gaining audiences in the Arab world, they are far outdistanced by Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya, which broadcast nonstop anti-U.S. propaganda, much of it almost pornographically drenched in blood and body parts.

A defense contractor, the Braddock Road Group, has given a briefing to various Washington, D.C., officials — the Pentagon says it's classified — showing what jihadist groups broadcast on Arab TV, Islamic Web sites and DVDs.

The message, delivered with continuous scenes of violence, is that the U.S. wants to control Middle East oil, wants to humiliate Muslims and is conducting a "crusade" against Islam.

When I asked Hughes whether she thought the U.S. was losing the ideological war, she said, "I'm an optimistic person. I think we have a long way to go. We have a lot more to do."

Hughes commissioned a huge, 18,000-person poll in 14 countries, which showed high rates of disapproval of the U.S. — but a willingness almost everywhere to change their mind if the U.S. showed respect for their views and values and partnered with them in solving joint problems. Respect for other countries was not a hallmark of Bush's first term. It is becoming more so in the second, thanks in no small part to Rice and Hughes.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Armed Services Republicans Block Bush Terror Detainee Legislation. The AP (9/15, Flaherty) reports, "A rebellious Senate committee defied President Bush on Thursday and approved terror-detainee legislation he has vowed to block, deepening Republican conflict over terrorism and national security in the middle of the election season." Republican Sen. John Warner, "normally a Bush supporter, pushed the measure through his Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote." Backing Warner were GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain. The committee vote "set the stage for a showdown on the Senate floor as early as next week." The AP adds, "In an embarrassment to the White House, Colin Powell…announced his opposition to his old boss' plan, saying it would hurt the country. Powell's successor, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, jumped to the president's defense in a letter of her own." CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) noted Powell wrote that "America's own troops would be put at risk if the US redefines the Geneva Convention and authorizes harsh interrogations of terror suspects. NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 4, 1:10, P. Williams, 9.87M) said that in addition to former Secretary Powell, "about three dozen retired military officers say they believe the Bush bill would limit the protections of the Geneva conventions and put Americans at risk if they are captured overseas in future wars. Their experience in harsh interrogation techniques do not work very well."

USA Today (9/15, Jackson, Kiely, 2.27M) says Bush "is facing a Republican rebellion." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "acknowledged that the president's bill may fall short in the Senate. She said House and Senate negotiators may have to resolve the differences between the two bills."

The Washington Times (9/15, Fagan, Dinan, 88K) reports, "A Capitol Hill source said that after two weeks of fruitless negotiations with Mr. McCain, the White House has decided to instead have the fight in public and make its case directly. "

Much of the media coverage describes the GOP senators' action as a sign of a GOP split on the terror issue, one that could benefit Democrats in the midterm elections. The New York Times (9/15, Hulse, 1.21M) reports "Bush and Congressional Republicans spent the last 10 days laying the foundation for a titanic pre-election struggle over national security, and now they have one. But the fight playing out this week on Capitol Hill is not what they had in mind. Instead of drawing contrasts with Democrats, the president's call for creating military tribunals to try terror suspects…has erupted into a remarkably intense clash pitting some of the best-known warriors in the Republican Party against Mr. Bush and the Congressional leadership." As NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 3, 2:35, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "All of this is headed for a real showdown in the senate where Democrats are happy to stand back and watch the Republicans fight among themselves."

The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Schmitt, Havemann, 918K) reports "the rejection of Bush's plan could create a dramatic clash, particularly among Republicans campaigning for reelection as being strong on security issues, when the full Senate votes next week." Republicans "view national security as their greatest political strength in their battle to keep control of Congress in the November midterm elections." On Wednesday, the House Armed Services Committee "approved a tribunal measure that closely tracked the administration's proposal." AFP (9/15, Griffith) notes Bush yesterday "praised the House Armed Services Committee for having passed his bill, which he called 'a very important piece of legislation in a bipartisan fashion that will give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country.'" Bush also "dismissed Powell's remarks, saying 'there's all kinds of letters coming out,' and pointed out that a group of military lawyers sent a letter to the House and Senate Armed Services panels supporting the administration plan."

McClatchy (9/15, Hutcheson, Talev) reports Bush "brushed off Powell's opposition, but White House spokesman Tony Snow didn't conceal the annoyance that his defection caused within the president's inner circle." Snow "said Powell was 'confused' about Bush's goals and suggested that the former secretary of state should have contacted the White House for clarification before writing his letter."

ABC World News (9/14, lead story, 2:40, Stephanopoulos) reported that "only hours before" the Senate committee vote, "the President made a rare trip to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill. And he pressured the Senate from the Oval Office." Bush: "It is very important for the American people to understand that in order to protect this country; we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks." Three GOP Senators, continued ABC, "oppose the Administration's attempt to interpret Article Three of the Geneva conventions, which outlaws inhumane treatment of enemy prisoners. Here's the basic debate -- the Administration worries Article Three could expose CIA interrogators to prosecution and lawsuits."

CBS Evening News (9/13, lead story, 2:40, Attikisson, 7.66M) reported, "After he left Capitol Hill, the President warned that a law that ties the hands of CIA interrogators too much would threaten the very existence of the high value detainee program, a program he says has saved countless lives." Bush: "If there's any doubt in our professionals mind that they can conduct their operations in a legal way with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be endangered."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Lueck, 2.03M) reports "in the House, some Republicans are concerned about the White House approach, just as some have objected to another administration priority -- getting broader authority to conduct warrantless surveillance." Yesterday, "during the closed-door meeting, Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, a former military lawyer, cited an issue top uniformed lawyers raised: Mr. Bush's plan would permit the use of classified evidence, but doesn't require it be shared with the accused."

Letter Released By White House Generates Controversy. The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Babington, Weisman, 748K) says "the dispute has fractured the GOP establishment." White House officials "released a letter from senior Pentagon uniformed lawyers, who said they 'do not object' to two key sections of the administration-backed bill that would reinterpret US obligations under the Geneva Conventions and protect US intelligence agents from war crimes prosecutions." They "then summoned senators from the Armed Services and intelligence committees to an afternoon meeting with Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. Seven attended, sources said." The Pentagon letter "immediately generated controversy. Senior judge advocates general had publicly questioned many aspects of the administration's position, especially any reinterpreting of the Geneva Conventions. The White House and GOP lawmakers seized on what appeared to be a change of heart to say that they now have military lawyers on their side." But "the letter was signed only after an extraordinary round of negotiations Wednesday between the judge advocates and William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel, according to Republican opponents of Bush's proposal. The military lawyers refused to sign a letter of endorsement. But after hours of cajoling, they assented to write that they 'do not object,' according to three Senate GOP sources who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were divulging private negotiations."

The New York Times (9/15, Zernike, 1.21M) reports McCain, Warner and Graha "dismissed the letter from the military lawyers, saying they had questions about whether it amounted to an authentic endorsement of the White House proposal. They said they put more weight on extensive public testimony in which the lawyers raised doubts about the Bush plan." The Times adds, "Some military officials briefed on the military lawyers' position also disputed the notion that the lawyers had reversed course. They said the lawyers agreed to sign a letter at a meeting on Wednesday after discussing the language over several hours."

Gonazles Defends Detainee Interrogation Tactics. McClatchy Newspapers (9/15, Canon) reports, "As Congress dealt a rebuke Thursday to President Bush's national security agenda, his attorney general defended the administration's efforts to deal with captured terror suspects." McClatchy continues, "Of critics concerned about international treaties or freedoms protected by the U.S. Constitution, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said they misunderstand the legalities - some never clearly defined - of dealing with an unconventional foe that plays by no rules. … Judicial rejections of some administration policies have muddied the legal landscape and made it unclear how the government can detain, interrogate and prosecute terror suspects, he said. … 'We do need some clarity,' Gonzales told the editorial board of The Kansas City Star." McClatchy adds, "Gonzales said the U.S. courts and Congress have yet to interpret the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which sets a standard of treatment for prisoners of war. He voiced concern that that an adverse ruling could damage efforts to interrogate 'terrorists who do not fight by the standards of war.' And he suggested that rejection of an administration bill sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, giving interrogators more leeway might hurt efforts to fight terrorism. … 'Congress may decide we don't want to gather any more evidence,' the attorney general said. … He said that 'just like in every other war,' the American people will have to trust the government to protect the rights of those in custody while pursuing justice in secret. Pressed on how long extraordinary measures - for instance, the imprisonment of suspects without the filing of charges - might continue, he said they would last at least until the pursuit of al-Qaida and its accomplices has come to an end. … 'First of all this is a real war,' he said, drawing a distinction between the war on terror and 'the war on drugs or the war on poverty or something like that. It's like the Cold War. . . . At some point this conflict is going to be over. But today it is not over.'"

McCain Defends Stance In TV Interviews. McCain granted interviews to ABC, CBS and CNN yesterday. ABC World News (9/14, story 2, 1:45, Gibson) reported "one of the most powerful Republican senators opposing the President is John McCain, who, himself was once a prisoner of the Vietnamese for more than five years." McCain told ABC, "I'm hearing from military leaders all over the country, retired people, including General Colin Powell, who say if we take the Administration's measure, we'll put our young Americans' lives at-risk. That's very serious. … Suppose that a Special Forces person, not in uniform, were captured. And the attorney general of the nation who captured it decides to interpret the Geneva conventions to their liking and turns that person over to their secret police. That's what really worries us."

On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 2, 1:35, Couric, 7.66M), McCain was asked it he thought "the President's proposal would stand up if it were reviewed again by the Supreme Court." The senator said, "I am not a constitutional expert, but people that are tell me there's a great risk of the President's proposal being overturned by the United States Supreme Court. But that's not the major reason why I'm involved in changing it. I want to preserve the Geneva Conventions which is provided protections for our men and women in uniform and out of uniform."

McCain said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/14), "I think we see a compromise there, so that we could prevent national security from being compromised, but yet still allow the defendant to be able to see some of the evidence against him. It's just not a normal procedure that someone who is subject to the death penalty is not allowed to see the evidence that's presented against him."

Frist May Bring Both Versions Of Tribunal Legislation To The Floor. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/14) if the President will get the military tribunal legislation from the Senate that he wants. Frist said, "We'll wait and see. We had the product that came out of the Armed Services Committee today. There are several very contentious issues in that bill that clearly the President will not agree with, and I think the majority of Republican senators, anyway, will not agree with. So not until we get to the floor will we know what the final product will be coming out of the United States Senate." Asked about the possibility that he might take the version that Bush wants directly to the floor in competition with the Warner-McCain-Graham alternative, Frist said, "That is correct, and a decision has not been made. We'll wait and look at both bills. But either way, senators will have the opportunity to express themselves."

Snow Denies Administration Is Trying To Change Geneva Conventions. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Koch) reported that during his press briefing Thursday, White House press secretary Tony Snow "tried to clarify the White House's position, saying we are not trying to change or amend the Geneva Conventions, we're trying to bring them substance, bring them clarity. He said that the problem with the Geneva Conventions, as they exist now, is that there are no standards and that nations can basically do what they want. And he insisted the White House is really trying to get rid of lawlessness and let people know exactly what they can and can't do."

Retired Judges Oppose Bush's Position On Detainees. The AP (9/14) reports, "Nine retired federal judges accused the Bush administration and Congress of trying to deprive detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, of the most basic legal right. Legislation under debate on Capitol Hill would strip federal courts of the power to hear detainees' challenges of their treatment and indefinite detention at the Guantanamo Bay." The nine retirees who signed the letter are "appeals court judges John Gibbons, Shirley Hufstedler, Nathaniel Jones, Timothy Lewis, William Norris, George Pratt, Lee Sarokin, Patricia Wald and US District Judge William Sessions."

54% Say Bush Administration Following "Right Course" On Detainees. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with 'the right course,' while only 34% say administration has 'gone too far.'" According to the same Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, "by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence."

NYTimes, WPost Blast Bush On Military Detentions Bill. The Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) says in an editorial, "It was a measure of his painfully skewed priorities that Mr. Bush made the unaccustomed trip yesterday to seek legislative permission for the CIA to make people disappear into secret prisons and have information extracted from them by means he dare not describe publicly." There is "no question that the United States is facing a dangerous foe that uses the foulest of methods. But a wide array of generals and others who should know argue that it is neither prudent nor useful for the United States to compromise its own values in response."

The New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "We'll find out in November how well the White House's be-very-afraid campaign has been working with voters. We already know how it's working in Congress. Stampeded by the fear of looking weak on terrorism, lawmakers are rushing to pass a bill demanded by the president that would have minimal impact on antiterrorist operations but could cause profound damage to justice and the American way." Bush "himself went to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill, which would give Congressional approval to the same sort of ad hoc military commissions that Mr. Bush created on his own authority after 9/11 and that the Supreme Court has already ruled unconstitutional. It would permit the use of coerced evidence, secret hearings and other horrific violations of American justice." The "idea that the nation's chief executive is pressing so hard to undermine basic standards of justice is shocking. And any argument that these extreme methods would be used only against the most dangerous of international terrorists has been destroyed by the handling of hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, many of whom appear to have been scooped up in Afghanistan years ago with little attempt to verify any connection to terrorism, and now are in danger of lingering behind bars forever without a day in court."

Henninger Says Disunity Over Detainee Treatment Could Aid Terrorists. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M), "Read through the 14 Guantanamo detainee biographies posted on the White House Web site, and one gets a rare feel for the events that distinguish the lives of these individuals from the daily goals of everyone else in the world -- lives simply dedicated to the mass murder of innocents, and not just in lower Manhattan. … Read all 14 of these histories devoted to 'sacrificing life' to put in context the denunciations of warrantless wiretaps and the Swift financial monitoring program." Republicans "are "arguing among themselves over the degree of access to classified intelligence this group should receive at trial. Democrats, other than saying they'll support the more liberal version, are contributing almost nothing to the new system. If a Democrat wins the White House in 2008, we may assume she or he will receive, as payback, a similar level of limp support from the GOP in the same war on terror. Say this for the Guantanamo 14: They have unity of purpose. Long term, our disunity could prove to be a big advantage to them."

Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Terrorism Charge Against Padilla. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15, Anderson) reports US District Judge Marcia Cooke "refused Thursday to reinstate a key terrorism charge in the case against alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and two other defendants, raising the possibility of delays in their trial if prosecutors appeal the ruling." Cooke "ruled in August that a charge of conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap and maim' people overseas must be dismissed because it duplicated other charges in the same indictment. … The dismissed charge is important because it is the only one in the indictment that carries a potential life sentence." The AP notes that among other rulings yesterday, Cooke "refused a defense request for a list of people who attended an al-Qaida camp at the same time Padilla allegedly did in 2000" and "rejected…a defense request for identities of others who filled out al-Qaida applications that were found along with one prosecutors say was Padilla's in a binder in Afghanistan." She also "allowed Hassoun's wife to testify via video hookup from Beirut, Lebanon, about the actions FBI agents took before searching their home in suburban Sunrise in 2002. … Hassoun, who is allegedly Padilla's recruiter, claims the FBI search was illegal and that evidence seized should be thrown out."

Cooke Orders Prosecutors To Turn Over Padilla Medical Records. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/15, Blum, 265K) reports Cooke "ordered prosecutors Thursday to turn over medical records for…Padilla, a move that could reveal details of his treatment during 31/2 years in military custody." Cooke "included in her ruling all records relating to physical and mental evaluations of Padilla or medication taken by or administered to Padilla while held as an enemy combatant in a South Carolina Navy brig. Defense attorneys said they intend to use the records to argue the government engaged in unconstitutional conduct by interrogating" Padilla "and imprisoning him for years without giving him access to some legal rights."

Padilla Case Seen As Test Of Aggressive Interrogation Techniques. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Richey, 58K) reports that the federal agents who arrested Padilla obtained the arrest warrant by telling "a federal judge that two weeks earlier a confidential source had revealed that Mr. Padilla was plotting to build and detonate a radiological 'dirty' bomb in the United States. What the agents did not tell the judge is that their 'confidential source'" had revealed the information during "controversial interrogation sessions at a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison overseas." The Padilla "case is emerging as a major test of whether such intelligence information is admissible in US courts. And it highlights the difficult debate over military commissions currently under way in Congress, which is wrestling with how best to protect national security while also preserving America's tradition of due process and fair trials.

Pentagon Lists "Ten Facts About Guantanamo." In his Washington Post (9/15, A17, 748K) "In The Loop" column, Al Kamen discusses the Pentagon's "Ten Facts About Guantanamo" list, intended "to highlight what a nice place it is." The list notes that "'more money is spent on meals for detainees than' on U.S. troops stationed there," that the "Muslim call to prayer sounds five times a day," that prisoners "receive free medical, dental and psychiatric care," and more. Kamen adds, "Fact No. 8, probably one of the most important, notes that, contrary to what you might have heard, the prisoners actually really want to be in Guantanamo. 'The mother of a detainee stated: "Of course they wanted to stay there. … They had human rights and good living standards there. They had dentists and good meals -- everything they wanted."' Turns out, this quote from a March 2004 edition of the London Times was a Russian mother comparing Guantanamo with Russian jails."

Two Gitmo Detainees Returned To Kuwait. Two Kuwaitis released from the US military prison at Guantanmo Bay Cuba have been returned to Kuwait, where they will face trails on terrorism-related charges, according to their lawyer. The AP (9/14) reported that the US military said "an administrative review board had recommended the two men be transferred back to Kuwait from the prison in southeastern Cuba. … Two men, Omar Rajab Amin, 41, and Abdullah Kamel al-Kundari, 32, who had been held at Guantanamo for four years, arrived at an airport in Kuwait early Friday, said Khaled al-Odah, who heads the Kuwaiti Family Committee, an advocacy group for men held at the prison."

Albany Terrorism Trial Jurors See Video Of Alleged Missile Deal. Capital News 9 Albany (9/14, Ference) reported that on Thursday at the Albany trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain, accused of providing material support for terrorism, "jurors saw lengthy video clips showing…Hossain speaking with an FBI informant named Malik posing as a Pakistani businessman. In the video, Malik showed Hossain a surface-to-air missile and began discussing how Malik would pay Hossain to launder $50,000 to import the fake missile to a terrorist group. But the question is, did Hossain fully understand the transaction and the situation he was put in?" At a later meeting, "Malik asked, 'Have you heard of [a particular terrorist group]?' Hossain said yes, although it turns out he thought that was a music group, not a terrorist group. Later that year, Hossain told Malik, 'Non-believers will gradually convert to Islam, sir. There is no need for us to kill.'"

Terror Informant Says US Government Betrayed Him. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 8, 3:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, on an Arab-American "who was recruited to infiltrate a terror cell and wound up blowing the lid off a plot in New York City. But he now fears that what's happened to him since then will discourage other Arab-Americans from doing what he did." Here's our chief investigative correspondent Armen Keteyian." CBS (Keteyian) added that two years ago, the NYPD broke up a plot by two men who were planning "to bomb the subway beneath the world's biggest department store." Eldawoody "sees himself now as abandoned by the government, the country he served, blaming the NYPD and Federal prosecutors for betraying what he says were two conditions of his cooperation. Not disclosing his identity at trial. … And afterwards helping him find a new job."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate Approves Port Security Bill 98-0. USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) and the Washington Post (9/15, 748K), among other sources, run an AP story this morning reporting, "The Senate voted without dissent Thursday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for nuclear weapons or 'dirty bombs.'" The bill, approved 98-0 "in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships." The legislation "does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports."

McClatchy (9/15, Blumenthal) reports, "Senate passage of the bill comes more than two years after the 9-11 commission concluded that the nation's ports could be more vulnerable to attack than commercial aviation." The measure "picked up more steam over the past few weeks as congressional Republicans have ratcheted up their national security agenda." Democrats "said Republicans were scrambling to shore up their national security credentials for political reasons before the elections. 'Five years after 9-11, repeated failures by Bush Republicans have left our ports vulnerable and open to terrorist attack,' Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement."

Hill Battle Brewing Over Chemical Plant Security. A battle is brewing in Congress over how to secure US chemical plants from attack. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Marks, 58K) reports, "At issue is whether the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) should have the authority to require chemical plants to implement specific security measures, such as switching to safer chemicals or using armed guards. The chemical industry and House Republican leaders believe it should not. Instead, they favor allowing companies to come up with their own security proposals that can then be reviewed and approved by DHS. On the other side are environmentalists, some security experts, moderate Republicans, and Democrats. They believe DHS should have the ability to require companies to make security improvements, as long as companies have an opportunity to appeal requirements to which they object."

Muslim-American Security Expert Sues DHS Over Job Suspension. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15, Parry) reports, "An Egyptian-born aviation security expert is suing the U.S. government, claiming he was wrongly suspended from his Transportation Security Administration job based on a classified FBI file the government won't let him see. Wagih H. Makky filed the lawsuit Thursday in federal court in Newark, alleging he was harassed and discriminated against at work after the Sept. 11 terror attacks based on his nationality and his Muslim religion." The AP notes, "The lawsuit names the Department of Homeland Security among others as defendants. The lawsuit did not specify damages."

Chertoff Announces Mandatory Screening Of More Air Cargo. In an article appearing on at least 68 news websites, the AP (9/14, Lavoie) reported in a news conference at Boston's Logan International Airport Thursday, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that cargo brought "to airline ticket counters for shipment on passenger planes will have to go through the same security screening as checked baggage." Screening of such packages had been going on "for the past several months at most airports around the country," but it will now "be mandatory for 100 percent of those packages, Chertoff said." The AP added, however, that "most of the cargo on passenger planes, which comes from larger freight shippers, remains subjected only to random checks."

Chertoff Says Cost Of Registered Traveler Under Consideration. After running an article Thursday titled "Cost May Kill Travel Program," USA Today (9/15, Frank, 2.27M) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told reporters Thursday "that he is 'still looking at' how much to charge air travelers for a program that would speed them through airport security. Chertoff said he supports the idea of making people in the Registered Traveler program 'pay their own weight,' which could cost up to $200 a year." However, he said "exactly what the right amount of money is going to be and how that's going to work, I think, is something we're still looking at." The secretary's "comments come days after the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) disclosed that it plans to charge travelers $100 to $120 to enroll in Registered Traveler and at least $70 a year for every year after their first in the program."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, A8, 2.03M) reports the TSA's announcement this week that "it plans to charge an annual fee of $100 per person to cover background checks and the full cost of airport screening" prompted a "battle" with private companies who "expected a fee of about $30." The fee would "'stunt, if not eliminate RT programs, thus undermining the promise of better aviation security and much needed customer service improvements,' the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, which represents private companies that want to provide the service, said in a statement."

Insurers Seek Renewal Of Post-9/11 Terrorism Insurance Program. Some in the business and insurance communities want the federal government to create a long-term or permanent terrorism insurance program similar to the one established by the White House and Congress after the 9/11 attacks to backstop the insurance industry in the event of another attack. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Mullins, Pleven, 2.03M) reports, "Under the program set up by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act, the government steps in to help make an insurer's payouts if the losses from a foreign terrorist attack exceed that insurer's deductible. With more than a year remaining before the program expires, a politically savvy group -- including insurance companies, real-estate owners, financial services firms and former American International Group Chief Executive Maurice Greenberg -- is working to press the issue. … At a speech in New York today, Mr. Greenberg is expected to say that the government must help the industry if terrorists strike with a weapon of mass destruction. The insurance industry should be able to cover claims from a less catastrophic attack, according to his prepared remarks."

Mississippi Overspent On "Sewer Hog" After Katrina. The Washington Post (9/15, A19, Williamson, 748K) reports a recent audit from the Transportation Department's inspector general found "that the state of Mississippi had overspent by $772 an hour on the Sewer Hog, a high-speed swiller used to clear flooded storm drains. Desperate to reopen US 90 along the Gulf Coast, Mississippi transportation officials turned to Texas-based Garner Environmental Services Inc., exclusive operators of the Sewer Hog." The machine was used to suck "slop and sand from about 200 miles of three-foot sewer lines. But it also hogged the budget. State highway officials -- and the feds -- paid $1.7 million for services that the report said ought to have cost $294,000." The Post adds that "like a homeowner with an overflowing toilet, Mississippi highway officials opted to mop first and ask questions later."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Hold Separate White House Meetings With Musharraf, Karzai. The AP (9/14) reports President Bush will meet with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the White House on September 22, and with Afghan President Hamid Karzai four days later. The AP says the neighboring countries' "relations have sometimes been strained by terrorist hideouts along their border."

Kerry Accuses Bush Administration Of "Cut And Run" In Afghanistan. An AP (9/14, Miga) report carried by about 65 newspapers and websites says Sen. John Kerry said in a Howard University speech, "The Administration's Afghanistan policy defines cut and run. Cut and run while the Taliban-led insurgency is running amok across entire regions of the country. Cut and run while Osama bin Laden and his henchmen hide and plot in a lawless no-man's land." Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz replied, "John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously."

Taliban Regroups In Western Afghanistan. USA Today (9/15, 8A, 2.27M) reports Taliban militants "have regrouped in western provinces" of Afghanistan and "ignited violence that has killed a dozen people in two days, officials said. Up to 200 Taliban fighters poured into Bakwa in Farah province. They surrounded a police compound and fired rocket-propelled grenades at policemen before being driven out," according to the regional police chief.

Poland To Send 1,000 More Troops To Afghanistan. The Financial Times (9/15, Dombey, Fidler, Cienski) reports that as expected, Poland has committed 1,000 new troops for NATO's Afghanistan force. They will "join the 100 already on the ground in Afghanistan but are unlikely to arrive until February 2007."

WPost Says European NATO Members Must Send More Troops. The Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) editorializes, "There's no question that placing soldiers in harm's way is one of the hardest steps for a democracy, and rightly so. But European governments that say they are committed to NATO and its mission in Afghanistan cannot continue to watch from a distance as American, British and Canadian soldiers do the lion's share of the fighting -- and dying. If NATO is to be an enduring military alliance, its other members must step forward."

Neuharth Says Troops Should Be Redeployed From Iraq To Afghanistan. Al Neuharth writes in USA Today (9/15, 2.27M), "Currently, we have about 147,000 troops in Iraq, about 21,000 in Afghanistan. We actually "cut and ran" from the hunt for bin Laden in Afghanistan to carry out our Iraq misadventure. … Bush says we must 'stay the course' and not 'cut and run.' Since we cut and ran from Afghanistan during our Osama hunt years ago, maybe we should reverse that course now. Redeploying our troops to fulfill our pledge to get bin Laden could make for a worldwide celebration by freedom lovers. Letting him stay on the loose is the biggest boost for terrorists, in Iraq and around the world."

CIA Was Told There Were No Iraq-Al Qaeda Ties In 2002, But Did Not Inform White House. The Washington Post (9/15, A14, Pincus, 748K) reports a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report says the CIA "learned in late September 2002 from a high-level member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle that Iraq had no past or present contact with Osama bin Laden" and that Hussein "considered bin Laden an enemy of the Baghdad regime." The Post says that while "President Bush and other senior administration officials were at that time regularly linking Hussein to al-Qaeda, the CIA's highly sensitive intelligence supporting the contrary view was apparently not passed on to the White House or senior Bush policymakers."

Two US Troops Killed, Others Wounded, In Baghdad Truck Bombing. ABC World News (9/14, story 3, 1:40, Gibson) reported on "an especially alarming attack against US forces" in Iraq. A "suicide truck bomb wounded 27 troops and killed two others. Military outposts are supposed to be secure against such bombs." ABC (Sciutto) added, "The military is crediting a rapid medical response with saving lives. Military officials say the bomber was able to get past a security checkpoint and inside the outpost because the bomb was apparently hidden under dirt in the dump truck, and not discovered on inspection." CBS Evening News (9/13, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) ran a very brief item on the bombing, putting the number of wounded at 25, and added, "Most of the injuries, though, were not serious. Five US troops have been killed in the past two days."

Sectarian Violence Continues. An AP (9/14, Quinn) story carried by about 50 newspapers and websites reports sectarian killings "have surged in parts of Baghdad not yet included in a security offensive." Bombings and "other insurgent attacks killed four American soldiers and wounded 25 in the capital region," and police "reported finding 20 bodies dumped on streets." The Los Angeles Times (9/15, 918K) says Army spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV "acknowledged that despite a major operation to combat death squads and curb sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Arab paramilitary fighters in Baghdad, violence had increased."

Petraeus Says Samarra Mosque Bombing "'Took The Gloves Off." In a brief item headlined "A General's

DOJ_NMG_0063196

Candor On Iraq," the Washington Post (9/15, A17, Tyson, 748K) reports Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, speaking at the Brookings Institution Thursday, said the "February bombing of the gold-domed mosque in Samarra was 'hugely harmful' and a 'very, very devastating blow' to security efforts." He said it "'took the gloves off the…Shia militia,' starting 'a downward spiral that is very hard to arrest. … It's had a horrific effect on the security situation.'"

Iraqi Official Says Syria Must Curtail Terrorist Border Crossings. An AP (9/14, Jelinek) story carried by about 35 newspapers and websites reports Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh met with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon Thursday and said that while Iraq "will spend more on jobs and reconstruction to battle the insurgency in the restive west," Syria "must clamp down on terrorists crossing the border." Saleh "told a Pentagon news conference he did not request more American troops for Anbar province because that would be a military decision."

Green Berets, Army Battalion At Odds In Anbar. The Washington Post (9/15, Tyson, 748K) runs a front-page story on US strategy in Anbar, and tensions between elite Green Berets and the Army battalion "that oversees the region." The "conflict in the Anbar camp, while extreme, is not an isolated phenomenon in Iraq, U.S. officers say. It highlights two clashing approaches to the war: the heavy focus of many regular U.S. military units on sweeping combat operations; and the more fine-grained, patient work Special Forces teams put into building rapport with local leaders, security forces and the people -- work that experts consider vital in a counterinsurgency."

Iraq's Poor Economy Yet Another Factor In Instability. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Murphy, Al-Taiee, 58K) reports that while USMC Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer recently said the US "appeared to be losing the political, if not the military, fight in Anbar," he said "success rests as much on restoring a measure of economic stability and basic services as it does on ending Iraq's sectarian bloodshed." But Iraq's economy "is weaker than at any point since the US invasion. Some estimate joblessness at 60 percent (the CIA shows a 30 percent rate for 2005), and prices for foodstuffs and basic goods have doubled -- and in some cases tripled -- since 2003."

Judge Tells Saddam He Was "Not A Dictator." The New York Times (9/15, Von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports Abdullah al-Amiri, the chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, "assured the defendant on Thursday that he was 'not a dictator,'" which seemed to please Hussein. A Kurdish farmer testified that in 1988, he "had pleaded with Mr. Hussein for the life of his wife and seven young children. He said a furious Mr. Hussein shouted, 'Shut up and get out.'" In court, Hussein "jumped up to defend himself. 'Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein?' he asked the judge, referring to himself in the third person, as is his habit in court. 'Wasn't Saddam a dictator and an enemy to the Kurdish people, as they say?'" Amiri "replied: 'I will answer you: you are not a dictator. Not a dictator,' he repeated. 'You were not a dictator.' Mr. Hussein, smiling, replied, 'Thank you.'" The Washington Post (9/15, A14, Raghavan, 748K) reports the episode came a day after "prosecutors called for Amiri's resignation, saying he had allowed 'defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words' and had 'allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/15, McDonnell, 918K) also has a report.

Obama Says Iraq Policy "Has Failed," Afghanistan "Getting Worse." Sen. Barack Obama was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/14) about Republican efforts to paint Democrats as weak on terrorism and security. Obama said, "This is the usual routine that the Republicans have trotted out before every election. And the question is, is it going to work a third time despite the irrefutable evidence that the policy in Iraq that they pursued has failed, that Afghanistan is getting worse, that every intelligence officer that you talk to and every objective observer that you talk to would indicate that we actually have more active terrorists around the world than we did at the time of 9/11?"

Marine Iraq Veteran Sees Two Problems With Military Transfer Strategy. In a New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) op-ed, Seth Moulton, a "Marine infantry officer in Iraq from March to September 2003 and from July 2004 to October 2005," writes, "In the long term, we must withdraw American troops" from Iraq, and "replacing them with capable Iraqi forces is the right way to do it. But there are two serious problems with how we are putting this strategy into effect. First, despite all rhetoric in Washington to the contrary, American commanders are being pressured to meet timelines rather than encouraged to wait until Iraqi forces are ready. … Second, our strategy is based on consolidating American forces in huge megabases as a means to reduce numbers and, as advocated by several members of Congress, to 'move to the periphery.' This is exactly the opposite of what has been prescribed for decades to fight a counterinsurgency, or to squelch a fomenting civil war."

World Bank Warns 26 "Fragile" States May Breed Terrorists. The Washington Post (9/15, A13, DeYoung, 748K) reports a new World Bank report concludes the "number of weak and poorly governed nations that can provide a breeding ground for global terrorism has grown sharply over the past three years, despite increased Western efforts to improve conditions in such states." So-called "fragile" countries "have jumped to 26 from 17 since the report was last issued in 2003. Five states graduated off the list, but 14 made new appearances."

According to the World Bank website, the 26 nations or territories are Afghanistan, Angola, Burundi, Cambodia, the Central African Republic, Comoros, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast), the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Eritrea, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kosovo, Laos, Liberia, Myanmar (Burma), Nigeria, the Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Timor-Leste (East Timor), Togo, Vanuatu, West Bank and Gaza, and Zimbabwe.

WSJournal Says Increased Attacks Force Arab Regimes To Confront Terrorism. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, A12, 2.03M) editorializes, "In the current issue of Foreign Policy, Kim Cragin and Andrew Curiel of the Rand Corporation compare the incidence of terrorism world-wide in the four years preceding and following 9/11. Between 1998 and the end of 2001, there were 2,991 fatalities from terrorism in North America, almost all of them on 9/11. Since then, there have been only three. By contrast, terrorist fatalities are up nearly everywhere else, more than tenfold in the Middle East. … It's a tragic fact that so many Muslims have been murdered in terrorist atrocities. But it is also the case that Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia that once tolerated or funded terrorism have belatedly come to recognize its dangers. That's progress for them -- and safety for Americans."

DOJ:

DOJ Whistleblower Named To DC Ethics Committee. The National Law Journal (9/15, Geier) reports, "'Poetic justice' is what a former U.S. Department of Justice ethics attorney calls her appointment to the District of Columbia Bar's legal ethics committee while a disciplinary complaint has been pending against her with the D.C. bar. … And some poetic justice may go a long way for whistleblower Jesselyn A. Radack, who was the subject of a Justice Department complaint before the D.C. Bar's Office of Bar Counsel when she was named in June, 2005 to the committee that advises the bar on the rules of professional conduct." The Journal continues, "Radack is the former Justice Department ethics advisor in the case of 'American Taliban' John Walker Lindh who quit her government job, lost a private-sector position and was the subject of a criminal investigation, all involving the Lindh case. Saying that she leaked information to the press, the Justice Department referred Radack to the state bars where she is licensed-and was even put on the federal 'no-fly' list. … 'Because of this episode, I am dedicating my life to whistleblowers,' said Radack, who started work last May at Grayson & Kubli, a private practice in McLean, Va., that handles government contracts, telecommunications and whistleblower law. … She also decided not to pursue the action she filed against DOJ that a federal judge in Washington recently dismissed. [NLJ, Aug. 28]. … 'I'm in a new job and ready to let go of it,' Radack said. 'It was empowering to put them on the defensive for once and finally get my version of the events down in a public forum.'" The Journa notes, "Radack claims that she was pushed out of her job as general counsel to DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility for not playing along with her superiors after federal law enforcement officials disregarded her advice on handling Lindh, dubbed the 'American Taliban' when he was captured in Afghanistan. … U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. recently found that DOJ did not violate its own policy when it sent referral letters to the Maryland and D.C. bars. Radack v. U.S. DOJ, No. 04-1881 (D.D.C.). … Charles S. Miller, spokesman for DOJ, said that the department would say with regard to Radack only that 'We're pleased with the court's decision.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Seeks Reinstatement Of Merrill Lynch Enron-Linked Convictions. The AP (9/15, Hays) reports, "Federal Enron prosecutors today asked the entire U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to hear arguments about reinstating fraud and conspiracy convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives that a three-judge panel threw out in a split decision last month." The AP continues, "The 2-1 decision slapped the Justice Department by overturning most convictions against the four men, who were found guilty in 2004 of participating in a sham 1999 deal that allowed Enron to post bogus profits." The AP adds, "The three-judge panel ruled that evidence was insufficient to support convictions against one of the Merrill defendants. Regarding the other three, the opinion said prosecutors employed a flawed theory that they deprived Enron of its right to their honest services because, even though the deal was a sham, it was consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the company or shareholders of money or property. … The panel affirmed convictions of perjury and obstruction against one of the three who lied to a grand jury about the deal." The AP notes, "In today's filing, prosecutors said the reversal 'threatens to insulate from punishment proven criminal conduct by corporate employees as long as their fraudulent goals are shared by senior executives, without regard to the obvious interest of a legitimate business entity and its stockholders in the honest services of all corporate employees.' … Prosecutors said a rehearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges is warranted to correct the panel's 'cramped and unworkable' interpretation of the honest services theory."

Ex-Willbros Official Pleads Guilty To Bribery. The AP (9/15) reports, "A former executive of a subsidiary of Willbros Group Inc. pleaded guilty Thursday to violating a federal law by conspiring to bribe government officials in Nigeria and Ecuador to obtain gas pipeline work in the two countries, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "Jim Bob Brown, 44, is to be sentenced Nov. 30 for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … Brown, who worked for Willbros International Inc. in Nigeria and South America, admitted that he and another Willbros International executive arranged for the payment of about $1.5 million in cash in Nigeria in 2005 as part of a conspiracy to obtain gas pipeline construction business there." The AP adds, "Brown also said he and other Willbros International executives approved of a scheme from at least 1996 to early 2005 in which fictitious invoices were submitted from the company's Nigerian operations. The money was used to make payments to officials with Nigerian revenue agencies and courts to get lower taxes and to influence litigation. … The Justice Department said Brown also admitted that in 2004 he conspired to pay at least $300,000 to officials of the Ecuadorean government oil company to obtain a gas pipeline rehabilitation contract."

Leak Scandal Has Not Hurt H-P's Stock Price. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/15, Page D - 1, Pimentel) reports, "Four years ago, Hewlett-Packard's bid to buy Compaq Computer turned into a bitter boardroom battle, jangling nerves on Wall Street and sending the company's stock plunging to as low as $14." The Chronicle continues, "One would think that the current scandal at HP -- with shocking revelations of corporate spying that could possibly lead to criminal charges -- would also rattle investors' confidence in the technology giant. … But that hasn't happened. … Instead, the Palo Alto company, which is considered one of the big comeback stories of the past two years in the tech industry, has managed to remain a favorite of investors. The boardroom scandal has not turned into a material event for the company, at least in Wall Street's eyes." The Chronicle adds, "For proof of that indifference, look no further than HP's stock, which has remained steady over the past two weeks, trading above $36, up nearly 50 percent from a year ago. It dipped slightly last week at the height of the scandal but steadily bounced back this week. … The stock closed at $36.25, down 12 cents, Thursday. That's just 13 cents below where it was the day the scandal broke last week. … The lack of reaction on Wall Street also speaks to the financial industry's focus on the bottom line. Some analysts say disputes involving ethics and morals appear to hold little sway when compared with returns."

Lerach Sues H-P Directors, Counsel Over Scandal. The California Recorder (9/15, Scheck) reports, "It was Thursday afternoon and the press was sweating: For three days no one new had decided to go after Hewlett-Packard's board of directors for their recent descent into public ignominy. … Not to fear, though: At about 4 p.m., plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach joined Congress, the California attorney general, the San Francisco U.S. Attorney, and federal regulators. Representing an HP shareholder, Lerach filed a suit accusing board members and executives of breaching their fiduciary duty for a litany of reasons, including their ongoing use of top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini." The Recorder continues, "Lerach's complaint is the latest result of a mess that began early this year when HP board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn initiated a probe in which an investigator lied to access private phone records of other directors and several journalists. … And while it's not yet clear how state Attorney General Bill Lockyer or U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will proceed -- Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring state charges, while Ryan's office met with HP lawyers on Monday -- Lerach's claims are quite explicit in the derivative suit he filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court in California." The Recorder adds, "The lead partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins argues in the suit that 10 HP board members and executives -- including Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins -- should be forced to pay damages to the company. … Lerach wrote that the defendants 'breached their fiduciary duties to HP, committed gross mismanagement, abused their control of HP, and have engaged in a gross dereliction of their duties, as well as corporate waste and attempted enrichment' by seeking to solidify their positions within the company by investigating board members Thomas Perkins and George Keyworth."

New York AG Objects To Grasso' Request For New Judge. The New York Law Journal (9/15, Bar) reports, "The New York attorney general's office Wednesday filed an objection to former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's request that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles Edward Ramos recuse himself from presiding over the government's excessive pay lawsuit against Grasso. … 'Grasso may have been permitted to treat the New York Stock Exchange as a fiefdom for his personal enrichment, picking the members of the Board and placing those over whom he had the most significant regulatory authority on the compensation committee, but he cannot be permitted to pick and choose the judge who will preside over his trial,' the government said in its affidavit." The Journal continues, "Grasso's attorneys argued in a motion filed last week that Ramos should recuse himself after he participated in ex parte settlement discussions in the case. … They also argued that the judge made factual and legal comments on the case during settlement discussions that would make it difficult for him to preside over the case. … Finally, Grasso said last week that he was unaware that the judge had applied twice for a position at the Stock Exchange and that in his second application Ramos had cited to a case he decided in which he had addressed the issue of excessive compensation."

Fed Official Concerned About Hedge Fund Margins. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, lp) reports, "A top Federal Reserve official believes regulators need to examine whether banks and securities dealers are imposing adequate margin requirements on hedge funds." The Journal continues, "Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, believes margin requirements that are sensible in normal times may prove too thin in stressful market conditions and could actually aggravate violent market moves. … While he doesn't assert that margin rules are too low or say what regulators should do, his remarks suggest regulators may soon turn their attention to margin practices after pressing Wall Street to improve how they handle complex and fast-growing credit and equity derivatives." The Journal adds, "Mr. Geithner, in remarks to be delivered in a speech in Hong Kong this morning, noted regulators are overhauling rules on how much capital banks must maintain to guard against loan and trading losses. 'It is critical,' he said, that that effort 'be reinforced with more attention by supervisors to margin practice ... within the major financial institutions.'"

Mexican Tycoon Settles SOX Case With SEC. The New York Times (9/15, Malkin) reports, "The billionaire tycoon Ricardo Salinas Pliego and the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States reached a settlement on Thursday in the first lawsuit against a foreign company under the corporate governance rules of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act." The Times continues, "Mr. Salinas Pliego, who owns Mexico's second-largest broadcaster, TV Azteca, agreed to pay $7.5 million in penalties and compensation to settle accusations of fraud involving a scheme to conceal a deal between a TV Azteca subsidiary and a company secretly owned by Mr. Salinas." The Times adds, "In the settlement, Mr. Salinas Pliego neither admitted or denied wrongdoing. One of his executives, Pedro Padilla Longoria, agreed to pay $1 million. … TV Azteca, which was also a defendant in the case, said in a statement that the settlement 'does not entail economic consequences' for the company. … Under the agreement, Mr. Salinas Pliego and Mr. Padilla are forbidden to serve as executives or directors of any publicly listed American company. Mr. Salinas Pliego delisted his companies from the New York Stock Exchange last year, arguing that 'excessive regulation' was a burden. … The S.E.C. charged Mr. Salinas Pliego with fraud in January 2005 in connection with a debt deal involving what was then the cellphone unit of TV Azteca. A company called Codisco, secretly owned by Mr. Salinas Pliego and a partner, bought discounted debt owed by the cellphone unit."

SEC Urged To Give Shareholders Tools To Hold Boards Accountable. Ira Millstein, senior associate dean for corporate governance at the Yale School of Management, and Harvey Goldschmid, the Dwight Professor of Law at Columbia, write in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M), "Shareholder access is officially back on the agenda at the SEC, forced there by a recent court decision. And this time around the SEC should seize the opportunity to craft a solution that opens up the proxy to shareholders in a sensible way, a solution that ensures board accountability to shareholders. … We urge the SEC to balance the system and give shareholders the tools to hold boards accountable -- and, in the process, restore public confidence in the fairness and economic rationality of the governance system."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Warns Of Online Sexual Predators. The Kansas City Star (9/15, Rizzo) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told an audience in Kansas City on Thursday that the battle against Internet predators is 'a fight for our future.'" The Star continues, "Gonzales called on all levels of law enforcement as well as parents, educators and private advocacy groups to work together to defeat the 'vast and frightening network' of criminals who every day seek to harm children. … 'It is brutal. It is heinous, and it is criminal,' he said." The Star adds, "The attorney general spoke to several hundred federal, state and local law enforcement officials from across the Midwest attending the annual Protect Our Children conference. … He told them that the proliferation of child pornography and sexual predators should be seen as 'a call to arms' to those dedicated to fighting it. … Halting those crimes is a top priority of the Justice Department. Gonzales promoted an initiative started earlier this year called Project Safe Childhood, which seeks to coordinate law enforcement efforts with endeavors to educate children and parents about the problem and how they fight a 'determined and desperate brand of criminal.'" The Star notes, "He cited a recent study that found half of Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 reported being exposed to pornographic material over the Web. And one in seven reported that they were sexually solicited online. … While that was an improvement from five years earlier, when a study found one in five reporting solicitations, Gonzalez said, 'One in seven getting solicited is one in seven too many.'"

The AP (9/15, Twiddy) reports, "Joint federal and local task forces arrested more than 1,600 people nationwide last year who were accused of exploiting children over the Internet, a fivefold increase over 2000. … But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the problem only continues to grow as the Internet has given child pornographers and people seeking trysts with minors unparalleled access to young users and made it easier to hide from law enforcement. … 'The only way to respond to their horrific ambitions is to respond with greater perseverance,' said Gonzales, speaking at the Protect Our Children Conference, a three-day event bringing law enforcement from Missouri, Kansas, Illinois and Nebraska together with child advocates and abuse treatment organizations." The AP continues, "In particular, Gonzales said states need to re-evaluate their laws against child exploitation and make them stronger, if necessary. … Missouri, for example, enacted legislation this year that boosts the penalties for many child sex crimes, such as a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for someone convicted of trying to entice a child into meeting to have sex." The AP adds, "Gonzales said federal, state and local law enforcement are doing a better job of coordinating their efforts and teaming up with community organizations that teach parents and children how to avoid online predators and deal with the aftermath when children are abused. … He added that his office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children will begin airing new public service messages early next year to call attention to the online dangers." The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman's office in Kansas City has been among the leaders in the country in attacking online predators, filing 42 child exploitation cases last year, the sixth-highest in the nation. So far this year, the office has filed 23 cases, spokesman Don Ledford said."

WDAF-TV, Fox 4, Kansas City (9/15) reports, "They are out there and they are preying on our young. On Thursday, one group of criminals was the focus of a visit to the Metro by the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales." WDAF-TV continues, "A national study said that one out of every seven children who go online will be solicited sexually. That statistic was so disturbing that the US Justice Department pledged a crackdown on Internet predators. That's what brought Gonzales to Kansas City. .. . 'It's a wrenching reality that every day children are sexually solicited online,' Gonzales said." WDAF-TV adds, "In many ways Gonzales was preaching to the choir. He spoke to state, local and federal officials at a conference on child protection. Gonzales' message? The Federal government will lead the fight against Internet predators. … 'Everyday we must talk to our kids about what they are seeing, what they are hearing and who they are communicating with online,' Gonzales said."

Ney Expected To Plead Guilty To One Criminal Charge. USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) reports, "Rep. Bob Ney, the Ohio Republican charged with taking gifts, trips and campaign donations from lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is expected to plead guilty to at least one criminal corruption charge possibly as early as today, Republicans officials told the Associated Press." Ney "has consistently denied any wrongdoing but agreed last month to give up his re-election bid for the upcoming election. It is not clear from the Republican officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of pending legal proceedings, if Ney will resign his House seat." The officials "did not say what charge Ney would plead guilty to."

The New York Times (9/15, Shenon, 1.21M) reports "a guilty plea would make Mr. Ney, a six-term congressman, the first member of Congress to admit to criminal charges in the Abramoff investigation, which has focused on the actions of several current and former Republican lawmakers who had been close to the former lobbyist." The Times adds, "People with detailed knowledge of the investigation said Mr. Ney had entered an in-patient rehabilitation center in recent days for treatment of alcoholism, making it uncertain whether he would appear at a court hearing to announce the plea. Lawyers and others would speak only anonymously because of concern that they would anger prosecutors."

The Washington Post (9/15, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Ney's Washington attorney, Mark H. Tuohey, said from London yesterday that he expected no immediate developments in the case. … Aides in his office did not return calls, and Justice officials would not comment."

The AP (9/15, Weisman) reports that "the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as Saturday." The AP adds, "Ney, a soft-spoken, popular Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largesse he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff became his undoing. … Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients."

Novak Disputes Claims Made By Armitage. The New York Times (9/15, Johnston, 1.21M) reports columnist Robert Novak "has disputed statements by his primary source" in the Plame leak case, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, "who said his mention of her identity was inadvertent." Novak said in his column that Armitage "had 'obscured' the details of their conversation on July 8, 2003, in a way that made Mr. Armitage's disclosure of the identity of the Central Intelligence Agency officer, Valerie Wilson, seem less deliberate." Novak "wrote that Mr. Armitage 'did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column,' the writer said." Armitage "said he stood by his account of the meeting. He said that his comments about Ms. Wilson in the conversation came at the end of the interview, were brief and made in response to a question posed by Mr. Novak."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Franken) reported Novak "is proving one of the immutable laws of Washington, a controversy is never really over." Novak "now says the contention by Armitage that it was a passing reference that propelled the writer to identify Valerie Plame in July 2003 wasn't so off-hand after all. Novak writes, 'He identified to me the CIA division where Ms. Wilson worked. Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made it clear he considered it especially suited for my column.' … Novak's column set off a multi-million dollar special counsel's investigation into whether the law had been broken by a White House trying to get retribution."

Armitage Criticized For Not Acknowledging Role In Leak Earlier. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/15), Victoria Toensing discusses the controversy under the headline, "What A Load Of Armitage!" Toensing says Armitage has "finally emerged from the cover-my-backside closet,

'apologizing' on CBS for keeping quiet for almost three years about being" Novak's original source. He "disingenuously blames his silence on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's non-legally based request -- any witness is free to talk about his or her testimony -- not to discuss the matter." Toensing adds, "Put aside hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer funds squandered on the investigation, New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85 days in jail, the angst and legal fees of scores of witnesses, the White House held siege to a criminal investigation while fighting the war on terror, Karl Rove's reputation maligned, and 'Scooter' Libby's resignation and indictment. By his silence, Mr. Armitage is responsible for one of the most factually distorted investigations in history."

Las Vegas Bribery Bagman To Plead Guilty To RICO Charge Monday. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports, "A former politician and lobbyist accused of ferrying bribes for a strip club owner reached a plea deal Thursday, just days before the start of his trial, authorities said." Lance Malone "has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said. … Authorities in turn have dropped wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges, and agreed not to object to Malone serving his sentence concurrently with a three-year sentence a San Diego jury levied against him last summer for similar charges." The AP notes, "Malone's trial was to cap off a three-year FBI probe into corruption and bribery on the Clark County commission."

Wife Of Convicted Alabama Mayor To Plead Guilty To Obstructing Probe. The Mobile Press-Register (9/14, Dezember, Kirby) reported, "Crystal Russo, the wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, will plead guilty in Mobile's federal court next week to obstruction of justice as part of an agreement with prosecutors, according to a Wednesday court filing. Crystal Russo, 25, was scheduled to be tried next month for allegedly trying to help her husband hide money that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors this summer in their corruption case against the now-convicted former mayor." The Press-Register noted, "On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a Mobile federal jury on numerous counts related to plots by Wall and fellow developer Jim Brown to enrich the mayor in an effort to curry favor in City Hall." The AP (9/15) also briefly reports on the plea agreement.

FBI Arrests Oakland Haberdasher In City Contract Fraud Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/15, Zamora, Heredia, Lee, 405K) reports, "A well-connected Oakland businessman has been arrested on federal charges of extorting bribe money in exchange for using his influence to help a contract applicant win a deal with the city." Maurice Himy "was arrested Wednesday by FBI agents on a federal complaint accusing him of interference of commerce by threats or violence. Until March, he owned Spaccio, an Italian men's clothing store…just steps from Oakland City Hall." US Magistrate Wayne Brazil yesterday "ordered Himy to turn over his passport and released him on his own recognizance." The Chronicle notes, "Himy's arrest followed a 17-month investigation by the FBI over the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property."

The AP (9/15) reports, "The one-count complaint alleges Himy, in exchange for more than $10,000, steered the contract the businessman's way with the help of a City Hall insider. The businessman was not named…but he contacted the FBI after Himy allegedly told him the only way he could obtain the contract was through payoffs to Himy. … Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for City Attorney John Russo, said, 'We haven't been contacted by the FBI and if there are any problems, obviously, we want to see those addressed and remedied.'" Bay City News Wires (9/15) notes, "The complaint alleges numerous discussions between Himy, a cooperating witness, and an Oakland city official, named only as 'City Official A,' involving the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering city contract that was eventually approved for the cooperating witness. Prosecutors said Himy's arrest is the result of a 17-month investigation by the FBI."

Boston Police Officers Caught In FBI Sting Indicted On Drug Charges. The AP (9/15) reports Boston police officers Roberto Pulido, Carlos Pizarro and Nelson Carrasquillo "were indicted Thursday on charges of conspiring to possess heroin and cocaine with intent to distribute, the U.S attorney's office announced." The officers "had gone to Florida, authorities said, to collect a $35,000 payment for protecting a Massachusetts shipment of cocaine that was part of an undercover FBI sting operation. At the meeting, prosecutors said, agents recorded the men agreeing to protect two more cocaine shipments totaling 100 kilograms and also to protect 5 kilograms of heroin." The Boston Herald (9/15, Sweet, Johnson, 203K) adds that the "alleged crooked cops were suspended without pay…yesterday and two of them freed on bail after their indictments by a federal grand jury on drug conspiracy charges." US District Court Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander, "unconvinced Pizarro and Carrasquillo are a flight risk or a threat to the public, set them free pending trial." The Boston Globe (9/15, 425K) also reports on the indictments in "New England in Brief."

Former Daley Patronage Chief Again Testifies Before Grand Jury. The AP (9/15, Robinson) reports former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich "made his second appearance before a federal grand jury in three weeks Thursday as prosecutors pushed ahead with an investigation of City Hall. … Sorich was one of three former officials convicted by a federal court jury July 6 in what prosecutors called a scheme to use fraud to cover up the fact that they were loading the city payroll with campaign workers." The AP notes, "U.S. attorney's office spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment on Sorich's latest grand jury appearance."

Prosecutor Makes Closing Arguments At Gotti Retrial. The New York Times (9/15, Williams, 1.21M) reports, "Closing arguments began yesterday in Federal District Court in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti, with prosecutors saying that Mr. Gotti's claim that he quit the Gambino crime family in 1999 was no more than a scheme to avoid a long prison sentence. … Mr. Gotti's defense is that he retired from the Mafia before mid-July 1999, a time frame that would protect him from prosecution because of the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges." Newsday (9/15, DeStefano) adds that Assistant US Attorney Miriam Rocah said Gotti "spent a lifetime rising to the top of the Gambino crime family and the proof was 'overwhelming' that he reaped millions of dollars through a murderous racketeering conspiracy that pillaged city businesses." She "tried to belittle the withdrawal defense, saying Gotti was deeply involved in some of the crimes. 'Proof of John Gotti Junior's participation in the charged crimes is overwhelming,' said Rocah," recalling that "mob turncoats like Michael DiLeonardo told of how he personally paid millions of dollars to Gotti in construction payoffs."

The AP (9/15, Neumeister) reports, "Rocah dismissed statements Gotti made in prison conversations in which he claimed he had quit the mob and wanted to move to Canada to start a new life. She said it was part of 'a charade contrived by Gotti to get himself off the hook.'" Rocah said that Gotti "was careful not to get too close to most crimes, relying on associates and soldiers to carry them out. … In fact, Rocah said, Gotti operated like the chief executive officer of a corporation, 'raking in millions of dollars in the 1990s.' She added: 'Throughout the 1990s, John Gotti's business was crime, and business was good.'" The New York Post (9/15, Cornell, 608K) also reports on the closing arguments, under the headline "Junior's Retirement 'Charade.'"

Genovese Capo Tied To Indicted Garbage Hauler Pleads Guilty To RICO Charge. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports, "Matthew 'Matty the Horse' Ianniello, an ailing 86-year-old longtime capo in the Genovese crime family who had ties to Danbury garbage kingpin James Galante, pleaded guilty Thursday to a racketeering charge, admitting he helped infiltrate a union and interfere with a federal grand jury probe. … A plea agreement…called for Ianniello to be sentenced to between 1½ and two years in prison. Without the deal, Ianniello would have faced up to 20 years in prison. … He also agreed to forfeit up to $1 million to the government."

Jurors Deadlocked On Death Penalty For Aryan Brotherhood Figures. The AP (9/15, Flaccus) reports, "A federal jury has failed to reach a verdict in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted in July of murder, racketeering and conspiracy, the jurors announced Thursday in a note to the judge. The same jurors convicted Barry 'The Baron' Mills and Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham in July. … After jurors indicated they were deadlocked, defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to declare a mistrial, which would result in Mills and Bingham serving life sentences without parole. Prosecutors asked that the judge consider ordering the jurors to resume deliberations and try to break the deadlock. Carter did not immediately issue a ruling."

Philadelphia Bank Vice President Charged With Embezzlement. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/15, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A former vice president of National Penn Bank was charged yesterday with embezzling $6.1 million from bank clients." Edward G. Mawhinney of Sewell "allegedly opened lines of credit under customers' names while working at the Philadelphia branch. He was charged by information instead of grand jury indictment." The Inquirer notes, "In a statement, the bank said: 'We appreciate and look forward to justice prevailing through the courts and applaud the U.S. attorney and the FBI for their diligent work in this matter.'" The Philadelphia Daily News (9/15, Hinkelman, 109K) adds, "Mawhinney stole money from these lines of credit to pay his own debts and buy his home, prosecutors said. He also gave money to benefit third parties without the bank's knowledge or approval. The third parties either got loans that had not been approved by the bank or had delinquent loans paid down or paid off completely."

Former eContent Executive Pleads Guilty To Stock Fraud. The AP (9/8) reported, "The former president of eContent Inc. pleaded guilty" to charges "that he and other officers and directors misused company funds for personal expenses. John P. Sgarlat is the second person to plead guilty in connection with wrongdoing at the company, and the investigation is continuing, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric M. Schweiker." Sgarlat "also admitted to several schemes, including one in which he improperly issued stock. Under his plea deal, Sgarlat agreed to pay restitution, in amounts to be determined. He also agreed to forfeit to the government at least $320,000, as well as a vehicle, certain artwork and an autographed Tiger Woods caddie coverall from the 2001 Masters golf tournament. The vehicle, artwork and coverall have all been seized by the FBI."

Sportingbet Chairman Resigns, Free To Return To UK. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports Sportingbet Chairman Peter Dicks, "who was arrested last week after New York customs officials discovered his name on a Louisiana warrant charging him with illegal online gambling, resigned on Thursday, the company said. … Dicks appeared in state Criminal Court in Queens on Thursday, when Judge Gene Lopez adjourned his case until Sept. 28." During the hearing, "Dicks was informed that the governor had withdrawn the warrant" from Louisiana seeking extradition, as the Dicks' lawyer had requested Wednesday. "Restrictions on Dicks' $50,000 bail that barred him from leaving New York also were lifted." Defense lawyer Barry Slotnick that "Dicks was now free to travel back to London, where he lives." The AP notes Gov. Pataki's spokeswoman, Jessica Scaperotti, "said the governor's decision was made in consultation with prosecutors in Louisiana and New York." Bloomberg (9/15) also reports on the story.

Former Michigan Prosecutor Goes On Trial For Bribery. The AP (9/15, Karush) reports, "A lawyer for a former chief prosecutor accused of helping a convicted rapist get a new trial in exchange for campaign contributions tried to cast him as an ethical man as his trial began Wednesday. … But prosecutors said Carl Marlinga let his political ambitions interfere with the pursuit of justice." The AP continues, "Marlinga's duty 'was overcome by a desperate need for money - not to line his own pockets, but to fuel his political ambitions,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares said in his opening statement to the jury." The AP adds, "Marlinga, the former Macomb County chief prosecutor, is charged with bribery, wire fraud, making false statements to the Federal Election Commission and violating federal campaign finance laws. The charges stem from the 59-year-old's failed 2002 bid for Congress. … If convicted, he could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. … Prosecutors say that Marlinga filed a motion with the Michigan Supreme Court that led to a new trial for Jeffrey Moldowan, who had been convicted in 1991 of kidnapping and raping his ex-girlfriend. Moldowan was acquitted at his new trial after spending more than 10 years behind bars. … They say he also accepted contributions in exchange for helping St. Clair Shores businessman James Hulet, accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl." The AP notes, "Marlinga was not personally involved in the prosecution of Moldowan, which was handled by an assistant prosecutor. But he took an interest after being contacted by Ralph Roberts, a prominent businessman who employed Moldowan's sister, Cares said. … Marlinga filed his motion with the Supreme Court as he was approaching an important fundraising deadline in his congressional campaign. Around the same time, Roberts contributed the maximum $2,000 allowed. Later, Roberts gave another $1,600 in his wife's name, and Marlinga also expected Roberts to host fundraisers for him, Cares said."

Florida Prison Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case. The AP (9/15, Kaczor) reports,

"One of five prison guards charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout with federal agents pleaded guilty Thursday to conspiracy to commit mail fraud." The AP continues, "Alfred Barnes, 42, of Thomasville, Ga., agreed to cooperate in the prosecution of other defendants. In exchange, the government dropped charges including witness tampering, bribery and mail fraud." The AP adds, "The five men are accused of taking part in an alleged scheme in which guards reportedly paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period. The guards also were accused of intimidating inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence. .. . Authorities said prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution on June 21 and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and the other defendants. … Hill and Justice Department special agent William 'Buddy' Sentner were killed. A prison employee assisting in the arrests was wounded. None of the surviving guards were charged in connection with the shooting."

US Warns Consumers About "Liberty Dollar" Coins. USA Today (9/15, Hagenbaugh) reports, "The government Thursday warned consumers and businesses that it is illegal to use alternative money known as 'Liberty Dollar' coins, which organizers promote as a competitor to the almighty dollar. … 'We don't want consumers to be fooled,' U.S. Mint spokeswoman Becky Bailey says, noting U.S. Attorneys offices across the USA have noticed a marked increase in inquiries about the coins. … The coins' producers vowed to fight the government's decision." USA continues, "Evansville, Ind.-based National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code, otherwise known as NORFED, has been making the Liberty Dollar coins for eight years and claims $20 million is in circulation. The group says the money, unlike official U.S. cash, has a hedge against inflation because it is made almost entirely of silver and is backed by stocks of silver and gold in a vault in Idaho. … The coins are then spent by the group's 2,500 Liberty Associates in stores run by fellow supporters or are accepted unknowingly by clerks who are unaware they are not receiving real money." USA adds, "The Justice Department has determined that use of Liberty Dollars, which come in varying denominations, 'is a crime,' according to the Mint, which issued a rare public warning Thursday. … 'The United States Mint is the only entity that can produce coins,' Bailey says." USA notes, "The Mint notes the coins share some resemblances to real money, such as the term 'Trust in God' instead of 'In God We Trust' and use of a torch in the design. Such similarities may confuse people into thinking the money is real, the Mint says. … But NORFED says it will challenge the government, arguing it has never claimed Liberty Dollars were official money and that it has a right to offer an alternative."

Judge Denies Bond For Illinois Man Charged With Producing Child Pornography. The AP (9/15) reports, "A federal judge (in Springfield, IL) denied bond Thursday for a 65-year-old man accused of creating sexual images of children in a photo studio above a hair salon." The AP continues, "Paul Kincaid, who is charged with possessing child pornography and producing it near his home in Litchfield, will remain in the custody of U.S. marshals pending trail, said Sharon Paul, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield. … 'The judge found that he presented a danger to the community,' Paul said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors accuse Kincaid of using a Polaroid camera to create sexual images of minors in a makeshift photo studio above a hair salon near his home. … Kincaid's attorney, Jon Gray Noll, said after the judge's ruling that it's too early to say how his client might eventually plea. … 'We have to see the pretrial discovery, we have to see how the evidence was obtained,' he said. 'I've had a lot tougher cases that we've won.' … Authorities said they seized hundred of images of child pornography, including photo albums, from Kincaid's home, which is located about 50 miles south of Springfield."

Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In California Hit-And-Run Deaths. The AP (9/15, Glazer) reports, "A pair of elderly women charged with murdering two transient men and illegally collecting millions from their life insurance policies have pleaded not guilty." The AP continues, "Helen Golay, 75, and Hungarian-born Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, each face two counts of murder and two counts of conspiracy to commit murder for financial gain in the deaths of Paul Vados, 73, a Hungarian native, in November 1999, and Kenneth McDavid, 51, in June 2005. The women are being held without bail as long as prosecutors consider a death sentence for them." The AP adds, "Authorities alleged that Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, convinced the men to sign them on to their life insurance policies and then collected some $2.3 million after running them over in secluded alleys. … Superior Court Commissioner James Bianco on Wednesday denied Golay's request to be allowed to have mascara and tweezers to pluck her eyebrows, to wear her own clothes and to be awakened no earlier than 7 a.m. on court days. … Rutterschmidt's attorney, Michael Sklar, challenged the legality of conspiracy charges against her, but Bianco ruled that the charges could stand. Sklar also said he had not yet received evidence from the state."

Karr To Fight Child Pornography Charges In California. USA Today (9/15, Ritter) reports from Los Angeles, "John Mark Karr, briefly a suspect in JonBenét Ramsey's murder, was back in court here Thursday for the first time since he jumped bail five years ago to avoid child pornography charges." USA continues, "Karr's chief lawyer, Robert Amparan, said the 41-year-old former teacher will fight the misdemeanor charges and has no plans to cut a deal with prosecutors involving a guilty plea in exchange for a sentence of time served and probation." USA adds, "Karr, unshackled in a blue jailhouse jumpsuit, sat passively as lawyers debated whether cameras should be allowed at his trial on five counts of possessing pornography, brought when investigators allegedly found illicit images on his computer. … Defense lawyer Gayle Gutekunst argued that a simple misdemeanor case had 'exploded into a media event' that could make it hard to find impartial jurors. … 'The court can put the skids on this and help return the case to what it was in 2001,' Gutekunst said." USA notes, "Judge Cerena Wong rejected TV cameras but said she'd permit one still photography camera. Wong said Karr's trial would begin Oct. 2 but scheduled a hearing to resolve a dispute over whether prosecutors can seek a delay. Karr will get a bail hearing Tuesday. … Authorities here regained custody of Karr this week after the Boulder, Colo., district attorney said Karr no longer was a suspect in Ramsey's December 1996 death because DNA tests failed to put him at the crime scene."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Closes Probe Of Maryland Teen's Death. The AP (9/15) reports, "The Justice Department has ended an investigation into the death of a black teenager at a party in Anne Arundel County." The AP continues, "Seventeen-year-old Noah Jamahl Jones was killed in the summer of 2004 in an altercation that involved six white men in Pasadena." The AP adds, "The Justice Department began its investigation after allegations were made that Jones' death might have resulted from a racially motivated attack. But it said Thursday that there is insufficient evidence to pursue criminal civil rights charges. … One of the men was acquitted in state court last year of voluntary manslaughter."

Missouri Judge Strikes Down New Voter ID Law. The New York Times/AP (9/15, Press) reports a Missouri judge "struck down the state's new voter identification law as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote. The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls." Judge Richard Callahan "of Cole County Circuit Court, said that was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those ID's was not free."

The AP (9/15, Wiese) reports Gov. Matt Blunt, "a Republican who backed the law, decried the decision. 'This is a constitutionally sound law that will help improve Missourians' confidence in the elections process and help combat those who attempt to manipulate the system,' he said in a written statement."

Newdow Sues Web Commentator For Defamation. The California Recorder (9/15, Mckee) reports, "Sacramento, Calif., atheist Michael Newdow took plenty of grief from conservative commentators two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to get the words 'under God' taken out of the Pledge of Allegiance. … But being called a liar in an online column was more than he could stand -- and a Northern California minister could pay the price." The Recorder continues, "This Monday, Newdow -- who's both a lawyer and an emergency room physician -- is scheduled to appear in San Francisco's 1st District Court of Appeal to argue that his libel suit against the Rev. Austin Miles should be allowed to proceed. … Newdow claims that Miles -- a self-described 'interdenominational chaplain' who writes conservative columns posted on the Internet -- defamed him by accusing him of committing perjury before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals during the pledge case. Specifically, Newdow claims Miles accused him, in posts on two news service sites, of telling the court his young daughter suffered emotional distress as the result of being forced to recite the pledge in her classroom. Newdow insists he never said that. … Instead, he says, he only argued that children, including his daughter, are unduly influenced when a state-run school leads them in a ritual proclaiming the existence of God. … 'Had Miles done as any reasonable person would have done -- i.e., simply read the 9th Circuit's panel decision before writing his article,' Newdow wrote in court papers, 'he would have quickly appreciated that his "view" ... was 100 percent wrong.'" The Recorder notes, "The 9th Circuit in 2002 agreed with Newdow's claim that the pledge, as recited in public schools, violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. But two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court tossed Newdow's suit, voting 5-3 that he didn't have standing to bring it in the first place. … Since then, Newdow has pursued the merits of his arguments by representing an unnamed 'Roe' client in challenging the pledge again. That case is now pending before the 9th Circuit, as is a separate case of Newdow's challenging the inclusion of the words 'In God We Trust' on American money. … In his case against Miles, Newdow won a $1 million default judgment in Superior Court in June 2004 after Miles failed to respond to the initial complaint. That judgment was later set aside, though, after the trial court found that Miles, through no fault of his own, had no actual notice of the suit."

Navy Court Finds Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order. The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports a Navy court found Protestant chaplain Lt. Gordon Klingenschmitt guilty of "disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House in March," and will reprimand him and dock his pay. Klingenschmitt, who "has been a vocal critic of the Navy's policies on prayer in ceremonial settings," said he "intends to 'appeal by all means possible all the way to the Supreme Court.'"

The AP (9/15, Barisic) reports, "Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic Region, must decide whether to approve the recommendation. … The jury of five officers at Klingenschmitt's special court-martial determined Wednesday that he had disobeyed a superior officer's order prohibiting him from wearing his uniform during media appearances without prior permission." The AP notes, "The charge centered on a March 30 news conference protesting a Navy policy that requires nondenominational prayers outside of religious services. … Klingenschmitt had argued that he was allowed to wear his uniform if conducting a 'bona fide worship service.' He said he believes he was punished for making a political speech in uniform because he prayed in Jesus' name."

Religious Conservatives Say Gay Marriage Debate Prompts Attacks On Religion. The AP (9/15, Kuhnhenn) reports conservative religious leaders, "sensing declining alarm over same-sex marriage, are warning that the debate over homosexuality has prompted attacks on religious freedom." By "expanding the discussion from marriage to religious expression, social conservatives say they will reconnect with religious voters and religious leaders who don't necessarily view same-sex unions as a threat." Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council said, "There are a number of pastors that said, 'Look, we don't get involved in politics, I'm not going to get involved in this issue, I just want to preach the gospel.' When they realize their ability to preach the gospel may very well be at stake, they may reconsider their involvement." The AP adds Perkins "and others are building a case file of anecdotes where they say religious people have spoken out against gay marriage only to be punished."

ANTITRUST:

Exelon, PSEG Abandon Merger Plans Over New Jersey Problems. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Smith) reports, "Prospects for big utility mergers dimmed with Exelon Corp.'s announcement yesterday that it has abandoned its acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc., a deal valued at about $17.7 billion that would have created the nation's largest utility company by serving 18 million people." The Journal continues, "Exelon blamed its decision, which was expected, on 'insurmountable' obstacles, chiefly rate concessions and power-plant divestitures sought by public officials and consumer advocates in New Jersey, where PSEG is based. Exelon, of Chicago, spent more than $100 million pursuing PSEG in a deal announced in December 2004." The Journal adds, "The longer the approval process became, the more costly the transaction was for Exelon shareholders. What started out as a $12 billion deal became a $17.7 billion transaction as Exelon's stock price appreciated. … Many industry economists say such combinations can make companies more skillful operators and reduce geographic risk caused by weather. New Jersey officials feared the loss of local oversight. Exelon sought to allay fears by promising to keep PSEG's headquarters in Newark, N.J."

Market Watch (9/15, Dalton) reports, "A driving force behind the merger was the hope that Exelon, a highly regarded operator of nuclear power plants, could improve the performance of PSEG's two troubled nuclear plants, Hope Creek and Salem. The plants have improved dramatically since Exelon began operating them following the announcement of the merger in December 2004. Some investors have been concerned that the plants' performance might regress if the deal fell apart." Market Watch adds, "The U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Justice Department, and Illinois and Pennsylvania regulators had approved the merger. But New Jersey consumer advocates and large industrial firms raised concerns that the combined company would own so many power plants in the state that it could effectively corner the electricity market and raise prices without fear of competition."

Bloomberg (9/15, Polson, Lonkevich) reports, "The companies had offered to sell power plants and place output from nuclear plants under long-term contracts to win approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. … New Jersey 'apparently feels that the commitments we had to make to FERC and DOJ, those divestiture obligations, were not enough,' Public Service Enterprise Group Chief Executive E. James Ferland said in an interview today. 'We don't agree with that.' … The regulators demanded further plant divestitures and constraints on sales from generators the companies would keep, he said."

Barnett Critical Of EU Action Against Apple. The IDG News Service (9/15, Gohring) reports, "A U.S. Department of Justice official has joined the debate surrounding Apple Computer's proprietary digital music technology by criticizing European antitrust activities, but groups attacking Apple are defending their actions." IDG continues, "Speaking in Washington, D.C., on Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general at the DOJ's antitrust division, warned that forcing companies to reveal their intellectual property stifles innovation. He used Apple as an example, in a nod to growing discontent in Europe regarding the way that music purchased from iTunes is tied to the iPod." IDG adds, "Architects of complaints against Apple in Europe say he's got it wrong. 'We're not attacking intellectual property rights but saying they should be implemented in a way which doesn't dictate which player you use,' said Torgeir Waterhouse, a senior advisor with the Norwegian Consumer Council. … His organization filed a complaint to Norway's consumer representative, or ombudsman, arguing that it's illegal for Apple to limit iTunes customers to playing music from the store exclusively on iPods. Along with similar representatives in Denmark and Sweden, the Norwegian ombudsman asked Apple to defend its policy. In a written reply, Apple said it won't budge on the issue but the company plans to meet representatives from the countries later this month to further discuss the issue. If Apple won't open up, the ombudsman will take the company to court." IDG notes, "Barnett's criticisms of European antitrust policy, including comments that the policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers, are generally in line with comments from U.S. officials since the Bush administration came to power, said Scott Megregian, a partner and head of the European competition group in the law firm McDermott Will & Emery UK."

Rent-A-Center Gets Antitrust Nod To Acquire Rent-Way. The AP (9/15) reports, "Rent-A-Center Inc., the largest U.S. furniture rental chain, and Rent-Way Inc., a rent-to-own chain operator, said Thursday that Rent-A-Center's planned acquisition of Rent-Way has gotten government antitrust clearance." The AP continues, "The waiting period for the deal, required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust improvement Act of 1976, expired Sept. 13. … The acquisition is expected to be completed in the fourth quarter." The AP adds, "Plano, Texas-based Rent-A-Center will pay about $576 million to buy Rent-Way of Erie, Pa., in a deal announced in August. … The acquisition marks an end to Rent-Way's six-year turnaround after a scandal. … Rent-Way, founded in 1981, was rocked by an accounting scandal six years ago when founder and CEO William Morgenstern announced that some executives had cooked the company's books to meet Wall Street earnings expectations in the late 1990s. … A federal investigation confirmed that three company officers acted on their own, improperly writing down $98 million in operating expenses. Rent-Way closed a $25 million settlement with shareholders in 2004."

Texas Lawmakers Plot Legislative Strategy For Airfield Pact. The Dallas Morning News (9/15, Reddy) reports, "Facing a delicate negotiation over their Wright bill, Texas lawmakers said Thursday that they were moving ahead to get the North Texas compromise through the full House as early as next week." The News continues, "Some indicated they were unwilling to accept a revision to the House bill removing antitrust immunity as the final word for the legislation to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field. … 'It's just a bump in the road,' said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth." The News adds, "Getting the Wright bill passed in time depends largely on how successful members are in quickly reconciling competing versions of the legislation that have passed two House committees. … House members have only nine more voting days before they're scheduled to return home to campaign for the November elections. … Lawmakers also must find a way to steer the legislation through obstacles in the Senate. … 'We're trying every creative way to get to the goal of preserving the balance of the agreement, protecting the interests of all the parties and getting it through the Congress,' said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who is leading the effort in the upper chamber." The News notes, "The House Judiciary Committee on Wednesday removed an antitrust exemption sought by Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport in the legislation to lift the 1979 Wright law. … The five parties fear a long court battle, if the deal isn't given protections by Congress. … The bill would implement a June agreement by the five North Texas parties to lift limits on long-haul flights at Love in 2014. It would allow immediate one-stop flights across the U.S., as long as passengers first stopped in one of the nine states in the Wright perimeter."

FCC Accused Of Ordering Destruction Of Media Ownership Study. The AP (9/15, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission ordered its staff to destroy all copies of a draft study that suggested greater concentration of media ownership would hurt local TV news coverage, a former lawyer at the agency says. The report, written in 2004, came to light during the Senate confirmation hearing for FCC Chairman Kevin Martin." Sen. Barbara Boxer "received a copy of the report 'indirectly from someone within the FCC who believed the information should be made public,' according to Boxer spokeswoman Natalie Ravitz." Adam Candeub, now a law professor at Michigan State University, "said senior managers at the agency ordered that 'every last piece' of the report be destroyed. 'The whole project was just stopped -- end of discussion,' he said."

EU To Probe Microsoft Office. The AP (9/15) reports, "The European Union's antitrust commission plans to investigate complaints regarding Microsoft Office, said EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes Thursday." The AP continues, "Kroes, speaking at the Fordham Annual Conference on International Antitrust Law & Policy, did not elaborate on the investigation. … Microsoft Corp. has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format. Microsoft claimed it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the ability to save Office documents in either the popular Portable Document Format or Microsoft's new, competing XPS format." The AP adds, "The EU has a long-running antitrust action against Microsoft, which dates to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling that came with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July. … Kroes said the Commission's actions on Microsoft 'will result in benefits in terms of industrial competitiveness and will result in more innovation and lower prices for consumers.' … European Union officials warned Microsoft on Tuesday not to shut out rivals in the security software market as the company plans to launch its Windows Vista operating system with built-in protection from hackers and malicious programs."

EU Eyes US-Style Private Damage Suits. Dow Jones (9/15) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Thursday that she plans to devise a way to encourage private damage suits by early next year." Dow Jones continues, "Speaking at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York, Kroes said the U.S. 'has traveled much further down this road than we have in Europe' and that the E.U. needed to catch up. 'Watch this space because we'll try to draw some conclusions from the debate early next year,' she said." Dow Jones adds, "Kroes has long said private action, including lawsuits, can increase competition without adding to regulators' workload. … The European antitrust chief said regulators were now considering how to draft regulations that would 'make sure that private cases are actually brought to court, in other words, that the benefits of bringing proceedings outweigh the costs.' She also said any new regulation must ensure 'that our public and private enforcement systems are complementary.'" Dow Jones notes, "Kroes said regulators on both sides of the Atlantic were working well together to crack down on cartels. … She said she had created a dedicated cartel-busting office with 60 officials, with powers to levy increased fines, and had implemented a U.S.-style 'carrot and stick approach' by letting informers escape fines."

GE Sells Unit To Apollo For $3.8 Billion. The Financial Times (9/15, Guerrera) reports, "General Electric has sold its low-margin materials unit to the private equity firm Apollo Management for $3.8bn in cash and shares. It marks the latest attempt by the conglomerate to focus on high-growth businesses and revive its share price." The Times adds, "The deal – announced on Thursday – is part of GE's strategy of exiting low-growth markets and underlines the appetite of buy-out groups for industrial businesses that require substantial investment and restructuring."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Kranhold) reports, "GE also has been weighing the future of its plastics business, where former Chairman Jack Welch cut his teeth and where Mr. Immelt once worked, according to people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear whether GE is considering selling the unit, which generates annual sales of $6.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The unit it agreed to sell yesterday makes silicone used in adhesives and sealants and quartz used in semiconductor manufacturing and in tubing for fiber-optics and lamps. The unit, with annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion and 5,000 employees, has its headquarters in Wilton, Conn. GE doesn't disclose its earnings. … GE, Fairfield, Conn., said it would retain a 10% stake in the operation, which it called its advanced-materials group. It will also hold $400 million in debt obligations that yield interest payments."

Iamgold To Purchase Cambior For $1.2 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/15) reports, "Iamgold Corp. has agreed to acquire Cambior Inc. for US$1.2 billion in stock, a premium of nearly a third to Cambior's market capitalization." The Journal continues, "The companies said the new Iamgold will be the 10th largest publicly traded primary gold producer in the world, with 1.1 million ounces of gold production annually, reserves totaling 9.7 million ounces and a market capitalization of US$3 billion." The Journal adds, "Under the transaction, shareholders of Cambior will receive 0.42 of an Iamgold share for each share held, worth about C$4.83, a 31% premium to Cambior's shares at Wednesday's close in Toronto. Cambior's U.S.-listed shares jumped 24% in premarket trading Thursday on Inet. Iamgold's shares were unchanged."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

California Seen As Taking Risk With Global Warming Plan. The New York Times (9/15, Barringer, 1.21M) reports that in "the Rocky Mountain States and the fast-growing desert Southwest, more than 20 power plants, designed to burn coal that is plentiful and cheap, are on the drawing boards. Much of the power, their owners expected, would be destined for the people of California." But California "has just delivered a new message to these energy suppliers: If you cannot produce power with the lowest possible emissions of these greenhouse gases, we are not interested." California's decision to "impose stringent demands on suppliers even outside its borders, broadened by the Legislature on Aug. 31 and awaiting the governor's signature, is but one example of the state's wide-ranging effort to remake its energy future." The Democratic-controlled legislature "and the Republican governor also agreed at that time on legislation to reduce industrial carbon dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020, a measure that affects not only power plants but also other large producers of carbon dioxide, including oil refineries and cement plants." The state's aim "is to reduce emissions of climate-changing gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas. Other states, particularly New York, are moving in some of the same directions, but no state is moving as aggressively on as many fronts. No state has been at it longer. No state is putting more at risk."

DOE Seeks To Eliminate Funding For Hydropower, Geothermal Research. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Clayton, 58K) reports the "Department of Energy (DOE) is quitting the hydropower and geothermal power research business - if Congress will let it." The "Bush administration in its FY 2007 budget request eliminates hydropower and geothermal research, venerable programs with roots in the energy crises of the 1970s. 'What we do well is research and funding of new, novel technologies,' says Craig Stevens, chief spokesman for the DOE. 'From a policy perspective, geothermal and hydro are mature technologies. We believe the market can take the lead on this at this point.'" However, "'zeroing out' such research could end up being a penny-wise, pound-foolish move, some energy advocates say. Any savings from the cuts would be nil since all of the nearly $24 million ($1 million from hydropower and $23 million from geothermal) research funding would go to other programs such as biofuels."

Interior Department Near Royalties Agreement With Shell, BP-Amoco. The New York Times (9/15, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department, struggling to prevent the government from losing billions of dollars in royalties for oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters, said Thursday that it was close to agreement with 2 of the 56 companies that hold lucrative drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico. The two companies, Royal Dutch Shell and BP-Amoco, are among the biggest producers along the outer continental shelf." Ten companies, including Chevron and Exxon, have begun negotiations over their contracts. However, "even as Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed outrage that the government could lose more than $10 billion over the next decade, the Bush administration said it flatly opposed House bills that would pressure oil companies into renegotiating flawed leases that the government signed in the late 1990's. The 56 companies hold leases that allow them to extract billions of dollars in oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico without paying any royalties, regardless of how high energy prices or the industry's profits might climb."

Arizona Border Tribe Gets Squeezed By Illegal Immigration, Crackdown. The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Pomfret, 748K) reports as the United States "ramps up its law enforcement presence on the border with Mexico, places like Alir Jegk, a village of 50 families in south-central Arizona, are enduring heightened danger, as they are squeezed between increasingly aggressive bands of immigrant and drug smugglers and increasingly numerous federal agents who, critics say, often ignore regulations as they seek to enforce the law." Alir Jegk's experience "is complicated by the fact that it is on the second-biggest Indian reservation in the United States, belonging to the Tohono O'odham, or Desert People, who hunted deer and boar and harvested wild spinach and prickly pear in this region before an international border was etched through their land in 1853. Now, the Tohono O'odham Nation occupies the front line of the fight against drug and immigrant smuggling -- costing the poverty-stricken tribe millions of dollars a year and threatening what remains of its traditions." About "11,000 Tohono O'odham live on a 2.8 million-acre reservation, the size of Connecticut, with a 75-mile-long border with Mexico."

US Charges Four In New York Drug Conspiracy. The AP (9/15) reports, "A federal grand jury (in Binghamton, NY) on Thursday indicted one man on a murder charge and three others for racketeering and narcotics conspiracy." The AP continues, "The men were part of a drug-trafficking ring that operated in the Ithaca area, New York City, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, said U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby." The AP adds, "Guillermo Payano, 30, of Ithaca, was charged with the murder of Alexander Miller, 24. … Miller was discovered in May 2000 on a partially overgrown service road leading into Buttermilk Falls State Park. He had been shot in the head. … Benoni Bryant, 29, Darnell Shepherd, 29, and Pablo Lopez, 25, all of Ithaca, were charged with conspiracy and racketeering. … Payano, Bryant and Shepherd are in custody. Lopez is still at large. … The U.S. Justice Department has not yet determined whether it will seek the death penalty for Payano, Suddaby said."

Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court. The AP (9/15, McCall) reports, "Five of the dozen suspects in what federal prosecutors say is a $20 million international drug ring started by high school friends made their initial appearance in court Thursday in the first step toward an expected trial in Idaho." The fiver "were among the 11 men arrested Wednesday by federal agents in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Colorado. One man, from California, remained a fugitive." U.S. Magistrate Janice Stewart "delayed reading of the charges in the 196-page indictment until attorneys could be appointed or retained for the five men." When the requested lawyers, she "warned them they would have to reimburse the government if it was determined they could afford their own attorneys, rather than having a defender appointed by the court."

DEA Raid Nets 23 Arrests For Cocaine Dealing In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (9/15, Yang) reports, "Police today announced charges against 23 people after raiding a suspected drug house on Chicago's South Side Wednesday morning," and "Undercover officers from the Chicago Police Department and members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration worked on their investigation, dubbed 'Operation Sith,' for 2 ½ months before raiding the home." According to authorities, "the suspects are all members of the Gangster Disciples street gang and they pedaled small packages of crack cocaine worth $5 each, earning $10,000 to $15,000 a day in drug sales," although "the DEA is currently analyzing the drugs confiscated during the raid, and has not yet estimated their total worth."

US Takes Up Case Of Iowa Abortion Clinic Crash. The Quad-City (IA) Times (9/15, Baker) reports, "Federal officials decided late Wednesday to take up the case against David Robert McMenemy, the Michigan man who is accused of crashing his car into a Davenport medical center Monday because he thought it was an abortion clinic." The Times continues, "The case will be pursued through the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of Iowa, Davenport, and the Rock Island office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, or ATF." The Times adds, "Police say McMenemy, 45, came to Davenport from the suburbs of Detroit, and drove his compact car into the Edgerton Women's Health Center, 1510 E. Rusholme St., early Monday morning. … The facility was founded in 1972 to provide prenatal care and medical services to low-income and underprivileged women. It does not perform abortions, nor does it make abortion referrals, Center President Tom Fedje said." The Times notes, "After the car came to rest in the lobby area, Davenport police said McMenemy exited the vehicle and scattered gasoline over the car's interior before lighting it. He left the building and surrendered to Davenport firefighters, Fire Marshal Mike Hayman said. … Federal charges are appropriate in the case because McMenemy traveled across three states to commit the act of violence, Scott County Attorney Bill Davis said."

Celebrity Bounty Hunter Arrested In Hawaii. The AP (9/15, Niesse) reports, "TV reality star Duane 'Dog' Chapman and two co-stars on his show were arrested Thursday in Hawaii on charges of illegal detention and conspiracy in the bounty hunters' capture three years ago of a cosmetics company heir." The AP continues, "Chapman, son Leland Chapman and associate Timothy Chapman -- who is not related to the other Chapmans -- were taken into custody and did not resist arrest, said Mark Hanohano, U.S. Marshal for the district of Hawaii. 'It went down without incident,' Hanohano said." The AP adds, "Mona K. Wood, a publicist for the star of the popular cable series Dog The Bounty Hunter, said Chapman would be vindicated. 'He arrests the bad guys -- and he is definitely not one of them,' she said." The AP notes, "The charges stem from Chapman's capture of Max Factor heir Andrew Luster on June 18, 2003, in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, said Marshals spokeswoman Nikki Credic in Washington. … Chapman's capture of Luster, who had fled the country while on trial on charges he raped three women, catapulted the 53-year-old bounty hunter to fame and led to the reality series on A&E."

The New York Times (9/15, Carr) reports, "In a twist that will not be lost on fans of Mr. Chapman's program, 'Dog the Bounty Hunter,' on the A&E cable network, Mexico is seeking to extradite him for posting bail and then failing to appear to answer criminal charges in July 2003. … His wife, Beth Chapman, also a star in the series, said Mr. Chapman left Mexico on the advice of his lawyers, who feared for his safety in the Mexican prison system."

IMMIGRATION:

Employers Concerned About Hiring Practices After Immigration Raids. The Miami Daily Business Review (9/15, Riddick) reports, "Federal immigration officials recently arrested 55 undocumented workers in a raid in Tallahassee. The workers from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, were employed by General Building Maintenance, which had a contract to clean state government buildings. They face deportation." The Review continues, "Federal officials declined to say how U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) found out about the illegal immigrants, or whether any company executives would face criminal charges." The Review adds, "Some South Florida labor and employment lawyers warn that such federal raids signal that companies here must take serious steps to ensure that they are not employing undocumented workers -- either directly or through subcontractors. That could have a major impact on Florida's economy, which quietly has depended on illegal workers. … Many employers in the state's large agricultural, tourism and construction industries are nervous. And so are immigrant workers." The Review notes, "Congress has hit an impasse in its debate over whether and how to crack down on illegal immigration. But ICE and its parent agency, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, have decided not to wait for new legislation. Relying on existing law, ICE has engaged in high-profile raids of worksites employing undocumented workers."

Two Polish Nationals Plead Guilty To "Leasing" Illegal Workers. The AP (9/15) reports,

"Two Polish nationals have pleaded guilty to leasing out illegal immigrants from eastern Europe to work on U.S. farms, dairies and factories, prosecutors said. A third was sentenced to prison a year after pleading guilty to similar federal charges." The AP continues, "Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, pleaded guilty Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra to federal charges of fraud and conspiracy to transport, house and otherwise encourage illegal immigrants to remain in the United States." The AP adds, "Pavel Preus, 39, pleaded guilty to similar charges in September 2005. Marra sentenced him to 37 months in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Preus was also ordered to pay $950,000 for unpaid payroll taxes. … Sentencing for Bogacki and Sawczuk was scheduled Dec. 15. Both face a maximum of 20 years in prison and fines up to $500,000. The U.S. government is also seeking the forfeiture of Bogacki's assets. … The three men were arrested in April 2005. Three citizens of the Slovak Republic also named in the original 26-count indictment are believed to be overseas, prosecutors said."

House Votes To Build New Fencing Along Mexican Border. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) reported, "House Republicans voted 283-138 to build new fencing along the border with Mexico. The House approved that provision last year as well, but just weeks before congressional elections, Republican members are eager to show they're tough on border security."

The New York Times (9/15, Lipton, 1.21M) says "the fence proposal represents a last-minute push by Republicans for at least part of their border security agenda. … More than 60 Democrats joined with Republican House members" to vote for it," but "other Democrats in the House and Senate ridiculed it, saying that the fence alone would not solve the border problem and that the bill did not provide the more that $2 billion that it would cost to build." Republican leaders "are hoping to insert language into the larger budget bill for domestic security that is in a conference committee to address chemical plant security, FEMA restructuring and, perhaps, additional provisions."

The Washington Times (9/15, Hurt, 88K) reports, "When the House last year approved its border-security legislation, it included almost exactly the same fencing. The fence came to symbolize what many Democrats said was an unforgiving bill. They said the fence proved that Republicans harbored a hostility toward immigrants." But "by yesterday, more than 20 Democrats had switched their position to support the border fence -- including several who face tough elections this fall. Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Tennessee Democrat who is running for the Senate, said, 'For the country to be secure, we have to have control over who gets in and who's allowed to stay.'"

The AP (9/15, Gamboa) reports, "Supporters of the new House bill said the new fencing would let Border Patrol agents focus more on apprehending illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico rather than having to man the entire border." The bill passed yesterday "doesn't pay for the fence. Republicans, estimating the cost at more than $2 billion, said that will be covered in a later spending bill." Democrats "estimated the fence would cost $7 billion, based on information from the Department of Homeland Security on costs per mile of a double-layer fence." The bill also "directs the Homeland Security Department to take control of the border in 18 months and gives border agents new authority to stop fleeing vehicles. It also calls for a study of the need for a fence on the US-Canadian border."

The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Gaouette, 918K) reports the vote "demonstrated that even as Capitol Hill remained deadlocked over what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already in this country, bipartisan support existed for significantly toughening border security, especially as the November election neared." The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Rogers, 2.03M) says "the leadership's primary concern" yesterday was "to try to help its vulnerable members shore up support among conservatives ahead of the Nov. 7 elections."

McClatchy (9/15, Montgomery) notes House leaders "have refused to consider a comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and US citizenship. The measure also includes a version of the president's guest-worker plan, as well as stiffer border-enforcement measures." President Bush, "who met Thursday morning on Capitol Hill with Republican House members, this week renewed his call for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. His administration has embraced limited fencing as a partial solution to strengthening the border, but not to the extent proposed by the House."

Critics Said To Be Making Incorrect Claims About Cost Of Senate Bill. Robert Greenstein, executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, and James Horney, senior fellow at the center and former chief of the budget projections unit at the Congressional Budget Office, write in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K), "Would offering undocumented immigrants a path to legalization bust the federal budget? Critics of the Senate immigration bill, which seeks to crack down on illegal immigration while giving many currently undocumented workers a chance to work legally in this country, tout a Congressional Budget Office study that they say shows the bill would cost a whopping $126 billion over 10 years. A fair reading of that study, however, suggests that the bill's actual impact on the deficit would be close to zero and that it could even be beneficial. … So how did critics of the Senate bill arrive at the sensational $126 billion figure, which appears nowhere in the CBO report? First, they counted all of the bill's spending increases while ignoring all of its increases in revenue. … They also incorrectly assumed that the Senate bill requires $78 billion in added discretionary spending." Greeinsyein and Horney conclude, "As Congress searches for agreement on immigration legislation, mistaken claims that the Senate bill would bust the budget only make this already difficult job harder."

Immigration Creating "Mini-Melting Pot" In Utah. USA Today (9/15, El Nasser, 2.27M) reports that as immigration "sweeps through Utah, traditionally one of the least diverse and most conservative states in the nation, its impact is particularly dramatic. About 98% white until 1970, Utah is becoming a mini-melting pot." While conservative Republicans in the House "are pushing to tighten borders and make illegal immigrants felons, factors unique to Utah are attracting Hispanics to this reddest of red states. Among them: the Mormon Church's philosophy of outreach and its embrace of large families." These influences "have helped give the state a reputation of being warm and welcoming to immigrants. Utah allows the undocumented to drive legally with a "driving privilege card." They can attend public colleges and universities and pay in-state tuition. Minorities — mostly Hispanics — make up 16.5% of the population, up from 8.8% in 1990. They could reach 20% by 2010."

TAX:

IRS Revokes Anti-Abortion Group's Tax Exemption. The New York Times (9/15, Strom, 1.21M) reports the Internal Revenue Service "this week revoked the tax exemption of an anti-abortion group, Operation Rescue West, after receiving a complaint that it had violated prohibitions on electioneering by nonprofits in 2004." The group had "promised tax deductions for contributions to help defeat the Democratic presidential candidate, Senator John Kerry. The organization said the agency's ruling would have little impact on its operations."

GOP May Add Estate Tax Cut To Government Funding Resolution. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

SCOTUS To Provide Same-Day Transcripts Online. The Legal Times (9/15, Mauro) reports, "Starting in October you won't have to be inside the marble chamber of the Supreme Court to gain a same-day understanding of the thrust and parry of a particular oral argument." The Times continues, "The Court announced Thursday that it will be posting on its Web site the transcripts of oral arguments on the same day they occur -- far faster than the previous practice of releasing them up to two weeks afterward. … The announcement may seem like a small step that falls well short of opening the Court to television or radio broadcasting. But at an institution that still hands out quill pens to lawyers who argue before it, the change is significant. And access advocates hope it signals a new climate of openness under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. " The Times adds, "Roberts' predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, experimented with same-day release of the audio of oral arguments to accommodate the public interest in the Florida presidential election cases of 2000. Similar releases have occurred sporadically ever since, and all the justices who have spoken publicly about the practice have said they approve. … But oral-argument transcripts have posed different issues, including the Court's relationship with the Alderson Reporting Co., which has long provided transcripts to the Court for free -- but at a more leisurely pace, usually a week or more after the argument. For a fee, Alderson would also provide transcripts late in the same day or overnight to interested lawyers and other parties, including the press. Alderson officials on Thursday declined to comment on the new arrangement and how it may affect the company's sales of Court transcripts to private parties."

The Washington Post (9/15, A8, Lane) reports, "There is no sign that the court is about to yield to calls for live television coverage, which the justices have steadfastly refused. But, in the quiet, tradition-bound world of the Supreme Court, yesterday's decision was almost revolutionary, court analysts said. … 'It's a tremendous opening to the outside world,' said Richard Lazarus, a professor of law at Georgetown University and co-director of the school's Supreme Court Institute." The Post adds, "Coupled with another recent innovation, the identification in the transcripts of which justice is asking a particular question, the court's new policy 'creates the potential for more intelligent speculation by more people than just those who were in the courtroom about how a particular case is going to come out,' Lazarus said."

House Changes Rules To Curtail Anonymous Earmarking. The AP (9/15, Abrams) reports, "The House changed its rules Thursday to require lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation, a modest step toward restoring the reputation of Congress in a year of ethical lapses and scandals involving relations with lobbyists." The change, "in effect only through year's end, is aimed at curtailing a practice whereby lawmakers anonymously insert 'earmarks' -- narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district -- into bills." President Bush "said in a statement the bill make sure 'lawmakers and the public are better informed before Congress votes to spend the taxpayers' money.'" Democrats "disparaged the measure, citing the failure of the Republican-led Congress to pass more comprehensive legislation to clean up lawmaker relations with lobbyists." The New York Times (9/15, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) notes "the resolution passed 245 to 171, with 24 Republicans and 147 Democrats voting against it."

The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Birnbaum, 748K) reports, "The rule change shelves a wider ethics bill…at least until next year. … 'This bill represents the death of lobby reform,' said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee." The Senate "is working on its own change in earmarks rules, which its leaders also hope to approve in lieu of broad ethics legislation this year, top staffers said. The staffers added that subjecting earmarks to more sunshine will allow lawmakers to tell their constituents that they addressed their ethics concerns even though the broad overhaul bill failed."

The Washington Times (9/15, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Watchdog groups estimate the nearly 10,000 earmarks submitted this year cost taxpayers $29 billion." GOP Rep. Jeff Flake, "one of the biggest critics of earmarking, called the bill a 'little dose' of accountability and transparency, but said he doubts earmarking will cease." The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Levey, Simon, 918K) also reports the story under the headline "House Takes a Cautious Step on Ethics."

Vitter, DeMint Will Block Von Eschenbach Nomination. The New York Times (9/15, Harris, 1.21M) reports, "Two Republican senators have promised to block the nomination of Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, illustrating just how difficult filling the top job at the agency has become." Sen. David Vitter "said Thursday in an interview that the Bush administration must legalize imports of some prescription drugs before he would allow the nomination to proceed." Also, Sen. Jim DeMint "will block Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination unless the F.D.A. takes steps to remove the abortion drug RU-486 from the market, said Wesley M. Denton, Mr. DeMint's press secretary."

Government Announces It Has Recovered Lost VA Computer. The AP (9/15) reports, "The government said Thursday it had recovered a Veterans Affairs Department subcontractor's lost desktop computer containing personal data for 16,000 veterans." The FBI and Veterans Affairs Office of Inspector General "said Khalil Abdullah-Raheem was charged Wednesday on theft charges after the Unisys Corp. computer went missing in July. The computer, which was taken from Unisys' offices in Reston, Va., contained personal data for veterans who received care at VA medical centers in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh."

Paulson Seeks To Restore Treasury's Role In Policy Process. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Solomon, 2.03M) reports, "Two months into his new job, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is moving to restore clout and stature to the department, tapping top-level experts to fill senior positions, seeking alliances with influential White House officials and insisting on holding key meetings at the Treasury Building." Paulson is "trying to put into practice assurances he received from the White House before agreeing to take the secretary job -- that he would be the president's main driver of economic policy." He has "held daily phone calls with the influential Allan Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council and a longtime friend of President Bush, and invited Mr. Hubbard to accompany him to China next week. He also talks frequently with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, hosts cabinet-level economic meetings at Treasury and is trying to reach out regularly to brief both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill on Treasury happenings." Still, whether "Paulson's efforts succeed -- and help him shape economic policy -- remains to be seen."

Senate Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Contract Bidding. The Washington Post (9/15, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "In a move that has roiled federal contractors, the Senate has proposed making retirement benefits a factor when the Defense Department puts certain federal jobs up for bid. The proposal would prevent contractors from obtaining an advantage if they provided less generous retirement benefits than the government does to its employees. Contractors said that would drive up the cost of bids by 24 percent." The Post adds, "Contractor associations argue that the Senate's move, if agreed to by the House, would stop the Defense Department from trying to outsource work through a process set up by the Office of Management and Budget as part of President Bush's federal management agenda."

Lawmakers Argue For Relaxed Standards For Commercial Real Estate Lending. Arguing that proposed tougher standards for commercial real estate lending could hurt community banks and the overall economy, lawmakers and banking executives are urging federal regulators to relax them. USA Today (9/15, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports that Rep. Barney Frank "said the standards could force banks to pull back on lending to revitalize downtown areas or build affordable, multifamily housing. While Frank is a Democrat, there was bipartisan concern. Regulators, including the Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., generally defended their proposals. But John Reich, director of the Office of Thrift Supervision, said the guidance may go too far in some areas." USA adds, "Congress has not intervened on the legislative side, but lawmakers made it clear they want changes before a final version of the standards is issued."

Laura Bush To Keynote Clinton Foundation Event. The AP (9/15, Loven) reports, "Another member of the Bush family is getting cozy with former President Clinton. First lady Laura Bush joins the former president as a keynote speaker opening his three-day Clinton Global Initiative in New York next week." Clinton "also sparked curiosity when he was spotted at the White House last month. It turns out that he and the current president were having lunch, something White House aides said they do occasionally." Anita McBride, the First Lady's chief of staff, said Clinton, "aware of Laura Bush's involvement in issues that his foundation addresses…called several months ago to solicit her participation in the conference." Laura Bush "agreed, hoping to tell people about the good that their tax dollars are doing and to persuade other nations of the United States' good intentions."

Pelosi Introduces New Agenda For Democrats. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/15, A2), Dana Milbank says House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "began her weekly news conference yesterday holding up a red-white-and-blue brochure," titled "A New Direction for America." Pelosi "called the manifesto 'a compilation of many of the initiatives taken by our House Democratic Caucus that encompasses our new direction for all Americans.'" It was "a handsome booklet, full of homey photographs and popular proposals, but there was a problem. Democrats have had more 'New Directions' recently than MapQuest." Among the party's "campaign slogans this year: 'Culture of Corruption,' 'Culture of Cronyism,' 'Do-Nothing Congress,' 'Rubber-Stamp Congress,' 'Together, We Can Do Better,' 'Together, America Can Do Better' and, most recently, 'Six for '06.'" For those "keeping score at home, Democrats arrived at 'New Direction' yesterday by downgrading one of the 'Six for '06' issues (health care) and upgrading three others (honesty, civility and fiscal discipline), for a total of eight items on the contents page." Milbank adds, "By contrast, Republicans have settled on a single, unofficial slogan, which essentially says: Vote Democrat and Die. And in politics, scary and scurrilous usually trumps elaborate and earnest -- something Pelosi has experienced firsthand in recent days."

CQ (9/14, Kady) reports Pelosi "has been touting the agenda Democrats would pursue if they win back control of the House. So it was no surprise Thursday when she unveiled a red, white and blue brochure titled 'A New Direction for America.'" Though it "doesn't quite rise to the level of the specific promises House Republicans made in their 1994 'Contract With America,' but it details Democratic ideas on everything from homeland security to global warming." Yet when asked "how Democrats would change House procedures and caucus rules governing seniority, Pelosi clammed up. 'I'm not counting any chickens before they're hatched,' she said. 'Any changes would be considered after the election.'" CQ added another "reason for her reticence might be that Democrats aren't yet in agreement about what kinds of changes need to be made, especially in the area of seniority rules that would govern who gets which chairmanship in a Democratic majority. An internal document recommending a long list of changes has been circulating, but it has not been approved by party leaders."

Fox Poll Finds Bush Approval Rating At 40%. Fox News' Special Report (9/14, Hume) reported, "A new Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll finds 40% approve of President Bush's job performance."

Case Made Against Means Testing Medicare Part B Premiums. In a USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) op-ed, Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, argues against Means testing Medicare Part B premiums, arguing that as "healthier and wealthier seniors see their monthly premiums rise…many are expected to abandon Medicare for private insurance. … Left behind will be the poorest and sickest -- and most expensive to treat -- who will be forced to pay higher premiums and deductibles, something they cannot afford." Benton adds, "The most vulnerable members of our society…should be protected. Means testing might inadvertently lead to poorer health care and increased expenses for those least able to afford the consequences of this costly mistake."

WSJournal Praises Effort To Eliminate Secret Holds In Senate. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) says credit is due to "a group of Senators who have launched a campaign to get rid of one of the last bastions of government unaccountability, namely the Senate tradition of 'secret' holds. … This practice…has been around since at least the 1960s, though it has become a greater source of political harm with each passing year." The Journal adds, "The holds don't help the credibility of the Senate, either, since many are used precisely so that Senators don't have to go public and acknowledge opposition to a piece of legislation."

OTHER NEWS:

Retail Sales Post 0.2% Growth. The Financial Times (9/15, Pimlott) reports, "US retail sales unexpectedly grew in August, as sales of automobiles were better than feared and lower petrol prices encouraged consumers to spend. Economists had expected sales to fall by 0.1 per cent month-on-month, but in fact they rose by 0.2 per cent, after 1.4 per cent jump in July, a report from the Commerce Department said." The Times adds, "Observers were generally upbeat about the figures. "Consumers are sort of trucking along, although there is gradual slowdown under way," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Whitehouse, 2.03M), meanwhile, says "American consumers tempered their shopping in August as the price of gasoline peaked at more than $3 a gallon, but a subsequent easing in fuel prices has led some economists to expect a rebound in coming months. … The moderate pace of August sales could suggest that, aside from the effect of the summer spike in gasoline prices, a sagging housing market has begun to take a toll on consumers by reducing their ability to extract cash from their homes."

Stocks Mixed. USA Today/Bloomberg News (9/15) reports, "Stocks snapped a four-day rally Thursday after the government said retail sales excluding autos rose less than economists forecast and an increase in import prices revived inflation concern. … The Standard & Poor's 500 index dropped 1.79 points, or 0.1%, to 1316.28. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 15.93 points, or 0.1%, to 11,527.39. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.06 points, or 0.1%, to 2228.73." The Financial Times (9/15, O'Doherty) also says "US stocks dipped slightly on Thursday after retail sales data rekindled inflationary fears and pulled the main indices away from four-month highs." The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Ng, 2.03M) reports on the stock numbers in a story headlined "Stocks Slip As Natural Gas Hits Two-Year Low."

New Jersey Attorney Rankings Rankle Some. The New York Times (9/15, Donovan) reports, "Word of mouth is one crucial marketing tool for a lawyer. Getting your name on a list of top lawyers can be another, unless the list is distributed to consumers in New Jersey." The Times continues, "In an opinion that has set off a nationwide discussion, an ethics committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court concluded this summer that a magazine advertising supplement listing the state's top lawyers violated rules of professional conduct. … The focus of the opinion by the Committee on Attorney Advertising was an insert to New Jersey Monthly magazine called New Jersey Super Lawyers, which listed the top 5 percent of the state's lawyers (1,658 of 35,441) and then offered an opportunity to advertise." The Times adds, "The panel questioned the process used to compile the list, but it was also clearly troubled that the supplement was 'designed for mass consumption' by New Jersey residents who may have been misled by what they read. … 'These self-aggrandizing titles have the potential to lead an unwary consumer to believe that the lawyers so described are, by virtue of the manufactured title, superior to their colleagues who practice in the same area of law,' the committee wrote of New Jersey Super Lawyers. … With that, New Jersey became the latest battleground in the long debate over how far lawyers can go to promote themselves. The New Jersey situation offers a snapshot of an issue that has divided lawyers since a 1977 United States Supreme Court ruling that allowed advertising. In this case, the concern is not so much the list as who reads it."

Pennsylvania Judges Give Themselves Controversial Pay Raise. The New York Times (9/15, Urbina) reports, "The Pennsylvania Supreme Court partly reinstated a controversial raise yesterday that state legislators repealed last year after a popular outcry. … But the ruling said that only judges should receive the raise, not the legislators or other government workers who originally qualified." The Times continues, "The raise, which was passed at 2 in the morning on July 7, 2005, just before the General Assembly adjourned for the summer, was viewed by critics as sneaky and self-serving. It produced a reaction across the state that led to a Supreme Court justice's being voted out of office in November and the defeat of 17 legislators the following May. … In response to the public outcry, legislators repealed the raise in November." The Times adds, "The Supreme Court ruled that the Pennsylvania Constitution prohibited reducing the salaries of judges unless 'all salaried officers of the commonwealth' were also affected. The court said the legislation repealing the raise did not do that because it excluded many state employees. … As a result, the Supreme Court justices will receive the raise, which amounts to more than 10 percent of their current salary, while the rest of the state officials will not. … The court also said the raise for legislators was unconstitutional because legislators are not permitted to receive raises that they draft in the middle of a term before having to face voters again."

GOP Fundraising Advantage Ebbs. CQ Politics (9/15, Benenson) reports if "any prediction is safe in this turbulent and closely contested election, it is that Republican candidates and their affiliated national party committees will raise more money than their Democratic counterparts." But the "fundraising advantages enjoyed by the current GOP congressional majorities over the challenging Democrats are closer than in recent election cycles, according to data presented by campaign finance experts at The Brookings Institution in Washington." Their findings "seem to indicate that Democrats — who are benefiting from President Bush's unpopularity and strong public disapproval of Congress — have enough campaign dollars to seriously compete for control of the House and the Senate." In the "first 18 months of the 2005-06 campaign cycle, the six major national party campaign committees reported raising a combined $574 million, of which $334 million, or 58 percent, was collected by the GOP organizations: the Republican National Committee (RNC), the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC)." Their Democratic counterparts — "the Democratic National Committee (DNC), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) — raised $240 million, or 42 percent, of the two-party total." While the GOP advantage "is substantial, it is actually smaller than the Republicans' edge at a similar point in the competitive 2004 campaign." CQ Politics (9/15, Benenson) also lists the fundraising figures in a historical context in a separate story.

"Swift Boat" Donor Gives $5 Million To New GOP-Leaning 527 Group. The AP (9/15, Evans) reports Bob J. Perry, the "Republican donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat attacks on Democratic Sen. John Kerry's war record has given $5 million to a new group targeting Democratic candidates." Perry, a Texas homebuilder "with close ties to White House advisor Karl Rove and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, recently made the hefty donations to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group." The 527 group, "which lists Perry as its sole donor — has spent slightly more than $500,000 on television ads and mailings criticizing Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, according to a disclosure form filed last week with the Federal Election Commission." The group "also is distributing mailing supporting Republican Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue's re-election campaign and Jim Nussle of Iowa, a Republican congressman running for governor." The West Virginia and Georgia races "are considered among the GOP's best shots at picking up seats in an election year where some experts believe the party is in danger of losing its majority in Congress."

Davis Taps Former Black Legislator As Running Mate In Florida. The AP (9/15, Skoloff) reports Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis "named a former state senator to be his running mate Thursday, a choice that could lead to Florida's first black lieutenant governor." Daryl Jones, 51, "was the first black candidate to make a serious run for Florida governor, coming in third in the 2002 primary." Jones, "a former Air Force fighter pilot, served six of his 12 years in the Legislature with Davis before Davis was elected to Congress in 1996. Jones was considered an intelligent, independent lawmaker and won respect among colleagues in both parties."

Casey Discusses "Life Issues" At Catholic University. The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports Robert P. Casey Jr., "the Democratic candidate seeking to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) in one of the country's hottest election campaigns, told a largely Roman Catholic audience yesterday that in his view, 'neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues.'" Casey, "a lifelong Catholic who opposes abortion, is the second high-profile Democrat who has recently given a major address defending the place of religion in politics." Casey's candidacy "is viewed by Democratic strategists not only as one of the party's best opportunities to pick up a Senate seat, but also as an illustration of its growing inclusion of politicians who oppose abortion and of its desire to reach out to religiously motivated voters." In his 45-minute lecture "at Catholic University's Columbus School of Law, his alma mater, Casey said that America 'must be a country dedicated to the common good' and that 'my understanding of our common good comes from my family and my faith.'" On abortion, he "called for Democrats and Republicans to 'unite . . . behind the understanding that the common good requires us to value all life.' As an example, he cited legislation proposed by House Democrats that would target 'the underlying factors that often lead women to choose abortion.'" Some of the "sharpest language in Casey's speech was aimed at his party. In 1992, the Democratic National Committee did not let Casey's father, then-Gov. Robert P. Casey Sr., speak at its national convention because of his antiabortion views. Referring to that 'dark night,' the younger Casey said the party 'insulted the most courageous pro-life Democrat in the land, who asked that those who believed in the right to life be accorded the right to speak.'"

Webb Apologizes For Remarks On Women In Combat. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) reported, "In Virginia, Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb is apologizing today for a long-ago claim that women are not fit for combat. It's the latest controversy over words in one of the hottest and increasingly nastiest Senate races in the country."

WPost Says Webb's Use Of Reagan Speech In His Ad Is Fair Game. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) says President Ronald Reagan "seems to have admired" Sen. George Allen's Democratic opponent James Webb. So it "is easily within the bounds of fairness that the Webb campaign is airing an advertisement that includes 10 seconds or so of Mr. Reagan paying tribute that day to Mr. Webb's 'gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam.' The Allen camp has cried foul, and an official at the Reagan Presidential Library in California, acting on Nancy Reagan's behalf, has asked that the ad be pulled. Neither protest has merit. The late president's public utterances are not the private property of his library or family." Webb "has neither distorted Mr. Reagan's words nor taken them out of context; nor did Mr. Reagan ever repudiate them."

Cardin Highlights Steele's Ties To Bush. Democratic Maryland US Senate candidate Ben Cardin was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/14) if he can "possibly lose to Michael Steele in this election" since Maryland "is almost endemically a Democratic state." Cardin said, "I plan to take my record in Congress and the state legislature, former speaker of the Maryland legislature, my ability to get things done in this campaign. And I believe we're going to stick to issues. When we stick to issues, the voters of Maryland are going to send me as their next United States senator to Maryland." Cardin noted that Steele "was selected by the President, by Bush, to run as the United States senator. He was recruited by Karl Rove. He's the former chairman of the Maryland Republican Party. He supports the President on stem cell research. He supports the President's economic policies. He supports the President's Iraq policy. I think the people of Maryland are going to understand that they have a choice and their choice is to vote for someone who will be independent and stand up to President Bush."

Connecticut Is "Eye Of Storm" In Democratic Effort To Retake House. ABC World News (9/14, story 8, 2:35, Tapper) reported on the challenges faced by Connecticut Republican Reps. Christopher Shays, Rob Simmons, and Nancy Johnson. The story begins with a focus on Shays, who this week "was late to his own fundraiser, with Barbara Bush. Late because he was attending a funeral, for a 19-year-old Army private killed in Iraq. The war and Shays' support for it is the primary reason he might lose in November." Diane Farrell, Democratic candidate: "Friends of Chris have said to me, I can't do it this year. We cannot continue with the status quo." Tapper: "Forty-four House races are considered competitive. The vast majority are GOP incumbents playing defense. And here in Connecticut, it's the eye of the storm where Shays is one of three vulnerable Republicans. Shays, Rob Simmons and Nancy Johnson, are all in the fights of their political lives, as the northeast becomes increasingly Democratic terrain, just as the South became largely Republican a decade ago." Iraq, "at the moment, appears to be the defining issue. Shays knows that but still supports the war." Rep. Chris Shays: "One of the reasons I have big arguments with my own staff, congressional and campaign staff, about the war in Iraq, is they say that's not a winner. And I say that's not the point." Tapper: "Shays moderated his strong support for the war. This week, he's chairing hearings, calling for a timetable for US troop withdraw. For voters at the oyster festival is not good enough."

Dionne Says US Is Seeing Nationalization Of Politics. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K), "The United States is witnessing a centralization and nationalization of politics unprecedented in our history. This trend is rooted in the rise of the political consulting industry, vast changes in the technology of campaigning, and the intense competition between the two major parties for control of Congress. There is, as well, the concentration of political money at the national level as Washington-based interest groups, associations and lobbyists not only raise large amounts in political contributions within the capital but also mobilize campaign money from their allies around the country. … So in 2006 the local is not really local, everything is about controlling Washington, and 'independence' is a product being franchised by a national party apparatus."

Anne Richards' Passing Noted. The networks last night each eulogized former Texas Gov. Anne Richards. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 11, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "They were fierce political rivals, but on the death of Anne Richards, President Bush said today, 'Texas has lost one of its great daughters.' Richards, the former governor and Democratic firebrand, died yesterday of cancer of the esophagus. She was 73." CBS (Safer) added, "Anne Richards' leap from obscurity took place at the 1988 Democratic convention when she lit into George Bush, the Republican presidential candidate." Anne Richards: "Poor George, he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

ABC World News (9/14, story 9, 1:00, Gibson) reported, "With her Texas twang and sharp tongue, she became an instant celebrity at the 1988 convention. With a speech that poked fun of the first President Bush. And also celebrated women." NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 10, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight Texans are mourning a former governor and one of the most colorful figures in modern American politics has tonight left the scene."

Ford Offers Buyouts To Union Workers. The Ford Motor Company has offered its 75,000 union workers a buyout incentive package. ABC World News (9/14, story 4, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "Last January, Ford announced it wanted to trim 30,000 jobs and close more than a dozen plants over the next six years. Then, in July, Ford said it was accelerating that plan. But it wasn't enough. Because now, Ford and the United Auto Workers have agreed on this new, one-time offer, to buy out all 75,000 UAW workers who worked there." Ford is "expected to announce massive job cuts among its salaried, nonunion workers. And possibly more plant closings."

CBS Evening News (9/13, story 3, 1:20, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "Employees will be offered anywhere from $35,000 to $140,000 to leave the company." NBC Nightly News (9/14, lead story, 2:45, Thompson, 9.87M) reported, "It's been a difficult year for the nation's number two automaker. $1.5 billion lost so far. Its share of the market shrink to under 18% as Americans stop buying Fords trucks and SUV's. As a result it's slashing production by 21%."

Krugman Says Technological, Economic Progress Has Done Little For Most Americans. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) that "the debate over whether the middle class is a bit better off or a bit worse off now than a generation ago misses the point. What we should be debating is why technological and economic progress has done so little for most Americans, and what changes in government policies would spread the benefits of progress more widely. An effort to shore up middle-class health insurance, paid for by a rollback of recent tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans -- something like the plan proposed by John Kerry two years ago, but more ambitious -- would be a good place to start. Instead, the people running our government are fixated on cutting tax rates for the wealthy even further. And their solution to Americans' justified economic anxiety is a public relations campaign, an effort to convince middle-class families that their problems are a figment of their imagination."

NYTimes Says Living Wage Proponents Have Moral High Ground. The New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) editorializes that Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's veto of the "living wage" measure passed by the city council because "mandating higher compensation would do more harm than good," assumes a false choice between no jobs or low-wage jobs. The Times says "Wage gains do not automatically lead to higher prices. … Given Wal-Mart's profits, the company could improve its wage structure and still beat the competition." The Times adds, "The Chicago ordinance raised legal and technical questions. If Mr. Daley had not wielded the veto, it would surely have faced a court challenge. But proponents of living wages have the moral high ground, and are increasingly finding a political voice. Chicago hasn't heard the last of them, and Washington hasn't either."

WSJournal Decries "Big Boss Cronyism" Of New Jersey Government. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) editorializes, "Last week federal investigators launched a probe into whether US Senator Robert Menendez illegally benefited to the tune of more than $300,000 from a rental-income deal he had with a nonprofit agency that received millions of dollars in federal contracts. … The allegations have sparked a mini-panic among state Democratic operatives, who not so long ago thought Mr. Menendez…had the November election in the bag. Now they see Republican Tom Kean Jr. surging into a lead." The Journal adds, "The more serious issue here is whether Garden State voters are growing weary of the culture of big boss cronyism that has contaminated their government from city hall to the US Senate."

Bush, Roh Avoid Contentious Issues But Agree To Press For Talks. The Washington Post (9/15, A4, Baker, 748K) reports President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun "agreed yesterday to work together to restart stalled six-party nuclear talks with North Korea, but they skated over their deep differences in how to deal with the isolated Stalinist government in Pyongyang." Bush "stressed the potential benefits to North Korean leader Kim Jong-il if he returns to the negotiating table and ultimately gives up his nuclear weapons." He "avoided the sort of hard-edged tone that in the past has irritated the South Koreans, who want to take a less confrontational approach." The Post says the two leaders "made no concrete progress on the North Korean stalemate" and did not "reach a breakthrough on various other issues that divide them," including a FTA and a reorientation of the military command structure within South Korea. The Post describes relations as "increasingly strained" largely because of the North Korean issue.

The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/15) reports, "The Bush administration favors a hard-line approach, refusing to talk to the North outside six-nation talks." Roh "has tried to engage the North. Mr. Roh's low-key trip to Washington had many wondering whether there are cracks in an alliance forged five decades ago during the Korean War."

The Washington Times (9/15, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "said North Korea's refusal to return to negotiations had 'strengthened' the alliance of five countries trying to persuade the communist nation to abandon its nuclear program. " Bush, "in his first meeting with the South Korean leader since North Korea conducted missile tests in July, said the stalled talks should help convince President Kim Jong-il that 'there is a better way to improve the lives of his people than being isolated.'"

Ahmadinejad Says Tehran Amenable To "New Conditions" On Nuclear Program. The Financial Times (9/15, Dombey) notes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said on Thursday that Tehran was open to compromise on the dispute over the country's nuclear programme, as talks continued between the Islamic republic and the European Union." He "said that Iran was open to 'new conditions' on the subject," and is quoted saying, "I am announcing that we are available, we are ready for new conditions." Ahmadinejad "declined to say whether Iran was prepared to suspend uranium enrichment," however, Tehran earlier "floated the idea of suspending enrichment for an initial period of up to two months once negotiations began." The Times says the "State Department has denied any knowledge of a new Iranian proposal." Secretary Rice "emphasises that Washington is continuing work on UN sanctions against Iran – although earlier in the week she appeared to react more positively to reports of Tehran's new stance." The Times also notes "discussions this week at the [IAEA] suggest a divergence between France and Germany, which appear to be more enthusiastic about negotiations, and the UK, which is particularly keen to keep the US on board."

AFP (9/15) adds Assistant Secretary McCormack "acknowledged that [the US] will face tough resistance from some of its key allies as it presses for UN sanctions against Iran over its suspect nuclear program." He further "admitted Thursday that the upcoming negotiations would be 'hard-fought. The reality of it is that there are going to be intense negotiations on this." McCormack "predicted the process of trying to hammer out a sanctions package with the other Security Council members 'would take weeks,' a far less ambitious timetable than put forward earlier by" Undersecretary Burns, "who said a deal would be reached in September. But McCormack continued to express confidence Washington's allies would ultimately back the sanctions foreshadowed in their earlier resolution."

IAEA Criticizes House Report. The New York Times (9/15, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "The International Atomic Energy Agency has complained about a staff report from the House Intelligence Committee, saying that it 'contains erroneous, misleading and unsubstantiated information' about Iran's nuclear program. Agency officials said Thursday that their concerns had echoes of their arguments with the Bush administration over Iraq three years ago." The charges "were contained in a letter dated Sept. 12 and sent to Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the committee." The AP (9/15, Jahn) says the letter also called the report "outrageous and dishonest."

Opposition Figure Says Iran Has Revived Laser Enrichment. The AP (9/15, Lederer) reports, "Iran has secretly revived a program to enrich uranium using laser technology, reportedly with favorable results, an Iranian opposition figure said Thursday citing information from members of the resistance inside the country." Alireza Jafarzadeh "said information about the laser enrichment program at Lashkar Ab'ad, about 15 miles northwest of Tehran, came from the same sources that led to his revelation in May 2003 that Iran had a clandestine nuclear program. There was no independent confirmation of the latest information and Iran's UN Mission called the allegation 'baseless and unfounded.'"

Chavez Says Venezuela Will Aid Iran If Militarily Attacked. The AP (9/15) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez pledged Thursday that Venezuela will support Iran if it is invaded as a result of the Middle Eastern nation's high-stakes nuclear standoff with the United Nations Security Council. 'Iran is under threat; there are plans to invade Iran, hopefully it won't happen, but we are with you,' Chavez told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a meeting of the Group of 15 developing nations."

54% In US Say Back Military Strike To Stop Iran From Acquiring Nuclear Weapons. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 54% say US should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if US joins international coalition."

Ignatius Believes Bush "Serious About Finding A Peaceful Solution." David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/15, 748K), "What would President Bush say to the Iranian people if he had a chance to communicate directly with them? I was able to put that question to Bush in a one-on-one interview in the Oval Office on Wednesday. His answer made clear that the administration wants a diplomatic solution to the confrontation over Iran's nuclear program -- one that is premised on an American recognition of Iran's role as an important nation in the Middle East." Bush, "answering quickly and without notes," said, "I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. We admire the entrepreneurial skills of your people. I would say to the Iranian people that I recognize the importance of your sovereignty -- that you're a proud nation, and you want to have a positive future for your citizens. In terms of the nuclear issue…I understand that you believe it is in your interest -- your sovereign interest, and your sovereign right -- to have nuclear power. I understand that. But I would also say to the Iranian people, there are deep concerns about the intentions of some in your government who would use knowledge gained from a civilian nuclear power industry to develop a weapon that can then fulfill the stated objectives of some of the leadership [to attack Israel and threaten the United States]. And I would say to the Iranian people that I would want to work for a solution to meeting your rightful desires to have civilian nuclear power." Ignatius concludes, "I came away with a sense that Bush is serious about finding a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis, and that he is looking hard for ways to make connections between America and Iran."

Krauthammer Suggests Deterrence "A Mere Wish." Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K) about "the larger danger of permitting nuclear weapons to be acquired by religious fanatics seized with an eschatological belief in the imminent apocalypse and in their own divine duty to hasten the End of Days. The mullahs are infinitely more likely to use these weapons than anyone in the history of the nuclear age. … Against millenarian fanaticism glorying in a cult of death, deterrence is a mere wish. Is the West prepared to wager its cities with their millions of inhabitants on that feeble gamble? These are the questions. These are the calculations. The decision is no more than a year away."

Haniyeh Says US "Undermining" Palestinian Unity Government. The AP (9/14, Hadid) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh yesterday "accused the United States of undermining efforts to form a new coalition government and he called on Europe to take the lead in lifting international sanctions against the Palestinians." He is quoted saying Washington "does not want the Palestinians to be unified. It puts obstacles in the way of this political coming together. It wants to extort the Palestinian people and the Palestinian government." On President Mahmoud Abbas' plan to create a Hamas-Fatah government, the AP says, "While refusing to give up its calls for Israel's destruction, Hamas has said it will support Abbas' efforts to seek peace. The joint government…is to be based on a document that calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively recognizing the Jewish state." Abbas "added conditions to the timetable" yesterday, saying "the issue of an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants in June, as well as Palestinian prisoners held by Israel, must be resolved."

Amnesty International Criticizes Hamas. The Washington Post (9/15, A15, Sullivan, 748K) reports, "Amnesty International on Thursday accused Hezbollah of 'indiscriminate' and deliberate killings of Israeli civilians during the recent armed conflict in Lebanon, three weeks after accusing Israel of violating international law with 'disproportionate' attacks on Lebanese civilians." The group "said its investigations showed that during the 33-day conflict, Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, killing 43 civilians, seriously injuring 33 others and displacing hundreds of thousands. It said that about a quarter of the rockets were fired into urban areas and that many were packed with thousands of ball bearings 'designed to inflict maximum death and injury.'"

Israel Blames UNIFIL Outpost Attack On Faulty Maps. A short piece in the New York Times/AP (9/15) notes Tel Aviv announced yesterday that "the airstrike that killed four United Nations observers in July was the result of the Israeli military's reliance on inaccurate maps." Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev "said the report [of the findings] was given to diplomats from Canada, China, Finland and Austria, which each had an unarmed observer killed in the July 25 airstrike in the Lebanese town of Khiam, near Israel's border." He "said that fresh Israeli forces had just been deployed then in the area, where there was intense Hezbollah activity. The change in personnel prompted a need to duplicate maps and charts." The AP says the UN "is expected to issue its own report" on the attack.

US Criticizes China's Weapons Sales. The AP (9/15, Klug) reports, "Top US officials on Thursday criticized what they called China's indiscriminate sale of weapons to rogue countries, suggesting that Beijing's policies had made the world a more dangerous place." Peter Rodman, assistant secretary of defense for international security, "urged China to reevaluate its relationship with Iran and North Korea, two countries with which the United States is locked in standoffs over nuclear weapons development. 'China's actions seem to us dangerously shortsighted,' Rodman told the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission, an advisory panel created by Congress. China's proliferation behavior, past and present, can come back to haunt it, even placing its own political interests in jeopardy.'"

Ukraine Puts NATO Entry Aspirations On Hold. In what the Wall Street Journal (9/15, A8, Cullison, 2.03M) calls "another sign of the cooling of the Orange Revolution's pro-Western zeal," Ukraine PM Viktor Yanukovych "told NATO that his country is putting efforts to join the alliance on hold because of lack of public support for the move." The Journal says Ukraine's "backtracking" is a "defeat" to the Bush Administration, "which had hoped a quick entrance of Ukraine into the alliance would tug the former Soviet state decisively closer to the West," and it is "likely to also spell problems" for Georgia's entry into NATO. While "public opinion in Georgia is strongly in favor of joining the alliance, NATO members in Europe are wary of admitting Georgia without Ukraine coming first." The Journal adds that Moscow "has lobbied hard against Ukraine's entrance" into NATO. The Washington Post (9/15, A15, Finn, 748K) reports NATO entry "is a cherished goal of Yanukovych's rival, President Viktor Yushchenko," who defeated Yanukovych for the presidency in 2004.

López Obrador Backers Abandon Blockade Of Mexico City. Supporters of Mexico's leftist presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador are abandoning their blockade of Mexico City's central avenues. The New York Times (9/15, McKinley, 1.21M) reports that the move "signaled a shift" by Obrador, who says he was robbed of an election victory. Obrador "is now striving to find a way to remain a political force over the coming six years, while Felipe Calderón, a conservative, serves as president. Mr. López Obrador and his aides have organized a mass rally for Saturday, grandly calling it the 'National Democratic Convention,' where supporters are expected to anoint Mr. López Obrador head of a movement still ill defined that will, among other things, press for a new Mexican constitution."

USA Today (9/15, Llana, 2.27M) reports, "López Obrador and his followers, who have rejected the results of a partial recount, say democracy here is in danger if what the former Mexico City mayor calls a 'new republic' is not created to address the gap between rich and poor." USA adds, "The purpose of the national convention, which López Obrador spokesman Cesar Yañez claims will draw at least 1 million 'delegates,' is to decide where the movement should go now that the electoral court has rejected a full recount, threw out claims of widespread fraud and certified Calderón the winner. They will vote on whether to name a shadow government and parallel president (López Obrador), complete with a Cabinet, though they have not said how they would govern."

Policymakers Hope IMF Will Play A Role In Combating Trade Imbalances. The Washington Post (9/15, D1, Blustein, 748K) reports, "Less than a decade ago, economists at the International Monetary Fund were jetting into the capitals of countries stricken by financial crises, patching together rescue plans aimed at staving off global economic chaos. … This weekend, as top economic policymakers gather in Singapore for the annual meetings of the IMF and World Bank, the global environment is dramatically different. The fund's era of crisis-fighting, which lasted until 2002, is a fading memory that staffers swap stories about like war veterans." The Post adds, "The hope of some of the policymakers gathering in Singapore, including those from the Bush administration, is that the IMF will start playing an active role in helping to combat another threat to the world economy -- huge imbalances in trade, specifically the $700-billion-plus US trade deficit and the corresponding surpluses in Asia and oil-producing countries."

O'Grady Says Latin America Needs "Sensible Guidance" From Financial Institutions. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M) that the 2007 edition of the report "Doing Business" finds that "poor countries could be much better off if only they would stop discouraging legal, tax-paying business activity. When governments make it expensive to operate in the legal sector, small and medium-sized businesses go underground, giving up economies of scale, the benefits of technology and productivity gains. … Serious leaders have taken steps to free animal spirits. Much of Latin America has not. In this year's report…the region largely finishes in the cellar." O'Grady adds, "Latin America has taken lots of money from international financial institutions over the years, along with lots of dreadful advice. Now it's time to take note of some sensible guidance, even if that would be bad for those who earn a living shoveling money out the door from Washington."

Russian Bank Official's Killing Draws Calls For Harsh Response. The assassination of Andrei Kozlov, first deputy chairman of Russia's Central Bank, is drawing calls for a severe response from the government. The Washington Post (9/15, A12, Finn, 748K) reports that

Kozlov led "a campaign to clean up the country's banks." He "was shot Wednesday evening outside a sports complex after attending a soccer match between bank employees. He died early Thursday of his wounds. His driver was killed instantly in the attack, which politicians said was probably a contract killing."

Ugandan Peace Dependent On Amnesty For Rebel Leaders. The New York Times (9/15, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports that the question of whether the cease-fire agreement in Uganda holds depends largely on whether rebel leader Joseph Kony and his top deputies are given amnesty for the killings committed by their "army of abducted children" who were forced "to burn down huts, slice off lips and pound newborn babies to death in wooden mortars, as though they were grinding grain." Whether amnesty will be granted "is uncertain, because they have been charged with crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Still, this is the furthest any peace deal has come, fueling hopes that one of Africa's most grotesque and bizarre wars, which cost tens of thousands of lives, may finally be over."

Anti-US Leaders Meeting In Cuba. NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 5, 1:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is a worldwide gathering underway tonight in Cuba with more than 50 heads of state arriving in Havana for a summit meeting. Some of the names on the guest list read like an enemy's list of the United States." NBC (Mitchell) added, "At times this looks like a reunion of the axis of evil, George Bush's worst nightmare. Already the summit has indicated it will support Iran's position against the West in its showdown over nuclear research."

OfficeMax Opposes Families' Efforts To Collect From Cuba. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Perez, 2.03M) reports, "In February, nearly 45 years after two American men were executed by Fidel Castro's government, their families were on the verge of collecting $88.5 million in damages from Cuba's long-frozen U.S. accounts. Then the relatives of Howard Anderson and Thomas 'Pete' Ray ran up against an unexpected obstacle: OfficeMax Inc." The company is owned by Boise Cascade Corp., which "controls the largest single US claim against the Cuban government for property confiscated after the 1959 revolution." Antiterrorism laws passed in 1996 and 2002, allowed the Anderson and Ray families "to seek, and ultimately win, wrongful-death judgments in Florida state courts, with a federal judge in January clearing the way to tap into the frozen Cuban funds. OfficeMax wasn't pleased with the news. In March, the company filed court papers in New York U.S. District Court, Southern District, seeking to block the Ray and Anderson relatives from collecting."

Municipalities Booming Despite China's Effort To Rein In Economy. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, Browne, 2.03M) reports that local governments in China "are encouraging a frenzy of construction to boost their economies -- even as China's central government seeks to throttle back investment that is producing runaway economic growth. The economy expanded 11.3% in the second quarter of this year from the same period a year earlier, far outstripping the government's target of 8% for the whole year. … Concerns are mounting that the boom could cause property bubbles that weigh down banks with bad debt when they burst. It also could clog railway lines and ports and trigger brown-outs as overloaded power grids collapse. Already, it is generating outsize demand for energy and raw materials, pushing up the cost around the world."

Rabbis Ordained In Germany For First Time Since World War II. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 7, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Germany today, a major step toward healing the wounds of the holocaust. Three men were ordained as rabbis, the first time that has happened in Germany since World War II when Hitler destroyed the college of Jewish studies."

Gerson Calls For "Muscular Multilateralism" In Darfur. On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) former Bush speechwriter Michael Gerson commented on the "genocide" in Darfur, Sudan, saying that the US "has worked with just about every international group from the United Nations to the African union. And visiting Darfur, I've seen the result. The burnt-out villages, the victims of systematic rape, the vast and hopeless camps. Everyone knows what is needed to stop the bleeding, a UN peacekeeping force with the firepower and authority to protect civilians from attack. What might be called a muscular multilateralism. The UN Security Council has agreed to a force. America's called for its deployment by October 1, but that deadline seems to be slipping."

Friedman Says US Should Follow Brazil's Lead On Ethanol. In his New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "I came to Brazil to try to better grasp what is real and what is not in the ethanol story, because no country has done more to pioneer sugar ethanol than Brazil. My impression, after talking to a range of Brazilian experts, is that not only is ethanol for real, but we have not even begun to tap its full potential. With just a few technological breakthroughs, Brazil really could be the Saudi Arabia of sugar and we could actually achieve that energy dream of getting 'barrels from bushels.'" In Brazil, 34,000 gas stations "offer both gasoline and ethanol (compared with around 700 in the U.S.) and...70 percent of new cars sold here can run on either gasoline or sugar ethanol. As a result, Brazil has replaced about 40 percent of its gasoline consumption with sugar ethanol." Friedman "asked Brazilian experts what they'd do if they were the U.S. president. The consensus answer: Require U.S. oil companies to provide ethanol fuel pumps at all their gas stations, require U.S. auto companies to make all their new cars flex-fuel and improve mileage standards, and get rid of the crazy 54-cent tariff we've imposed on imported sugar ethanol (to protect our farmers). And then let the market work."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Armed Services Republicans Block Bush Terror Detainee Legislation. The AP (9/15, Flaherty) reports, "A rebellious Senate committee defied President Bush on Thursday and approved terror-detainee legislation he has vowed to block, deepening Republican conflict over terrorism and national security in the middle of the election season." Republican Sen. John Warner, "normally a Bush supporter, pushed the measure through his Armed Services Committee by a 15-9 vote." Backing Warner were GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain. The committee vote "set the stage for a showdown on the Senate floor as early as next week." The AP adds, "In an embarrassment to the White House, Colin Powell…announced his opposition to his old boss' plan, saying it would hurt the country. Powell's successor, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, jumped to the president's defense in a letter of her own." CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) noted Powell wrote that "America's own troops would be put at risk if the US redefines the Geneva Convention and authorizes harsh interrogations of terror suspects. NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 4, 1:10, P. Williams, 9.87M) said that in addition to former Secretary Powell, "about three dozen retired military officers say they believe the Bush bill would limit the protections of the Geneva conventions and put Americans at risk if they are captured overseas in future wars. Their experience in harsh interrogation techniques do not work very well."

USA Today (9/15, Jackson, Kiely, 2.27M) says Bush "is facing a Republican rebellion." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino "acknowledged that the president's bill may fall short in the Senate. She said House and Senate negotiators may have to resolve the differences between the two bills."

The Washington Times (9/15, Fagan, Dinan, 88K) reports, "A Capitol Hill source said that after two weeks of fruitless negotiations with Mr. McCain, the White House has decided to instead have the fight in public and make its case directly. "

Much of the media coverage describes the GOP senators' action as a sign of a GOP split on the terror issue, one that could benefit Democrats in the midterm elections. The New York Times (9/15, Hulse, 1.21M) reports "Bush and Congressional Republicans spent the last 10 days laying the foundation for a titanic pre-election struggle over national security, and now they have one. But the fight playing out this week on Capitol Hill is not what they had in mind. Instead of drawing contrasts with Democrats, the president's call for creating military tribunals to try terror suspects…has erupted into a remarkably intense clash pitting some of the best-known warriors in the Republican Party against Mr. Bush and the Congressional leadership." As NBC Nightly News (9/14, story 3, 2:35, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "All of this is headed for a real showdown in the senate where Democrats are happy to stand back and watch the Republicans fight among themselves."

The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Schmitt, Havemann, 918K) reports "the rejection of Bush's plan could create a dramatic clash, particularly among Republicans campaigning for reelection as being strong on security issues, when the full Senate votes next week." Republicans "view national security as their greatest political strength in their battle to keep control of Congress in the November midterm elections." On Wednesday, the House Armed Services Committee "approved a tribunal measure that closely tracked the administration's proposal." AFP (9/15, Griffith) notes Bush yesterday "praised the House Armed Services Committee for having passed his bill, which he called 'a very important piece of legislation in a bipartisan fashion that will give us the tools and wherewithal to protect this country.'" Bush also "dismissed Powell's remarks, saying 'there's all kinds of letters coming out,' and pointed out that a group of military lawyers sent a letter to the House and Senate Armed Services panels supporting the administration plan."

McClatchy (9/15, Hutcheson, Talev) reports Bush "brushed off Powell's opposition, but White House spokesman Tony Snow didn't conceal the annoyance that his defection caused within the president's inner circle." Snow "said Powell was 'confused' about Bush's goals and suggested that the former secretary of state should have contacted the White House for clarification before writing his letter."

ABC World News (9/14, lead story, 2:40, Stephanopoulos) reported that "only hours before" the Senate committee vote, "the President made a rare trip to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill. And he pressured the Senate from the Oval Office." Bush: "It is very important for the American people to understand that in order to protect this country; we must be able to interrogate people who have information about future attacks." Three GOP Senators, continued ABC, "oppose the Administration's attempt to interpret Article Three of the Geneva conventions, which outlaws inhumane treatment of enemy prisoners. Here's the basic debate -- the Administration worries Article Three could expose CIA interrogators to prosecution and lawsuits."

CBS Evening News (9/13, lead story, 2:40, Attikisson, 7.66M) reported, "After he left Capitol Hill, the President warned that a law that ties the hands of CIA interrogators too much would threaten the very existence of the high value detainee program, a program he says has saved countless lives." Bush: "If there's any doubt in our professionals mind that they can conduct their operations in a legal way with support of the Congress, the program won't go forward and the American people will be endangered."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Lueck, 2.03M) reports "in the House, some Republicans are concerned about the White House approach, just as some have objected to another administration priority -- getting broader authority to conduct warrantless surveillance." Yesterday, "during the closed-door meeting, Rep. Steve Buyer of Indiana, a former military lawyer, cited an issue top uniformed lawyers raised: Mr. Bush's plan would permit the use of classified evidence, but doesn't require it be shared with the accused."

Letter Released By White House Generates Controversy. The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Babington, Weisman, 748K) says "the dispute has fractured the GOP establishment." White House officials "released a letter from senior Pentagon uniformed lawyers, who said they 'do not object' to two key sections of the administration-backed bill that would reinterpret US obligations under the Geneva Conventions and protect US intelligence agents from war crimes prosecutions." They "then summoned senators from the Armed Services and intelligence committees to an afternoon meeting with Rice and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. Seven attended, sources said." The Pentagon letter "immediately generated controversy. Senior judge advocates general had publicly questioned many aspects of the administration's position, especially any reinterpreting of the Geneva Conventions. The White House and GOP lawmakers seized on what appeared to be a change of heart to say that they now have military lawyers on their side." But "the letter was signed only after an extraordinary round of negotiations Wednesday between the judge advocates and William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel, according to Republican opponents of Bush's proposal. The military lawyers refused to sign a letter of endorsement. But after hours of cajoling, they assented to write that they 'do not object,' according to three Senate GOP sources who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were divulging private negotiations."

The New York Times (9/15, Zernike, 1.21M) reports McCain, Warner and Graha "dismissed the letter from the military lawyers, saying they had questions about whether it amounted to an authentic endorsement of the White House proposal. They said they put more weight on extensive public testimony in which the lawyers raised doubts about the Bush plan." The Times adds, "Some military officials briefed on the military lawyers' position also disputed the notion that the lawyers had reversed course. They said the lawyers agreed to sign a letter at a meeting on Wednesday after discussing the language over several hours."

Gonazles Defends Detainee Interrogation Tactics. McClatchy Newspapers (9/15, Canon) reports, "As Congress dealt a rebuke Thursday to President Bush's national security agenda, his attorney general defended the administration's efforts to deal with captured terror suspects." McClatchy continues, "Of critics concerned about international treaties or freedoms protected by the U.S. Constitution, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said they misunderstand the legalities - some never clearly defined - of dealing with an unconventional foe that plays by no rules. … Judicial rejections of some administration policies have muddied the legal landscape and made it unclear how the government can detain, interrogate and prosecute terror suspects, he said. … 'We do need some clarity,' Gonzales told the editorial board of The Kansas City Star." McClatchy adds, "Gonzales said the U.S. courts and Congress have yet to interpret the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which sets a standard of treatment for prisoners of war. He voiced concern that that an adverse ruling could damage efforts to interrogate 'terrorists who do not fight by the standards of war.' And he suggested that rejection of an administration bill sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, giving interrogators more leeway might hurt efforts to fight terrorism. … 'Congress may decide we don't want to gather any more evidence,' the attorney general said. … He said that 'just like in every other war,' the American people will have to trust the government to protect the rights of those in custody while pursuing justice in secret. Pressed on how long extraordinary measures - for instance, the imprisonment of suspects without the filing of charges - might continue, he said they would last at least until the pursuit of al-Qaida and its accomplices has come to an end. … 'First of all this is a real war,' he said, drawing a distinction between the war on terror and 'the war on drugs or the war on poverty or something like that. It's like the Cold War. . . . At some point this conflict is going to be over. But today it is not over.'"

McCain Defends Stance In TV Interviews. McCain granted interviews to ABC, CBS and CNN yesterday. ABC World News (9/14, story 2, 1:45, Gibson) reported "one of the most powerful Republican senators opposing the President is John McCain, who, himself was once a prisoner of the Vietnamese for more than five years." McCain told ABC, "I'm hearing from military leaders all over the country, retired people, including General Colin Powell, who say if we take the Administration's measure, we'll put our young Americans' lives at-risk. That's very serious. … Suppose that a Special Forces person, not in uniform, were captured. And the attorney general of the nation who captured it decides to interpret the Geneva conventions to their liking and turns that person over to their secret police. That's what really worries us."

On the CBS Evening News (9/13, story 2, 1:35, Couric, 7.66M), McCain was asked it he thought "the President's proposal would stand up if it were reviewed again by the Supreme Court." The senator said, "I am not a constitutional expert, but people that are tell me there's a great risk of the President's proposal being overturned by the United States Supreme Court. But that's not the major reason why I'm involved in changing it. I want to preserve the Geneva Conventions which is provided protections for our men and women in uniform and out of uniform."

McCain said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/14), "I think we see a compromise there, so that we could prevent national security from being compromised, but yet still allow the defendant to be able to see some of the evidence against him. It's just not a normal procedure that someone who is subject to the death penalty is not allowed to see the evidence that's presented against him."

Frist May Bring Both Versions Of Tribunal Legislation To The Floor. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/14) if the President will get the military tribunal legislation from the Senate that he wants. Frist said, "We'll wait and see. We had the product that came out of the Armed Services Committee today. There are several very contentious issues in that bill that clearly the President will not agree with, and I think the majority of Republican senators, anyway, will not agree with. So not until we get to the floor will we know what the final product will be coming out of the United States Senate." Asked about the possibility that he might take the version that Bush wants directly to the floor in competition with the Warner-McCain-Graham alternative, Frist said, "That is correct, and a decision has not been made. We'll wait and look at both bills. But either way, senators will have the opportunity to express themselves."

Snow Denies Administration Is Trying To Change Geneva Conventions. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Koch) reported that during his press briefing Thursday, White House press secretary Tony Snow "tried to clarify the White House's position, saying we are not trying to change or amend the Geneva Conventions, we're trying to bring them substance, bring them clarity. He said that the problem with the Geneva Conventions, as they exist now, is that there are no standards and that nations can basically do what they want. And he insisted the White House is really trying to get rid of lawlessness and let people know exactly what they can and can't do."

Retired Judges Oppose Bush's Position On Detainees. The AP (9/14) reports, "Nine retired federal judges accused the Bush administration and Congress of trying to deprive detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, of the most basic legal right. Legislation under debate on Capitol Hill would strip federal courts of the power to hear detainees' challenges of their treatment and indefinite detention at the Guantanamo Bay." The nine retirees who signed the letter are "appeals court judges John Gibbons, Shirley Hufstedler, Nathaniel Jones, Timothy Lewis, William Norris, George Pratt, Lee Sarokin, Patricia Wald and US District Judge William Sessions."

54% Say Bush Administration Following "Right Course" On Detainees. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with 'the right course,' while only 34% say administration has 'gone too far.'" According to the same Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, "by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence."

NYTimes, WPost Blast Bush On Military Detentions Bill. The Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) says in an editorial, "It was a measure of his painfully skewed priorities that Mr. Bush made the unaccustomed trip yesterday to seek legislative permission for the CIA to make people disappear into secret prisons and have information extracted from them by means he dare not describe publicly." There is "no question that the United States is facing a dangerous foe that uses the foulest of methods. But a wide array of generals and others who should know argue that it is neither prudent nor useful for the United States to compromise its own values in response."

The New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "We'll find out in November how well the White House's be-very-afraid campaign has been working with voters. We already know how it's working in Congress. Stampeded by the fear of looking weak on terrorism, lawmakers are rushing to pass a bill demanded by the president that would have minimal impact on antiterrorist operations but could cause profound damage to justice and the American way." Bush "himself went to Capitol Hill to lobby for his bill, which would give Congressional approval to the same sort of ad hoc military commissions that Mr. Bush created on his own authority after 9/11 and that the Supreme Court has already ruled unconstitutional. It would permit the use of coerced evidence, secret hearings and other horrific violations of American justice." The "idea that the nation's chief executive is pressing so hard to undermine basic standards of justice is shocking. And any argument that these extreme methods would be used only against the most dangerous of international terrorists has been destroyed by the handling of hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, many of whom appear to have been scooped up in Afghanistan years ago with little attempt to verify any connection to terrorism, and now are in danger of lingering behind bars forever without a day in court."

Henninger Says Disunity Over Detainee Treatment Could Aid Terrorists. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M), "Read through the 14 Guantanamo detainee biographies posted on the White House Web site, and one gets a rare feel for the events that distinguish the lives of these individuals from the daily goals of everyone else in the world -- lives simply dedicated to the mass murder of innocents, and not just in lower Manhattan.

… Read all 14 of these histories devoted to 'sacrificing life' to put in context the denunciations of warrantless wiretaps and the Swift financial monitoring program." Republicans "are "arguing among themselves over the degree of access to classified intelligence this group should receive at trial. Democrats, other than saying they'll support the more liberal version, are contributing almost nothing to the new system. If a Democrat wins the White House in 2008, we may assume she or he will receive, as payback, a similar level of limp support from the GOP in the same war on terror. Say this for the Guantanamo 14: They have unity of purpose. Long term, our disunity could prove to be a big advantage to them."

Judge Refuses To Reinstate Key Terrorism Charge Against Padilla. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15, Anderson) reports US District Judge Marcia Cooke "refused Thursday to reinstate a key terrorism charge in the case against alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and two other defendants, raising the possibility of delays in their trial if prosecutors appeal the ruling." Cooke "ruled in August that a charge of conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap and maim' people overseas must be dismissed because it duplicated other charges in the same indictment. … The dismissed charge is important because it is the only one in the indictment that carries a potential life sentence." The AP notes that among other rulings yesterday, Cooke "refused a defense request for a list of people who attended an al-Qaida camp at the same time Padilla allegedly did in 2000" and "rejected…a defense request for identities of others who filled out al-Qaida applications that were found along with one prosecutors say was Padilla's in a binder in Afghanistan." She also "allowed Hassoun's wife to testify via video hookup from Beirut, Lebanon, about the actions FBI agents took before searching their home in suburban Sunrise in 2002. … Hassoun, who is allegedly Padilla's recruiter, claims the FBI search was illegal and that evidence seized should be thrown out."

Cooke Orders Prosecutors To Turn Over Padilla Medical Records. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/15, Blum, 265K) reports Cooke "ordered prosecutors Thursday to turn over medical records for…Padilla, a move that could reveal details of his treatment during 31/2 years in military custody." Cooke "included in her ruling all records relating to physical and mental evaluations of Padilla or medication taken by or administered to Padilla while held as an enemy combatant in a South Carolina Navy brig. Defense attorneys said they intend to use the records to argue the government engaged in unconstitutional conduct by interrogating" Padilla "and imprisoning him for years without giving him access to some legal rights."

Padilla Case Seen As Test Of Aggressive Interrogation Techniques. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Richey, 58K) reports that the federal agents who arrested Padilla obtained the arrest warrant by telling "a federal judge that two weeks earlier a confidential source had revealed that Mr. Padilla was plotting to build and detonate a radiological 'dirty' bomb in the United States. What the agents did not tell the judge is that their 'confidential source'" had revealed the information during "controversial interrogation sessions at a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison overseas." The Padilla "case is emerging as a major test of whether such intelligence information is admissible in US courts. And it highlights the difficult debate over military commissions currently under way in Congress, which is wrestling with how best to protect national security while also preserving America's tradition of due process and fair trials.

Pentagon Lists "Ten Facts About Guantanamo." In his Washington Post (9/15, A17, 748K) "In The Loop" column, Al Kamen discusses the Pentagon's "Ten Facts About Guantanamo" list, intended "to highlight what a nice place it is." The list notes that "'more money is spent on meals for detainees than' on U.S. troops stationed there," that the "Muslim call to prayer sounds five times a day," that prisoners "receive free medical, dental and psychiatric care," and more. Kamen adds, "Fact No. 8, probably one of the most important, notes that, contrary to what you might have heard, the prisoners actually really want to be in Guantanamo. 'The mother of a detainee stated: "Of course they wanted to stay there. … They had human rights and good living standards there. They had dentists and good meals -- everything they wanted."' Turns out, this quote from a March 2004 edition of the London Times was a Russian mother comparing Guantanamo with Russian jails."

Two Gitmo Detainees Returned To Kuwait. Two Kuwaitis released from the US military prison at Guantanmo Bay Cuba have been returned to Kuwait, where they will face trails on terrorism-related charges, according to their lawyer. The AP (9/14) reported that the US military said "an administrative review board had recommended the two men be transferred back to Kuwait from the prison in southeastern Cuba. … Two men, Omar Rajab Amin, 41, and Abdullah Kamel al-Kundari, 32, who had been held at Guantanamo for four years, arrived at an airport in Kuwait early Friday, said Khaled al-Odah, who heads the Kuwaiti Family Committee, an advocacy group for men held at the prison."

Albany Terrorism Trial Jurors See Video Of Alleged Missile Deal. Capital News 9 Albany (9/14, Ference) reported that on Thursday at the Albany trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain, accused of providing material support for terrorism, "jurors saw lengthy video clips showing…Hossain speaking with an FBI informant named Malik posing as a Pakistani businessman. In the video, Malik showed Hossain a surface-to-air missile and began discussing how Malik would pay Hossain to launder $50,000 to import the fake missile to a terrorist group. But the question is, did Hossain fully understand the transaction and the situation he was put in?" At a later meeting, "Malik asked, 'Have you heard of [a particular terrorist group]?' Hossain said yes, although it turns out he thought that was a music group, not a terrorist group. Later that year, Hossain told Malik, 'Non-believers will gradually convert to Islam, sir. There is no need for us to kill.'"

Terror Informant Says US Government Betrayed Him. CBS Evening News (9/13, story 8, 3:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, on an Arab-American "who was recruited to infiltrate a terror cell and wound up blowing the lid off a plot in New York City. But he now fears that what's happened to him since then will discourage other Arab-Americans from doing what he did." Here's our chief investigative correspondent Armen Keteyian." CBS (Keteyian) added that two years ago, the NYPD broke up a plot by two men who were planning "to bomb the subway beneath the world's biggest department store." Eldawoody "sees himself now as abandoned by the government, the country he served, blaming the NYPD and Federal prosecutors for betraying what he says were two conditions of his cooperation. Not disclosing his identity at trial. … And afterwards helping him find a new job."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate Approves Port Security Bill 98-0. USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) and the Washington Post (9/15, 748K), among other sources, run an AP story this morning reporting, "The Senate voted without dissent Thursday to tighten security at U.S. seaports by scanning nearly all incoming cargo for nuclear weapons or 'dirty bombs.'" The bill, approved 98-0 "in a pre-election push on national defense, would increase safeguards on the rail systems that pick up cargo from ports and authorize 1,000 new agents to screen containers coming off ships." The legislation "does not go as far as some Democrats demanded in requiring inspections for all U.S.-bound cargo before it leaves foreign ports."

McClatchy (9/15, Blumenthal) reports, "Senate passage of the bill comes more than two years after the 9-11 commission concluded that the nation's ports could be more vulnerable to attack than commercial aviation." The measure "picked up more steam over the past few weeks as congressional Republicans have ratcheted up their national security agenda." Democrats "said Republicans were scrambling to shore up their national security credentials for political reasons before the elections. 'Five years after 9-11, repeated failures by Bush Republicans have left our ports vulnerable and open to terrorist attack,' Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said in a statement."

Hill Battle Brewing Over Chemical Plant Security. A battle is brewing in Congress over how to secure US chemical plants from attack. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Marks, 58K) reports, "At issue is whether the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) should have the authority to require chemical plants to implement specific security measures, such as switching to safer chemicals or using armed guards. The chemical industry and House Republican leaders believe it should not. Instead, they favor allowing companies to come up with their own security proposals that can then be reviewed and approved by DHS. On the other side are environmentalists, some security experts, moderate Republicans, and Democrats. They believe DHS should have the ability to require companies to make security improvements, as long as companies have an opportunity to appeal requirements to which they object."

Muslim-American Security Expert Sues DHS Over Job Suspension. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15, Parry) reports, "An Egyptian-born aviation security expert is suing the U.S. government, claiming he was wrongly suspended from his Transportation Security Administration job based on a classified FBI file the government won't let him see. Wagih H. Makky filed the lawsuit Thursday in federal court in Newark, alleging he was harassed and discriminated against at work after the Sept. 11 terror attacks based on his nationality and his Muslim religion." The AP notes, "The lawsuit names the Department of Homeland Security among others as defendants. The lawsuit did not specify damages."

Chertoff Announces Mandatory Screening Of More Air Cargo. In an article appearing on at least 68 news websites, the AP (9/14, Lavoie) reported in a news conference at Boston's Logan International Airport Thursday, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that cargo brought "to airline ticket counters for shipment on passenger planes will have to go through the same security screening as checked baggage." Screening of such packages had been going on "for the past several months at most airports around the country," but it will now "be mandatory for 100 percent of those packages, Chertoff said." The AP added, however, that "most of the cargo on passenger planes, which comes from larger freight shippers, remains subjected only to random checks."

Chertoff Says Cost Of Registered Traveler Under Consideration. After running an article Thursday titled "Cost May Kill Travel Program," USA Today (9/15, Frank, 2.27M) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told reporters Thursday "that he is 'still looking at' how much to charge air travelers for a program that would speed them through airport security. Chertoff said he supports the idea of making people in the Registered Traveler program 'pay their own weight,' which could cost up to $200 a year." However, he said "exactly what the right amount of money is going to be and how that's going to work, I think, is something we're still looking at." The secretary's "comments come days after the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) disclosed that it plans to charge travelers $100 to $120 to enroll in Registered Traveler and at least $70 a year for every year after their first in the program."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, A8, 2.03M) reports the TSA's announcement this week that "it plans to charge an annual fee of $100 per person to cover background checks and the full cost of airport screening" prompted a "battle" with private companies who "expected a fee of about $30." The fee would "'stunt, if not eliminate RT programs, thus undermining the promise of better aviation security and much needed customer service improvements,' the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition, which represents private companies that want to provide the service, said in a statement."

Insurers Seek Renewal Of Post-9/11 Terrorism Insurance Program. Some in the business and insurance communities want the federal government to create a long-term or permanent terrorism insurance program similar to the one established by the White House and Congress after the 9/11 attacks to backstop the insurance industry in the event of another attack. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Mullins, Pleven, 2.03M) reports, "Under the program set up by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act, the government steps in to help make an insurer's payouts if the losses from a foreign terrorist attack exceed that insurer's deductible. With more than a year remaining before the program expires, a politically savvy group -- including insurance companies, real-estate owners, financial services firms and former American International Group Chief Executive Maurice Greenberg -- is working to press the issue. … At a speech in New York today, Mr. Greenberg is expected to say that the government must help the industry if terrorists strike with a weapon of mass destruction. The insurance industry should be able to cover claims from a less catastrophic attack, according to his prepared remarks."

Mississippi Overspent On "Sewer Hog" After Katrina. The Washington Post (9/15, A19, Williamson, 748K) reports a recent audit from the Transportation Department's inspector general found "that the state of Mississippi had overspent by $772 an hour on the Sewer Hog, a high-speed swiller used to clear flooded storm drains. Desperate to reopen US 90 along the Gulf Coast, Mississippi transportation officials turned to Texas-based Garner Environmental Services Inc., exclusive operators of the Sewer Hog." The machine was used to suck "slop and sand from about 200 miles of three-foot sewer lines. But it also hogged the budget. State highway officials -- and the feds -- paid $1.7 million for services that the report said ought to have cost $294,000." The Post adds that "like a homeowner with an overflowing toilet, Mississippi highway officials opted to mop first and ask questions later."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Hold Separate White House Meetings With Musharraf, Karzai. The AP (9/14) reports President Bush will meet with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the White House on September 22, and with Afghan President Hamid Karzai four days later. The AP says the neighboring countries' "relations have sometimes been strained by terrorist hideouts along their border."

Kerry Accuses Bush Administration Of "Cut And Run" In Afghanistan. An AP (9/14, Miga) report carried by about 65 newspapers and websites says Sen. John Kerry said in a Howard University speech, "The Administration's Afghanistan policy defines cut and run. Cut and run while the Taliban-led insurgency is running amok across entire regions of the country. Cut and run while Osama bin Laden and his henchmen hide and plot in a lawless no-man's land." Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz replied, "John Kerry lacks the credibility on the war on terror to be taken seriously."

Taliban Regroups In Western Afghanistan. USA Today (9/15, 8A, 2.27M) reports Taliban militants "have regrouped in western provinces" of Afghanistan and "ignited violence that has killed a dozen people in two days, officials said. Up to 200 Taliban fighters poured into Bakwa in Farah province. They surrounded a police compound and fired rocket-propelled grenades at policemen before being driven out," according to the regional police chief.

Poland To Send 1,000 More Troops To Afghanistan. The Financial Times (9/15, Dombey, Fidler, Cienski) reports that as expected, Poland has committed 1,000 new troops for NATO's Afghanistan force. They will "join the 100 already on the ground in Afghanistan but are unlikely to arrive until February 2007."

WPost Says European NATO Members Must Send More Troops. The Washington Post (9/15, A18, 748K) editorializes, "There's no question that placing soldiers in harm's way is one of the hardest steps for a democracy, and rightly so. But European governments that say they are committed to NATO and its mission in Afghanistan cannot continue to watch from a distance as American, British and Canadian soldiers do the lion's share of the fighting -- and dying. If NATO is to be an enduring military alliance, its other members must step forward."

Neuharth Says Troops Should Be Redeployed From Iraq To Afghanistan. Al Neuharth writes in USA Today (9/15, 2.27M), "Currently, we have about 147,000 troops in Iraq, about 21,000 in Afghanistan. We actually "cut and ran" from the hunt for bin Laden in Afghanistan to carry out our Iraq misadventure. … Bush says we must 'stay the course' and not 'cut and run.' Since we cut and ran from Afghanistan during our Osama hunt years ago, maybe we should reverse that course now. Redeploying our troops to fulfill our pledge to get bin Laden could make for a worldwide celebration by freedom lovers. Letting him stay on the loose is the biggest boost for terrorists, in Iraq and around the world."

CIA Was Told There Were No Iraq-Al Qaeda Ties In 2002, But Did Not Inform White House. The Washington Post (9/15, A14, Pincus, 748K) reports a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report says the CIA "learned in late September 2002 from a high-level member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle that Iraq had no past or present contact with Osama bin Laden" and that Hussein "considered bin Laden an enemy of the Baghdad regime." The Post says that while "President Bush and other senior administration officials were at that time regularly linking Hussein to al-Qaeda, the CIA's highly sensitive intelligence supporting the contrary view was apparently not passed on to the White House or senior Bush policymakers."

Two US Troops Killed, Others Wounded, In Baghdad Truck Bombing. ABC World News (9/14, story 3, 1:40, Gibson) reported on "an especially alarming attack against US forces" in Iraq. A "suicide truck bomb wounded 27 troops and killed two others. Military outposts are supposed to be secure against such bombs." ABC (Sciutto) added, "The military is crediting a rapid medical response with saving lives. Military officials say the bomber was able to get past a security checkpoint and inside the outpost because the bomb was apparently hidden under dirt in the dump truck, and not discovered on inspection." CBS Evening News (9/13, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) ran a very brief item on the bombing, putting the number of wounded at 25, and added, "Most of the injuries, though, were not serious. Five US troops have been killed in the past two days."

Sectarian Violence Continues. An AP (9/14, Quinn) story carried by about 50 newspapers and websites reports sectarian killings "have surged in parts of Baghdad not yet included in a security offensive." Bombings and "other insurgent attacks killed four American soldiers and wounded 25 in the capital region," and police "reported finding 20 bodies dumped on streets." The Los Angeles Times (9/15, 918K) says Army spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV "acknowledged that despite a major operation to combat death squads and curb sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Arab paramilitary fighters in Baghdad, violence had increased."

Petraeus Says Samarra Mosque Bombing "'Took The Gloves Off." In a brief item headlined "A General's Candor On Iraq," the Washington Post (9/15, A17, Tyson, 748K) reports Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, speaking at the Brookings Institution Thursday, said the "February bombing of the gold-domed mosque in Samarra was 'hugely harmful' and a 'very, very devastating blow' to security efforts." He said it "'took the gloves off the…Shia militia,' starting 'a downward spiral that is very hard to arrest. … It's had a horrific effect on the security situation.'"

Iraqi Official Says Syria Must Curtail Terrorist Border Crossings. An AP (9/14, Jelinek) story carried by about 35 newspapers and websites reports Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh met with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon Thursday and said that while Iraq "will spend more on jobs and reconstruction to battle the insurgency in the restive west," Syria "must clamp down on terrorists crossing the border." Saleh "told a Pentagon news conference he did not request more American troops for Anbar province because that would be a military decision."

Green Berets, Army Battalion At Odds In Anbar. The Washington Post (9/15, Tyson, 748K) runs a front-page story on US strategy in Anbar, and tensions between elite Green Berets and the Army battalion "that oversees the region." The "conflict in the Anbar camp, while extreme, is not an isolated phenomenon in Iraq, U.S. officers say. It highlights two clashing approaches to the war: the heavy focus of many regular U.S. military units on sweeping combat operations; and the more fine-grained, patient work Special Forces teams put into building rapport with local leaders, security forces and the people -- work that experts consider vital in a counterinsurgency."

Iraq's Poor Economy Yet Another Factor In Instability. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Murphy, Al-Taiee, 58K) reports that while USMC Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer recently said the US "appeared to be losing the political, if not the military, fight in Anbar," he said "success rests as much on restoring a measure of economic stability and basic services as it does on ending Iraq's sectarian bloodshed." But Iraq's economy "is weaker than at any point since the US invasion. Some estimate joblessness at 60 percent (the CIA shows a 30 percent rate for 2005), and prices for foodstuffs and basic goods have doubled -- and in some cases tripled -- since 2003."

Judge Tells Saddam He Was "Not A Dictator." The New York Times (9/15, Von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports Abdullah al-Amiri, the chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, "assured the defendant on Thursday that he was 'not a dictator,'" which seemed to please Hussein. A Kurdish farmer testified that in 1988, he "had pleaded with Mr. Hussein for the life of his wife and seven young children. He said a furious Mr. Hussein shouted, 'Shut up and get out.'" In court, Hussein "jumped up to defend himself. 'Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein?' he asked the judge, referring to himself in the third person, as is his habit in court. 'Wasn't Saddam a dictator and an enemy to the Kurdish people, as they say?'" Amiri "replied: 'I will answer you: you are not a dictator. Not a dictator,' he repeated. 'You were not a dictator.' Mr. Hussein, smiling, replied, 'Thank you.'" The Washington Post (9/15, A14, Raghavan, 748K) reports the episode came a day after "prosecutors called for Amiri's resignation, saying he had allowed 'defendants to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words' and had 'allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum.'" The Los Angeles Times (9/15, McDonnell, 918K) also has a report.

Obama Says Iraq Policy "Has Failed," Afghanistan "Getting Worse." Sen. Barack Obama was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/14) about Republican efforts to paint Democrats as weak on terrorism and security. Obama said, "This is the usual routine that the Republicans have trotted out before every election. And the question is, is it going to work a third time despite the irrefutable evidence that the policy in Iraq that they pursued has failed, that Afghanistan is getting worse, that every intelligence officer that you talk to and every objective observer that you talk to would indicate that we actually have more active terrorists around the world than we did at the time of 9/11?"

Marine Iraq Veteran Sees Two Problems With Military Transfer Strategy. In a New York Times (9/15, 1.21M) op-ed, Seth Moulton, a "Marine infantry officer in Iraq from March to September 2003 and from July 2004 to October 2005," writes, "In the long term, we must withdraw American troops" from Iraq, and "replacing them with capable Iraqi forces is the right way to do it. But there are two serious problems with how we are putting this strategy into effect. First, despite all rhetoric in Washington to the contrary, American commanders are being pressured to meet timelines rather than encouraged to wait until Iraqi forces are ready. … Second, our strategy is based on consolidating American forces in huge megabases as a means to reduce numbers and, as advocated by several members of Congress, to 'move to the periphery.' This is exactly the opposite of what has been prescribed for decades to fight a counterinsurgency, or to squelch a fomenting civil war."

World Bank Warns 26 "Fragile" States May Breed Terrorists. The Washington Post (9/15, A13, DeYoung, 748K) reports a new World Bank report concludes the "number of weak and poorly governed nations that can provide a breeding ground for global terrorism has grown sharply over the past three years, despite increased Western efforts to improve conditions in such states." So-called "fragile" countries "have jumped to 26 from 17 since the report was last issued in 2003. Five states graduated off the list, but 14 made new appearances."

According to the World Bank website, the 26 nations or territories are Afghanistan, Angola, Burundi, Cambodia, the Central African Republic, Comoros, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast), the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Eritrea, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kosovo, Laos, Liberia, Myanmar (Burma), Nigeria, the Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Timor-Leste (East Timor), Togo, Vanuatu, West Bank and Gaza, and Zimbabwe.

WSJournal Says Increased Attacks Force Arab Regimes To Confront Terrorism. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, A12, 2.03M) editorializes, "In the current issue of Foreign Policy, Kim Cragin and Andrew Curiel of the Rand Corporation compare the incidence of terrorism world-wide in the four years preceding and following 9/11. Between 1998 and the end of 2001, there were 2,991 fatalities from terrorism in North America, almost all of them on 9/11. Since then, there have been only three. By contrast, terrorist fatalities are up nearly everywhere else, more than tenfold in the Middle East. … It's a tragic fact that so many Muslims have been murdered in terrorist atrocities. But it is also the case that Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia that once tolerated or funded terrorism have belatedly come to recognize its dangers. That's progress for them -- and safety for Americans."

DOJ:

DOJ Whistleblower Named To DC Ethics Committee. The National Law Journal (9/15, Geier) reports, "'Poetic justice' is what a former U.S. Department of Justice ethics attorney calls her appointment to the District of Columbia Bar's legal ethics committee while a disciplinary complaint has been pending against her with the D.C. bar. … And some poetic justice may go a long way for whistleblower Jesselyn A. Radack, who was the subject of a Justice Department complaint before the D.C. Bar's Office of Bar Counsel when she was named in June, 2005 to the committee that advises the bar on the rules of professional conduct." The Journal continues, "Radack is the former Justice Department ethics advisor in the case of 'American Taliban' John Walker Lindh who quit her government job, lost a private-sector position and was the subject of a criminal investigation, all involving the Lindh case. Saying that she leaked information to the press, the Justice Department referred Radack to the state bars where she is licensed-and was even put on the federal 'no-fly' list. … 'Because of this episode, I am dedicating my life to whistleblowers,' said Radack, who started work last May at Grayson & Kubli, a private practice in McLean, Va., that handles government contracts, telecommunications and whistleblower law. … She also decided not to pursue the action she filed against DOJ that a federal judge in Washington recently dismissed. [NLJ, Aug. 28]. … 'I'm in a new job and ready to let go of it,' Radack said. 'It was empowering to put them on the defensive for once and finally get my version of the events down in a public forum.'" The Journa notes, "Radack claims that she was pushed out of her job as general counsel to DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility for not playing along with her superiors after federal law enforcement officials disregarded her advice on handling Lindh, dubbed the 'American Taliban' when he was captured in Afghanistan. … U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. recently found that DOJ did not violate its own policy when it sent referral letters to the Maryland and D.C. bars. Radack v. U.S. DOJ, No. 04-1881 (D.D.C.). … Charles S. Miller, spokesman for DOJ, said that the department would say with regard to Radack only that 'We're pleased with the court's decision.'"

DOJ_NMG_0063239

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Seeks Reinstatement Of Merrill Lynch Enron-Linked Convictions. The AP (9/15, Hays) reports, "Federal Enron prosecutors today asked the entire U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to hear arguments about reinstating fraud and conspiracy convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives that a three-judge panel threw out in a split decision last month." The AP continues, "The 2-1 decision slapped the Justice Department by overturning most convictions against the four men, who were found guilty in 2004 of participating in a sham 1999 deal that allowed Enron to post bogus profits." The AP adds, "The three-judge panel ruled that evidence was insufficient to support convictions against one of the Merrill defendants. Regarding the other three, the opinion said prosecutors employed a flawed theory that they deprived Enron of its right to their honest services because, even though the deal was a sham, it was consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the company or shareholders of money or property. … The panel affirmed convictions of perjury and obstruction against one of the three who lied to a grand jury about the deal." The AP notes, "In today's filing, prosecutors said the reversal 'threatens to insulate from punishment proven criminal conduct by corporate employees as long as their fraudulent goals are shared by senior executives, without regard to the obvious interest of a legitimate business entity and its stockholders in the honest services of all corporate employees.' … Prosecutors said a rehearing before all 14 5th Circuit judges is warranted to correct the panel's 'cramped and unworkable' interpretation of the honest services theory."

Ex-Willbros Official Pleads Guilty To Bribery. The AP (9/15) reports, "A former executive of a subsidiary of Willbros Group Inc. pleaded guilty Thursday to violating a federal law by conspiring to bribe government officials in Nigeria and Ecuador to obtain gas pipeline work in the two countries, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "Jim Bob Brown, 44, is to be sentenced Nov. 30 for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. … Brown, who worked for Willbros International Inc. in Nigeria and South America, admitted that he and another Willbros International executive arranged for the payment of about $1.5 million in cash in Nigeria in 2005 as part of a conspiracy to obtain gas pipeline construction business there." The AP adds, "Brown also said he and other Willbros International executives approved of a scheme from at least 1996 to early 2005 in which fictitious invoices were submitted from the company's Nigerian operations. The money was used to make payments to officials with Nigerian revenue agencies and courts to get lower taxes and to influence litigation. … The Justice Department said Brown also admitted that in 2004 he conspired to pay at least $300,000 to officials of the Ecuadorean government oil company to obtain a gas pipeline rehabilitation contract."

Leak Scandal Has Not Hurt H-P's Stock Price. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/15, Page D - 1, Pimentel) reports, "Four years ago, Hewlett-Packard's bid to buy Compaq Computer turned into a bitter boardroom battle, jangling nerves on Wall Street and sending the company's stock plunging to as low as $14." The Chronicle continues, "One would think that the current scandal at HP -- with shocking revelations of corporate spying that could possibly lead to criminal charges -- would also rattle investors' confidence in the technology giant. … But that hasn't happened. … Instead, the Palo Alto company, which is considered one of the big comeback stories of the past two years in the tech industry, has managed to remain a favorite of investors. The boardroom scandal has not turned into a material event for the company, at least in Wall Street's eyes." The Chronicle adds, "For proof of that indifference, look no further than HP's stock, which has remained steady over the past two weeks, trading above $36, up nearly 50 percent from a year ago. It dipped slightly last week at the height of the scandal but steadily bounced back this week. … The stock closed at $36.25, down 12 cents, Thursday. That's just 13 cents below where it was the day the scandal broke last week. … The lack of reaction on Wall Street also speaks to the financial industry's focus on the bottom line. Some analysts say disputes involving ethics and morals appear to hold little sway when compared with returns."

Lerach Sues H-P Directors, Counsel Over Scandal. The California Recorder (9/15, Scheck) reports, "It was Thursday afternoon and the press was sweating: For three days no one new had decided to go after Hewlett-Packard's board of directors for their recent descent into public ignominy. … Not to fear, though: At about 4 p.m., plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach joined Congress, the California attorney general, the San Francisco U.S. Attorney, and federal regulators. Representing an HP shareholder, Lerach filed a suit accusing board members and executives of breaching their fiduciary duty for a litany of reasons, including their ongoing use of top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini." The Recorder continues, "Lerach's complaint is the latest result of a mess that began early this year when HP board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn initiated a probe in which an investigator lied to access private phone records of other directors and several journalists. … And while it's not yet clear how state Attorney General Bill Lockyer or U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will proceed -- Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring state charges, while Ryan's office met with HP lawyers on Monday -- Lerach's claims are quite explicit in the derivative suit he filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court in California." The Recorder adds, "The lead partner at Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins argues in the suit that 10 HP board members and executives -- including Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins -- should be forced to pay damages to the company. … Lerach wrote that the defendants 'breached their fiduciary duties to HP, committed gross mismanagement, abused their control of HP, and have engaged in a gross dereliction of their duties, as well as corporate waste and attempted enrichment' by seeking to solidify their positions within the company by investigating board members Thomas Perkins and George Keyworth."

New York AG Objects To Grasso' Request For New Judge. The New York Law Journal (9/15, Bar) reports, "The New York attorney general's office Wednesday filed an objection to former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso's request that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles Edward Ramos recuse himself from presiding over the government's excessive pay lawsuit against Grasso. … 'Grasso may have been permitted to treat the New York Stock Exchange as a fiefdom for his personal enrichment, picking the members of the Board and placing those over whom he had the most significant regulatory authority on the compensation committee, but he cannot be permitted to pick and choose the judge who will preside over his trial,' the government said in its affidavit." The Journal continues, "Grasso's attorneys argued in a motion filed last week that Ramos should recuse himself after he participated in ex parte settlement discussions in the case. … They also argued that the judge made factual and legal comments on the case during settlement discussions that would make it difficult for him to preside over the case. … Finally, Grasso said last week that he was unaware that the judge had applied twice for a position at the Stock Exchange and that in his second application Ramos had cited to a case he decided in which he had addressed the issue of excessive compensation."

Fed Official Concerned About Hedge Fund Margins. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Ip) reports, "A top Federal Reserve official believes regulators need to examine whether banks and securities dealers are imposing adequate margin requirements on hedge funds." The Journal continues, "Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, believes margin requirements that are sensible in normal times may prove too thin in stressful market conditions and could actually aggravate violent market moves. … While he doesn't assert that margin rules are too low or say what regulators should do, his remarks suggest regulators may soon turn their attention to margin practices after pressing Wall Street to improve how they handle complex and fast-growing credit and equity derivatives." The Journal adds, "Mr. Geithner, in remarks to be delivered in a speech in Hong Kong this morning, noted regulators are overhauling rules on how much capital banks must maintain to guard against loan and trading losses. 'It is critical,' he said, that that effort 'be reinforced with more attention by supervisors to margin practice ... within the major financial institutions.'"

Mexican Tycoon Settles SOX Case With SEC. The New York Times (9/15, Malkin) reports, "The billionaire tycoon Ricardo Salinas Pliego and the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States reached a settlement on Thursday in the first lawsuit against a foreign company under the corporate governance rules of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act." The Times continues, "Mr. Salinas Pliego, who owns Mexico's second-largest broadcaster, TV Azteca, agreed to pay $7.5 million in penalties and compensation to settle accusations of fraud involving a scheme to conceal a deal between a TV Azteca subsidiary and a company secretly owned by Mr. Salinas." The Times adds, "In the settlement, Mr. Salinas Pliego neither admitted or denied wrongdoing. One of his executives, Pedro Padilla Longoria, agreed to pay $1 million. … TV Azteca, which was also a defendant in the case, said in a statement that the settlement 'does not entail economic consequences' for the company. … Under the agreement, Mr. Salinas Pliego and Mr. Padilla are forbidden to serve as executives or directors of any publicly listed American company. Mr. Salinas Pliego delisted his companies from the New York Stock Exchange last year, arguing that 'excessive regulation' was a burden. … The S.E.C. charged Mr. Salinas Pliego with fraud in January 2005 in connection with a debt deal involving what was then the cellphone unit of TV Azteca. A company called Codisco, secretly owned by Mr. Salinas Pliego and a partner, bought discounted debt owed by the cellphone unit."

SEC Urged To Give Shareholders Tools To Hold Boards Accountable. Ira Millstein, senior associate dean for corporate governance at the Yale School of Management, and Harvey Goldschmid, the Dwight Professor of Law at Columbia, write in the Wall Street Journal (9/15, 2.03M), "Shareholder access is officially back on the agenda at the SEC, forced there by a recent court decision. And this time around the SEC should seize the opportunity to craft a solution that opens up the proxy to shareholders in a sensible way, a solution that ensures board accountability to shareholders. … We urge the SEC to balance the system and give shareholders the tools to hold boards accountable -- and, in the process, restore public confidence in the fairness and economic rationality of the governance system."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Warns Of Online Sexual Predators. The Kansas City Star (9/15, Rizzo) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told an audience in Kansas City on Thursday that the battle against Internet predators is 'a fight for our future.'" The Star continues, "Gonzales called on all levels of law enforcement as well as parents, educators and private advocacy groups to work together to defeat the 'vast and frightening network' of criminals who every day seek to harm children. … 'It is brutal. It is heinous, and it is criminal,' he said." The Star adds, "The attorney general spoke to several hundred federal, state and local law enforcement officials from across the Midwest attending the annual Protect Our Children conference. … He told them that the proliferation of child pornography and sexual predators should be seen as 'a call to arms' to those dedicated to fighting it. … Halting those crimes is a top priority of the Justice Department. Gonzales promoted an initiative started earlier this year called Project Safe Childhood, which seeks to coordinate law enforcement efforts with endeavors to educate children and parents about the problem and how they fight a 'determined and desperate brand of criminal.'" The Star notes, "He cited a recent study that found half of Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 reported being exposed to pornographic material over the Web. And one in seven reported that they were sexually solicited online. … While that was an improvement from five years earlier, when a study found one in five reporting solicitations, Gonzalez said, 'One in seven getting solicited is one in seven too many.'"

The AP (9/15, Twiddy) reports, "Joint federal and local task forces arrested more than 1,600 people nationwide last year who were accused of exploiting children over the Internet, a fivefold increase over 2000. … But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the problem only continues to grow as the Internet has given child pornographers and people seeking trysts with minors unparalleled access to young users and made it easier to hide from law enforcement. … 'The only way to respond to their horrific ambitions is to respond with greater perseverance,' said Gonzales, speaking at the Protect Our Children Conference, a three-day event bringing law enforcement from Missouri, Kansas, Illinois and Nebraska together with child advocates and abuse treatment organizations." The AP continues, "In particular, Gonzales said states need to re-evaluate their laws against child exploitation and make them stronger, if necessary. … Missouri, for example, enacted legislation this year that boosts the penalties for many child sex crimes, such as a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for someone convicted of trying to entice a child into meeting to have sex." The AP adds, "Gonzales said federal, state and local law enforcement are doing a better job of coordinating their efforts and teaming up with community organizations that teach parents and children how to avoid online predators and deal with the aftermath when children are abused. … He added that his office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children will begin airing new public service messages early next year to call attention to the online dangers." The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman's office in Kansas City has been among the leaders in the country in attacking online predators, filing 42 child exploitation cases last year, the sixth-highest in the nation. So far this year, the office has filed 23 cases, spokesman Don Ledford said."

WDAF-TV, Fox 4, Kansas City (9/15) reports, "They are out there and they are preying on our young. On Thursday, one group of criminals was the focus of a visit to the Metro by the U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales." WDAF-TV continues, "A national study said that one out of every seven children who go online will be solicited sexually. That statistic was so disturbing that the US Justice Department pledged a crackdown on Internet predators. That's what brought Gonzales to Kansas City. .. . 'It's a wrenching reality that every day children are sexually solicited online,' Gonzales said." WDAF-TV adds, "In many ways Gonzales was preaching to the choir. He spoke to state, local and federal officials at a conference on child protection. Gonzales' message? The Federal government will lead the fight against Internet predators. … 'Everyday we must talk to our kids about what they are seeing, what they are hearing and who they are communicating with online,' Gonzales said."

Ney Expected To Plead Guilty To One Criminal Charge. USA Today (9/15, 2.27M) reports, "Rep. Bob Ney, the Ohio Republican charged with taking gifts, trips and campaign donations from lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is expected to plead guilty to at least one criminal corruption charge possibly as early as today, Republicans officials told the Associated Press." Ney "has consistently denied any wrongdoing but agreed last month to give up his re-election bid for the upcoming election. It is not clear from the Republican officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of pending legal proceedings, if Ney will resign his House seat." The officials "did not say what charge Ney would plead guilty to."

The New York Times (9/15, Shenon, 1.21M) reports "a guilty plea would make Mr. Ney, a six-term congressman, the first member of Congress to admit to criminal charges in the Abramoff investigation, which has focused on the actions of several current and former Republican lawmakers who had been close to the former lobbyist." The Times adds, "People with detailed knowledge of the investigation said Mr. Ney had entered an in-patient rehabilitation center in recent days for treatment of alcoholism, making it uncertain whether he would appear at a court hearing to announce the plea. Lawyers and others would speak only anonymously because of concern that they would anger prosecutors."

The Washington Post (9/15, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Ney's Washington attorney, Mark H. Tuohey, said from London yesterday that he expected no immediate developments in the case. … Aides in his office did not return calls, and Justice officials would not comment."

The AP (9/15, Weisman) reports that "the Justice Department is expected to announce a plea agreement or an agreement to reach a plea bargain as early as Saturday." The AP adds, "Ney, a soft-spoken, popular Republican, became known as the mayor of the House for the largesse he showed to fellow members from his post as chairman of the House Administration Committee. His entanglements with Abramoff became his undoing. … Guilty pleas from Abramoff, two former aides to retired Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and Ney's former chief of staff all said Ney accepted gifts and favors in exchange for official actions on behalf of Abramoff's clients."

Novak Disputes Claims Made By Armitage. The New York Times (9/15, Johnston, 1.21M) reports columnist Robert Novak "has disputed statements by his primary source" in the Plame leak case, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, "who said his mention of her identity was inadvertent." Novak said in his column that Armitage "had 'obscured' the details of their conversation on July 8, 2003, in a way that made Mr. Armitage's disclosure of the identity of the Central Intelligence Agency officer, Valerie Wilson, seem less deliberate." Novak "wrote that Mr. Armitage 'did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made clear that he considered it especially suited for my column,' the writer said." Armitage "said he stood by his account of the meeting. He said that his comments about Ms. Wilson in the conversation came at the end of the interview, were brief and made in response to a question posed by Mr. Novak."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Franken) reported Novak "is proving one of the immutable laws of Washington, a controversy is never really over." Novak "now says the contention by Armitage that it was a passing reference that propelled the writer to identify Valerie Plame in July 2003 wasn't so off-hand after all. Novak writes, 'He identified to me the CIA division where Ms. Wilson worked. Armitage did not slip me this information as idle chitchat, as he now suggests. He made it clear he considered it especially suited for my column.' … Novak's column set off a multi-million dollar special counsel's investigation into whether the law had been broken by a White House trying to get retribution."

Armitage Criticized For Not Acknowledging Role In Leak Earlier. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/15), Victoria Toensing discusses the controversy under the headline, "What A Load Of Armitage!" Toensing says Armitage has "finally emerged from the cover-my-backside closet, 'apologizing' on CBS for keeping quiet for almost three years about being" Novak's original source. He "disingenuously blames his silence on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's non-legally based request -- any witness is free to talk about his or her testimony -- not to discuss the matter." Toensing adds, "Put aside hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer funds squandered on the investigation, New York Times reporter Judith Miller's 85 days in jail, the angst and legal fees of scores of witnesses, the White House held siege to a criminal investigation while fighting the war on terror, Karl Rove's reputation maligned, and 'Scooter' Libby's resignation and indictment. By his silence, Mr. Armitage is responsible for one of the most factually distorted investigations in history."

Las Vegas Bribery Bagman To Plead Guilty To RICO Charge Monday. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports, "A former politician and lobbyist accused of ferrying bribes for a strip club owner reached a plea deal Thursday, just days before the start of his trial, authorities said." Lance Malone "has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said. … Authorities in turn have dropped wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges, and agreed not to object to Malone serving his sentence concurrently with a three-year sentence a San Diego jury levied against him last summer for similar charges." The AP notes, "Malone's trial was to cap off a three-year FBI probe into corruption and bribery on the Clark County commission."

Wife Of Convicted Alabama Mayor To Plead Guilty To Obstructing Probe. The Mobile Press-Register (9/14, Dezember, Kirby) reported, "Crystal Russo, the wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, will plead guilty in Mobile's federal court next week to obstruction of justice as part of an agreement with prosecutors, according to a Wednesday court filing. Crystal Russo, 25, was scheduled to be tried next month for allegedly trying to help her husband hide money that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors this summer in their corruption case against the now-convicted former mayor." The Press-Register noted, "On Sept. 1, Steve Russo, Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a Mobile federal jury on numerous counts related to plots by Wall and fellow developer Jim Brown to enrich the mayor in an effort to curry favor in City Hall." The AP (9/15) also briefly reports on the plea agreement.

FBI Arrests Oakland Haberdasher In City Contract Fraud Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/15, Zamora, Heredia, Lee, 405K) reports, "A well-connected Oakland businessman has been arrested on federal charges of extorting bribe money in exchange for using his influence to help a contract applicant win a deal with the city." Maurice Himy "was arrested Wednesday by FBI agents on a federal complaint accusing him of interference of commerce by threats or violence. Until March, he owned Spaccio, an Italian men's clothing store…just steps from Oakland City Hall." US Magistrate Wayne Brazil yesterday "ordered Himy to turn over his passport and released him on his own recognizance." The Chronicle notes, "Himy's arrest followed a 17-month investigation by the FBI over the awarding of a city of Oakland contract to provide auctioneering services for city-owned vehicles and surplus property."

The AP (9/15) reports, "The one-count complaint alleges Himy, in exchange for more than $10,000, steered the contract the businessman's way with the help of a City Hall insider. The businessman was not named…but he contacted the FBI after Himy allegedly told him the only way he could obtain the contract was through payoffs to Himy. … Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for City Attorney John Russo, said, 'We haven't been contacted by the FBI and if there are any problems, obviously, we want to see those addressed and remedied.'" Bay City News Wires (9/15) notes, "The complaint alleges numerous discussions between Himy, a cooperating witness, and an Oakland city official, named only as 'City Official A,' involving the payment of thousands of dollars to Himy in return for help in obtaining the auctioneering city contract that was eventually approved for the cooperating witness. Prosecutors said Himy's arrest is the result of a 17-month investigation by the FBI."

Boston Police Officers Caught In FBI Sting Indicted On Drug Charges. The AP (9/15) reports Boston police officers Roberto Pulido, Carlos Pizarro and Nelson Carrasquillo "were indicted Thursday on charges of conspiring to possess heroin and cocaine with intent to distribute, the U.S attorney's office announced." The officers "had gone to Florida, authorities said, to collect a $35,000 payment for protecting a Massachusetts shipment of cocaine that was part of an undercover FBI sting operation. At the meeting, prosecutors said, agents recorded the men agreeing to protect two more cocaine shipments totaling 100 kilograms and also to protect 5 kilograms of heroin." The Boston Herald (9/15, Sweet, Johnson, 203K) adds that the "alleged crooked cops were suspended without pay…yesterday and two of them freed on bail after their indictments by a federal grand jury on drug conspiracy charges." US District Court Magistrate Judge Joyce London Alexander, "unconvinced Pizarro and Carrasquillo are a flight risk or a threat to the public, set them free pending trial." The Boston Globe (9/15, 425K) also reports on the indictments in "New England in Brief."

Former Daley Patronage Chief Again Testifies Before Grand Jury. The AP (9/15, Robinson) reports former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich "made his second appearance before a federal grand jury in three weeks Thursday as prosecutors pushed ahead with an investigation of City Hall. … Sorich was one of three former officials convicted by a federal court jury July 6 in what prosecutors called a scheme to use fraud to cover up the fact that they were loading the city payroll with campaign workers." The AP notes, "U.S. attorney's office spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment on Sorich's latest grand jury appearance."

Prosecutor Makes Closing Arguments At Gotti Retrial. The New York Times (9/15, Williams, 1.21M) reports, "Closing arguments began yesterday in Federal District Court in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti, with prosecutors saying that Mr. Gotti's claim that he quit the Gambino crime family in 1999 was no more than a scheme to avoid a long prison sentence. … Mr. Gotti's defense is that he retired from the Mafia before mid-July 1999, a time frame that would protect him from prosecution because of the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges." Newsday (9/15, DeStefano) adds that Assistant US Attorney Miriam Rocah said Gotti "spent a lifetime rising to the top of the Gambino crime family and the proof was 'overwhelming' that he reaped millions of dollars through a murderous racketeering conspiracy that pillaged city businesses." She "tried to belittle the withdrawal defense, saying Gotti was deeply involved in some of the crimes. 'Proof of John Gotti Junior's participation in the charged crimes is overwhelming,' said Rocah," recalling that "mob turncoats like Michael DiLeonardo told of how he personally paid millions of dollars to Gotti in construction payoffs."

The AP (9/15, Neumeister) reports, "Rocah dismissed statements Gotti made in prison conversations in which he claimed he had quit the mob and wanted to move to Canada to start a new life. She said it was part of 'a charade contrived by Gotti to get himself off the hook.'" Rocah said that Gotti "was careful not to get too close to most crimes, relying on associates and soldiers to carry them out. … In fact, Rocah said, Gotti operated like the chief executive officer of a corporation, 'raking in millions of dollars in the 1990s.' She added: 'Throughout the 1990s, John Gotti's business was crime, and business was good.'" The New York Post (9/15, Cornell, 608K) also reports on the closing arguments, under the headline "Junior's Retirement 'Charade.'"

Genovese Capo Tied To Indicted Garbage Hauler Pleads Guilty To RICO Charge. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports, "Matthew 'Matty the Horse' Ianniello, an ailing 86-year-old longtime capo in the Genovese crime family who had ties to Danbury garbage kingpin James Galante, pleaded guilty Thursday to a racketeering charge, admitting he helped infiltrate a union and interfere with a federal grand jury probe. … A plea agreement…called for Ianniello to be sentenced to between 1½ and two years in prison. Without the deal, Ianniello would have faced up to 20 years in prison. … He also agreed to forfeit up to $1 million to the government."

Jurors Deadlocked On Death Penalty For Aryan Brotherhood Figures. The AP (9/15, Flaccus) reports, "A federal jury has failed to reach a verdict in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted in July of murder, racketeering and conspiracy, the jurors announced Thursday in a note to the judge. The same jurors convicted Barry 'The Baron' Mills and Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham in July. … After jurors indicated they were deadlocked, defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to declare a mistrial, which would result in Mills and Bingham serving life sentences without parole. Prosecutors asked that the judge consider ordering the jurors to resume deliberations and try to break the deadlock. Carter did not immediately issue a ruling."

Philadelphia Bank Vice President Charged With Embezzlement. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/15, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A former vice president of National Penn Bank was charged yesterday with embezzling $6.1 million from bank clients." Edward G. Mawhinney of Sewell "allegedly opened lines of credit under customers' names while working at the Philadelphia branch. He was charged by information instead of grand jury indictment." The Inquirer notes, "In a statement, the bank said: 'We appreciate and look forward to justice prevailing through the courts and applaud the U.S. attorney and the FBI for their diligent work in this matter.'" The Philadelphia Daily News (9/15, Hinkelman, 109K) adds, "Mawhinney stole money from these lines of credit to pay his own debts and buy his home, prosecutors said. He also gave money to benefit third parties without the bank's knowledge or approval. The third parties either got loans that had not been approved by the bank or had delinquent loans paid down or paid off completely."

Former eContent Executive Pleads Guilty To Stock Fraud. The AP (9/8) reported, "The former president of eContent Inc. pleaded guilty" to charges "that he and other officers and directors misused company funds for personal expenses. John P. Sgarlat is the second person to plead guilty in connection with wrongdoing at the company, and the investigation is continuing, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric M. Schweiker." Sgarlat "also admitted to several schemes, including one in which he improperly issued stock. Under his plea deal, Sgarlat agreed to pay restitution, in amounts to be determined. He also agreed to forfeit to the government at least $320,000, as well as a vehicle, certain artwork and an autographed Tiger Woods caddie coverall from the 2001 Masters golf tournament. The vehicle, artwork and coverall have all been seized by the FBI."

Sportingbet Chairman Resigns, Free To Return To UK. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/15) reports Sportingbet Chairman Peter Dicks, "who was arrested last week after New York customs officials discovered his name on a Louisiana warrant charging him with illegal online gambling, resigned on Thursday, the company said. … Dicks appeared in state Criminal Court in Queens on Thursday, when Judge Gene Lopez adjourned his case until Sept. 28." During the hearing, "Dicks was informed that the governor had withdrawn the warrant" from Louisiana seeking extradition, as the Dicks' lawyer had requested Wednesday. "Restrictions on Dicks' $50,000 bail that barred him from leaving New York also were lifted." Defense lawyer Barry Slotnick that "Dicks was now free to travel back to London, where he lives." The AP notes Gov. Pataki's spokeswoman, Jessica Scaperotti, "said the governor's decision was made in consultation with prosecutors in Louisiana and New York." Bloomberg (9/15) also reports on the story.

Former Michigan Prosecutor Goes On Trial For Bribery. The AP (9/15, Karush) reports, "A lawyer for a former chief prosecutor accused of helping a convicted rapist get a new trial in exchange for campaign contributions tried to cast him as an ethical man as his trial began Wednesday. … But prosecutors said Carl Marlinga let his political ambitions interfere with the pursuit of justice." The AP continues, "Marlinga's duty 'was overcome by a desperate need for money - not to line his own pockets, but to fuel his political ambitions,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares said in his opening statement to the jury." The AP adds, "Marlinga, the former Macomb County chief prosecutor, is charged with bribery, wire fraud, making false statements to the Federal Election Commission and violating federal campaign finance laws. The charges stem from the 59-year-old's failed 2002 bid for Congress. … If convicted, he could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. … Prosecutors say that Marlinga filed a motion with the Michigan Supreme Court that led to a new trial for Jeffrey Moldowan, who had been convicted in 1991 of kidnapping and raping his ex-girlfriend. Moldowan was acquitted at his new trial after spending more than 10 years behind bars. … They say he also accepted contributions in exchange for helping St. Clair Shores businessman James Hulet, accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl." The AP notes, "Marlinga was not personally involved in the prosecution of Moldowan, which was handled by an assistant prosecutor. But he took an interest after being contacted by Ralph Roberts, a prominent businessman who employed Moldowan's sister, Cares said. … Marlinga filed his motion with the Supreme Court as he was approaching an important fundraising deadline in his congressional campaign. Around the same time, Roberts contributed the maximum $2,000 allowed. Later, Roberts gave another $1,600 in his wife's name, and Marlinga also expected Roberts to host fundraisers for him, Cares said."

Florida Prison Guard Pleads Guilty In Contraband Case. The AP (9/15, Kaczor) reports, "One of five prison guards charged in a sex-for-contraband scandal that ended in a deadly shootout with federal agents pleaded guilty Thursday to conspiracy to commit mail fraud." The AP continues, "Alfred Barnes, 42, of Thomasville, Ga., agreed to cooperate in the prosecution of other defendants. In exchange, the government dropped charges including witness tampering, bribery and mail fraud." The AP adds, "The five men are accused of taking part in an alleged scheme in which guards reportedly paid female inmates for sex with alcohol, food, money and marijuana over a two-year period. The guards also were accused of intimidating inmates and witnesses to ensure their silence. .. . Authorities said prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution on June 21 and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and the other defendants. … Hill and Justice Department special agent William 'Buddy' Sentner were killed. A prison employee assisting in the arrests was wounded. None of the surviving guards were charged in connection with the shooting."

US Warns Consumers About "Liberty Dollar" Coins. USA Today (9/15, Hagenbaugh) reports, "The government Thursday warned consumers and businesses that it is illegal to use alternative money known as 'Liberty Dollar' coins, which organizers promote as a competitor to the almighty dollar. … 'We don't want consumers to be fooled,' U.S. Mint spokeswoman Becky Bailey says, noting U.S. Attorneys offices across the USA have noticed a marked increase in inquiries about the coins. … The coins' producers vowed to fight the government's decision." USA continues, "Evansville, Ind.-based National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code, otherwise known as NORFED, has been making the Liberty Dollar coins for eight years and claims $20 million is in circulation. The group says the money, unlike official U.S. cash, has a hedge against inflation because it is made almost entirely of silver and is backed by stocks of silver and gold in a vault in Idaho. … The coins are then spent by the group's 2,500 Liberty Associates in stores run by fellow supporters or are accepted unknowingly by clerks who are unaware they are not receiving real money." USA adds, "The Justice Department has determined that use of Liberty Dollars, which come in varying denominations, 'is a crime,' according to the Mint, which issued a rare public warning Thursday. … 'The United States Mint is the only entity that can produce coins,' Bailey says." USA notes, "The Mint notes the coins share some resemblances to real money, such as the term 'Trust in God' instead of 'In God We Trust' and use of a torch in the design. Such similarities may confuse people into thinking the money is real, the Mint says. … But NORFED says it will challenge the government, arguing it has never claimed Liberty Dollars were official money and that it has a right to offer an alternative."

Judge Denies Bond For Illinois Man Charged With Producing Child Pornography. The AP (9/15) reports, "A federal judge (in Springfield, IL) denied bond Thursday for a 65-year-old man accused of creating sexual images of children in a photo studio above a hair salon." The AP continues, "Paul Kincaid, who is charged with possessing child pornography and producing it near his home in Litchfield, will remain in the custody of U.S. marshals pending trail, said Sharon Paul, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Springfield. … 'The judge found that he presented a danger to the community,' Paul said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors accuse Kincaid of using a Polaroid camera to create sexual images of minors in a makeshift photo studio above a hair salon near his home. … Kincaid's attorney, Jon Gray Noll, said after the judge's ruling that it's too early to say how his client might eventually plea. … 'We have to see the pretrial discovery, we have to see how the evidence was obtained,' he said. 'I've had a lot tougher cases that we've won.' … Authorities said they seized hundred of images of child pornography, including photo albums, from Kincaid's home, which is located about 50 miles south of Springfield."

Elderly Women Plead Not Guilty In California Hit-And-Run Deaths. The AP (9/15, Glazer) reports, "A pair of elderly women charged with murdering two transient men and illegally collecting millions from their life insurance policies have pleaded not guilty." The AP continues, "Helen Golay, 75, and Hungarian-born Olga Rutterschmidt, 73, each face two counts of murder and two counts of conspiracy to commit murder for financial gain in the deaths of Paul Vados, 73, a Hungarian native, in November 1999, and Kenneth McDavid, 51, in June 2005. The women are being held without bail as long as prosecutors consider a death sentence for them." The AP adds, "Authorities alleged that Golay and Rutterschmidt befriended the two transients, convinced the men to sign them on to their life insurance policies and then collected some $2.3 million after running them over in secluded alleys. … Superior Court Commissioner James Bianco on Wednesday denied Golay's request to be allowed to have mascara and tweezers to pluck her eyebrows, to wear her own clothes and to be awakened no earlier than 7 a.m. on court days. … Rutterschmidt's attorney, Michael Sklar, challenged the legality of conspiracy charges against her, but Bianco ruled that the charges could stand. Sklar also said he had not yet received evidence from the state."

Karr To Fight Child Pornography Charges In California. USA Today (9/15, Ritter) reports from Los Angeles, "John Mark Karr, briefly a suspect in JonBenét Ramsey's murder, was back in court here Thursday for the first time since he jumped bail five years ago to avoid child pornography charges." USA continues, "Karr's chief lawyer, Robert Amparan, said the 41-year-old former teacher will fight the misdemeanor charges and has no plans to cut a deal with prosecutors involving a guilty plea in exchange for a sentence of time served and probation." USA adds, "Karr, unshackled in a blue jailhouse jumpsuit, sat passively as lawyers debated whether cameras should be allowed at his trial on five counts of possessing pornography, brought when investigators allegedly found illicit images on his computer. … Defense lawyer Gayle Gutekunst argued that a simple misdemeanor case had 'exploded into a media event' that could make it hard to find impartial jurors. … 'The court can put the skids on this and help return the case to what it was in 2001,' Gutekunst said." USA notes, "Judge Cerena Wong rejected TV cameras but said she'd permit one still photography camera. Wong said Karr's trial would begin Oct. 2 but scheduled a hearing to resolve a dispute over whether prosecutors can seek a delay. Karr will get a bail hearing Tuesday. … Authorities here regained custody of Karr this week after the Boulder, Colo., district attorney said Karr no longer was a suspect in Ramsey's December 1996 death because DNA tests failed to put him at the crime scene."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Closes Probe Of Maryland Teen's Death. The AP (9/15) reports, "The Justice Department has ended an investigation into the death of a black teenager at a party in Anne Arundel County." The AP continues, "Seventeen-year-old Noah Jamahl Jones was killed in the summer of 2004 in an altercation that involved six white men in Pasadena." The AP adds, "The Justice Department began its investigation after allegations were made that Jones' death might have resulted from a racially motivated attack. But it said Thursday that there is insufficient evidence to pursue criminal civil rights charges. … One of the men was acquitted in state court last year of voluntary manslaughter."

Missouri Judge Strikes Down New Voter ID Law. The New York Times/AP (9/15, Press) reports a Missouri judge "struck down the state's new voter identification law as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to vote. The law required voters to show a federal or Missouri-issued photo ID at the polls." Judge Richard Callahan "of Cole County Circuit Court, said that was an unconstitutional burden on voters because the paperwork required to get those ID's was not free."

The AP (9/15, Wiese) reports Gov. Matt Blunt, "a Republican who backed the law, decried the decision. 'This is a constitutionally sound law that will help improve Missourians' confidence in the elections process and help combat those who attempt to manipulate the system,' he said in a written statement."

Newdow Sues Web Commentator For Defamation. The California Recorder (9/15, Mckee) reports, "Sacramento, Calif., atheist Michael Newdow took plenty of grief from conservative commentators two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to get the words 'under God' taken out of the Pledge of Allegiance. … But being called a liar in an online column was more than he could stand -- and a Northern California minister could pay the price." The Recorder continues, "This Monday, Newdow -- who's both a lawyer and an emergency room physician -- is scheduled to appear in San Francisco's 1st District Court of Appeal to argue that his libel suit against the Rev. Austin Miles should be allowed to proceed. … Newdow claims that Miles -- a self-described 'interdenominational chaplain' who writes conservative columns posted on the Internet -- defamed him by accusing him of committing perjury before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals during the pledge case. Specifically, Newdow claims Miles accused him, in posts on two news service sites, of telling the court his young daughter suffered emotional distress as the result of being forced to recite the pledge in her classroom. Newdow insists he never said that. … Instead, he says, he only argued that children, including his daughter, are unduly influenced when a state-run school leads them in a ritual proclaiming the existence of God. … 'Had Miles done as any reasonable person would have done -- i.e., simply read the 9th Circuit's panel decision before writing his article,' Newdow wrote in court papers, 'he would have quickly appreciated that his "view" ... was 100 percent wrong.'" The Recorder notes, "The 9th Circuit in 2002 agreed with Newdow's claim that the pledge, as recited in public schools, violated the First Amendment's establishment clause. But two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court tossed Newdow's suit, voting 5-3 that he didn't have standing to bring it in the first place. … Since then, Newdow has pursued the merits of his arguments by representing an unnamed 'Roe' client in challenging the pledge again. That case is now pending before the 9th Circuit, as is a separate case of Newdow's challenging the inclusion of the words 'In God We Trust' on American money. … In his case against Miles, Newdow won a $1 million default judgment in Superior Court in June 2004 after Miles failed to respond to the initial complaint. That judgment was later set aside, though, after the trial court found that Miles, through no fault of his own, had no actual notice of the suit."

Navy Court Finds Chaplain Guilty Of Disobeying An Order. The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports a Navy court found Protestant chaplain Lt. Gordon Klingenschmitt guilty of "disobeying an order by appearing in uniform at a political protest in front of the White House in March," and will reprimand him and dock his pay. Klingenschmitt, who "has been a vocal critic of the Navy's policies on prayer in ceremonial settings," said he "intends to 'appeal by all means possible all the way to the Supreme Court.'"

The AP (9/15, Barisic) reports, "Rear Adm. Frederic Ruehe, commander of the Navy's Mid-Atlantic Region, must decide whether to approve the recommendation. … The jury of five officers at Klingenschmitt's special court-martial determined Wednesday that he had disobeyed a superior officer's order prohibiting him from wearing his uniform during media appearances without prior permission." The AP notes, "The charge centered on a March 30 news conference protesting a Navy policy that requires nondenominational prayers outside of religious services. … Klingenschmitt had argued that he was allowed to wear his uniform if conducting a 'bona fide worship service.' He said he believes he was punished for making a political speech in uniform because he prayed in Jesus' name."

Religious Conservatives Say Gay Marriage Debate Prompts Attacks On Religion. The AP (9/15, Kuhnhenn) reports conservative religious leaders, "sensing declining alarm over same-sex marriage, are warning that the debate over homosexuality has prompted attacks on religious freedom." By "expanding the discussion from marriage to religious expression, social conservatives say they will reconnect with religious voters and religious leaders who don't necessarily view same-sex unions as a threat." Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council said, "There are a number of pastors that said, 'Look, we don't get involved in politics, I'm not going to get involved in this issue, I just want to preach the gospel.' When they realize their ability to preach the gospel may very well be at stake, they may reconsider their involvement." The AP adds Perkins "and others are building a case file of anecdotes where they say religious people have spoken out against gay marriage only to be punished."

Exelon, PSEG Abandon Merger Plans Over New Jersey Problems. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Smith) reports, "Prospects for big utility mergers dimmed with Exelon Corp.'s announcement yesterday that it has abandoned its acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc., a deal valued at about $17.7 billion that would have created the nation's largest utility company by serving 18 million people." The Journal continues, "Exelon blamed its decision, which was expected, on 'insurmountable' obstacles, chiefly rate concessions and power-plant divestitures sought by public officials and consumer advocates in New Jersey, where PSEG is based. Exelon, of Chicago, spent more than $100 million pursuing PSEG in a deal announced in December 2004." The Journal adds, "The longer the approval process became, the more costly the transaction was for Exelon shareholders. What started out as a $12 billion deal became a $17.7 billion transaction as Exelon's stock price appreciated. … Many industry economists say such combinations can make companies more skillful operators and reduce geographic risk caused by weather. New Jersey officials feared the loss of local oversight. Exelon sought to allay fears by promising to keep PSEG's headquarters in Newark, N.J."

Market Watch (9/15, Dalton) reports, "A driving force behind the merger was the hope that Exelon, a highly regarded operator of nuclear power plants, could improve the performance of PSEG's two troubled nuclear plants, Hope Creek and Salem. The plants have improved dramatically since Exelon began operating them following the announcement of the merger in December 2004. Some investors have been concerned that the plants' performance might regress if the deal fell apart." Market Watch adds, "The U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Justice Department, and Illinois and Pennsylvania regulators had approved the merger. But New Jersey consumer advocates and large industrial firms raised concerns that the combined company would own so many power plants in the state that it could effectively corner the electricity market and raise prices without fear of competition."

Bloomberg (9/15, Polson, Lonkevich) reports, "The companies had offered to sell power plants and place output from nuclear plants under long-term contracts to win approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. … New Jersey 'apparently feels that the commitments we had to make to FERC and DOJ, those divestiture obligations, were not enough,' Public Service Enterprise Group Chief Executive E. James Ferland said in an interview today. 'We don't agree with that.' … The regulators demanded further plant divestitures and constraints on sales from generators the companies would keep, he said."

Barnett Critical Of EU Action Against Apple. The IDG News Service (9/15, Gohring) reports, "A U.S. Department of Justice official has joined the debate surrounding Apple Computer's proprietary digital music technology by criticizing European antitrust activities, but groups attacking Apple are defending their actions." IDG continues, "Speaking in Washington, D.C., on Wednesday, Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general at the DOJ's antitrust division, warned that forcing companies to reveal their intellectual property stifles innovation. He used Apple as an example, in a nod to growing discontent in Europe regarding the way that music purchased from iTunes is tied to the iPod." IDG adds, "Architects of complaints against Apple in Europe say he's got it wrong. 'We're not attacking intellectual property rights but saying they should be implemented in a way which doesn't dictate which player you use,' said Torgeir Waterhouse, a senior advisor with the Norwegian Consumer Council. … His organization filed a complaint to Norway's consumer representative, or ombudsman, arguing that it's illegal for Apple to limit iTunes customers to playing music from the store exclusively on iPods. Along with similar representatives in Denmark and Sweden, the Norwegian ombudsman asked Apple to defend its policy. In a written reply, Apple said it won't budge on the issue but the company plans to meet representatives from the countries later this month to further discuss the issue. If Apple won't open up, the ombudsman will take the company to court." IDG notes, "Barnett's criticisms of European antitrust policy, including comments that the policy is aimed at helping competitors instead of consumers, are generally in line with comments from U.S. officials since the Bush administration came to power, said Scott Megregian, a partner and head of the European competition group in the law firm McDermott Will & Emery UK."

Rent-A-Center Gets Antitrust Nod To Acquire Rent-Way. The AP (9/15) reports, "Rent-A-Center Inc., the largest U.S. furniture rental chain, and Rent-Way Inc., a rent-to-own chain operator, said Thursday that Rent-A-Center's planned acquisition of Rent-Way has gotten government antitrust clearance." The AP continues, "The waiting period for the deal, required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust improvement Act of 1976, expired Sept. 13. … The acquisition is expected to be completed in the fourth quarter." The AP adds, "Plano, Texas-based Rent-A-Center will pay about $576 million to buy Rent-Way of Erie, Pa., in a deal announced in August. … The acquisition marks an end to Rent-Way's six-year turnaround after a scandal. … Rent-Way, founded in 1981, was rocked by an accounting scandal six years ago when founder and CEO William Morgenstern announced that some executives had cooked the company's books to meet Wall Street earnings expectations in the late 1990s. … A federal investigation confirmed that three company officers acted on their own, improperly writing down $98 million in operating expenses. Rent-Way closed a $25 million settlement with shareholders in 2004."

Texas Lawmakers Plot Legislative Strategy For Airfield Pact. The Dallas Morning News (9/15, Reddy) reports, "Facing a delicate negotiation over their Wright bill, Texas lawmakers said Thursday that they were moving ahead to get the North Texas compromise through the full House as early as next week." The News continues, "Some indicated they were unwilling to accept a revision to the House bill removing antitrust immunity as the final word for the legislation to lift flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field. … 'It's just a bump in the road,' said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth." The News adds, "Getting the Wright bill passed in time depends largely on how successful members are in quickly reconciling competing versions of the legislation that have passed two House committees. … House members have only nine more voting days before they're scheduled to return home to campaign for the November elections. … Lawmakers also must find a way to steer the legislation through obstacles in the Senate. … 'We're trying every creative way to get to the goal of preserving the balance of the agreement, protecting the interests of all the parties and getting it through the Congress,' said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who is leading the effort in the upper chamber." The News notes, "The House Judiciary Committee on Wednesday removed an antitrust exemption sought by Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport in the legislation to lift the 1979 Wright law. … The five parties fear a long court battle, if the deal isn't given protections by Congress. … The bill would implement a June agreement by the five North Texas parties to lift limits on long-haul flights at Love in 2014. It would allow immediate one-stop flights across the U.S., as long as passengers first stopped in one of the nine states in the Wright perimeter."

FCC Accused Of Ordering Destruction Of Media Ownership Study. The AP (9/15, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission ordered its staff to destroy all copies of a draft study that suggested greater concentration of media ownership would hurt local TV news coverage, a former lawyer at the agency says. The report, written in 2004, came to light during the Senate confirmation hearing for FCC Chairman Kevin Martin." Sen. Barbara Boxer "received a copy of the report 'indirectly from someone within the FCC who believed the information should be made public,' according to Boxer spokeswoman Natalie Ravitz." Adam Candeub, now a law professor at Michigan State University, "said senior managers at the agency ordered that 'every last piece' of the report be destroyed. 'The whole project was just stopped -- end of discussion,' he said."

EU To Probe Microsoft Office. The AP (9/15) reports, "The European Union's antitrust commission plans to investigate complaints regarding Microsoft Office, said EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes Thursday." The AP continues, "Kroes, speaking at the Fordham Annual Conference on International Antitrust Law & Policy, did not elaborate on the investigation. … Microsoft Corp. has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format. Microsoft claimed it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the ability to save Office documents in either the popular Portable Document Format or Microsoft's new, competing XPS format." The AP adds, "The EU has a long-running antitrust action against Microsoft, which dates to a 2004 EU antitrust ruling that came with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July. … Kroes said the Commission's actions on Microsoft 'will result in benefits in terms of industrial competitiveness and will result in more innovation and lower prices for consumers.' … European Union officials warned Microsoft on Tuesday not to shut out rivals in the security software market as the company plans to launch its Windows Vista operating system with built-in protection from hackers and malicious programs."

EU Eyes US-Style Private Damage Suits. Dow Jones (9/15) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Thursday that she plans to devise a way to encourage private damage suits by early next year." Dow Jones continues, "Speaking at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York, Kroes said the U.S. 'has traveled much further down this road than we have in Europe' and that the E.U. needed to catch up. 'Watch this space because we'll try to draw some conclusions from the debate early next year,' she said." Dow Jones adds, "Kroes has long said private action, including lawsuits, can increase competition without adding to regulators' workload. … The European antitrust chief said regulators were now considering how to draft regulations that would 'make sure that private cases are actually brought to court, in other words, that the benefits of bringing proceedings outweigh the costs.' She also said any new regulation must ensure 'that our public and private enforcement systems are complementary.'" Dow Jones notes, "Kroes said regulators on both sides of the Atlantic were working well together to crack down on cartels. … She said she had created a dedicated cartel-busting office with 60 officials, with powers to levy increased fines, and had implemented a U.S.-style 'carrot and stick approach' by letting informers escape fines."

GE Sells Unit To Apollo For $3.8 Billion. The Financial Times (9/15, Guerrera) reports, "General Electric has sold its low-margin materials unit to the private equity firm Apollo Management for $3.8bn in cash and shares. It marks the latest attempt by the conglomerate to focus on high-growth businesses and revive its share price." The Times adds, "The deal – announced on Thursday – is part of GE's strategy of exiting low-growth markets and underlines the appetite of buy-out groups for industrial businesses that require substantial investment and restructuring."

The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Kranhold) reports, "GE also has been weighing the future of its plastics business, where former Chairman Jack Welch cut his teeth and where Mr. Immelt once worked, according to people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear whether GE is considering selling the unit, which generates annual sales of $6.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The unit it agreed to sell yesterday makes silicone used in adhesives and sealants and quartz used in semiconductor manufacturing and in tubing for fiber-optics and lamps. The unit, with annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion and 5,000 employees, has its headquarters in Wilton, Conn. GE doesn't disclose its earnings. … GE, Fairfield, Conn., said it would retain a 10% stake in the operation, which it called its advanced-materials group. It will also hold $400 million in debt obligations that yield interest payments."

Iamgold To Purchase Cambior For $1.2 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/15) reports, "Iamgold Corp. has agreed to acquire Cambior Inc. for US$1.2 billion in stock, a premium of nearly a third to Cambior's market capitalization." The Journal continues, "The companies said the new Iamgold will be the 10th largest publicly traded primary gold producer in the world, with 1.1 million ounces of gold production annually, reserves totaling 9.7 million ounces and a market capitalization of US$3 billion." The Journal adds, "Under the transaction, shareholders of Cambior will receive 0.42 of an Iamgold share for each share held, worth about C$4.83, a 31% premium to Cambior's shares at Wednesday's close in Toronto. Cambior's U.S.-listed shares jumped 24% in premarket trading Thursday on Inet. Iamgold's shares were unchanged."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

California Seen As Taking Risk With Global Warming Plan. The New York Times (9/15, Barringer, 1.21M) reports that in "the Rocky Mountain States and the fast-growing desert Southwest, more than 20 power plants, designed to burn coal that is plentiful and cheap, are on the drawing boards. Much of the power, their owners expected, would be destined for the people of California." But California "has just delivered a new message to these energy suppliers: If you cannot produce power with the lowest possible emissions of these greenhouse gases, we are not interested." California's decision to "impose stringent demands on suppliers even outside its borders, broadened by the Legislature on Aug. 31 and awaiting the governor's signature, is but one example of the state's wide-ranging effort to remake its energy future." The Democratic-controlled legislature "and the Republican governor also agreed at that time on legislation to reduce industrial carbon dioxide emissions by 25 percent by 2020, a measure that affects not only power plants but also other large producers of carbon dioxide, including oil refineries and cement plants." The state's aim "is to reduce emissions of climate-changing gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas. Other states, particularly New York, are moving in some of the same directions, but no state is moving as aggressively on as many fronts. No state has been at it longer. No state is putting more at risk."

DOE Seeks To Eliminate Funding For Hydropower, Geothermal Research. The Christian Science Monitor (9/15, Clayton, 58K) reports the "Department of Energy (DOE) is quitting the hydropower and geothermal power research business - if Congress will let it." The "Bush administration in its FY 2007 budget request eliminates hydropower and geothermal research, venerable programs with roots in the energy crises of the 1970s. 'What we do well is research and funding of new, novel technologies,' says Craig Stevens, chief spokesman for the DOE. 'From a policy perspective, geothermal and hydro are mature technologies. We believe the market can take the lead on this at this point.'" However, "'zeroing out' such research could end up being a penny-wise, pound-foolish move, some energy advocates say. Any savings from the cuts would be nil since all of the nearly $24 million ($1 million from hydropower and $23 million from geothermal) research funding would go to other programs such as biofuels."

Interior Department Near Royalties Agreement With Shell, BP-Amoco. The New York Times (9/15, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department, struggling to prevent the government from losing billions of dollars in royalties for oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters, said Thursday that it was close to agreement with 2 of the 56 companies that hold lucrative drilling leases in the Gulf of Mexico. The two companies, Royal Dutch Shell and BP-Amoco, are among the biggest producers along the outer continental shelf." Ten companies, including Chevron and Exxon, have begun negotiations over their contracts. However, "even as Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed outrage that the government could lose more than $10 billion over the next decade, the Bush administration said it flatly opposed House bills that would pressure oil companies into renegotiating flawed leases that the government signed in the late 1990's. The 56 companies hold leases that allow them to extract billions of dollars in oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico without paying any royalties, regardless of how high energy prices or the industry's profits might climb."

Arizona Border Tribe Gets Squeezed By Illegal Immigration, Crackdown. The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Pomfret, 748K) reports as the United States "ramps up its law enforcement presence on the border with Mexico, places like Alir Jegk, a village of 50 families in south-central Arizona, are enduring heightened danger, as they are squeezed between increasingly aggressive bands of immigrant and drug smugglers and increasingly numerous federal agents who, critics say, often ignore regulations as they seek to enforce the law." Alir Jegk's experience "is complicated by the fact that it is on the second-biggest Indian reservation in the United States, belonging to the Tohono O'odham, or Desert People, who hunted deer and boar and harvested wild spinach and prickly pear in this region before an international border was etched through their land in 1853. Now, the Tohono O'odham Nation occupies the front line of the fight against drug and immigrant smuggling -- costing the poverty-stricken tribe millions of dollars a year and threatening what remains of its traditions." About "11,000 Tohono O'odham live on a 2.8 million-acre reservation, the size of Connecticut, with a 75-mile-long border with Mexico."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Charges Four In New York Drug Conspiracy. The AP (9/15) reports, "A federal grand jury (in Binghamton, NY) on Thursday indicted one man on a murder charge and three others for racketeering and narcotics conspiracy." The AP continues, "The men were part of a drug-trafficking ring that operated in the Ithaca area, New York City, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, said U.S. Attorney Glenn Suddaby." The AP adds, "Guillermo Payano, 30, of Ithaca, was charged with the murder of Alexander Miller, 24. … Miller was discovered in May 2000 on a partially overgrown service road leading into Buttermilk Falls State Park. He had been shot in the head. … Benoni Bryant, 29, Darnell Shepherd, 29, and Pablo Lopez, 25, all of Ithaca, were charged with conspiracy and racketeering. … Payano, Bryant and Shepherd are in custody. Lopez is still at large. … The U.S. Justice Department has not yet determined whether it will seek the death penalty for Payano, Suddaby said."

Suspects In Massive Drug Ring Appear In Court. The AP (9/15, McCall) reports, "Five of the dozen suspects in what federal prosecutors say is a $20 million international drug ring started by high school friends made their initial appearance in court Thursday in the first step toward an expected trial in Idaho." The fiver "were among the 11 men arrested Wednesday by federal agents in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Colorado. One man, from California, remained a fugitive." U.S. Magistrate Janice Stewart "delayed reading of the charges in the 196-page indictment until attorneys could be appointed or retained for the five men." When the requested lawyers, she "warned them they would have to reimburse the government if it was determined they could afford their own attorneys, rather than having a defender appointed by the court."

DEA Raid Nets 23 Arrests For Cocaine Dealing In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (9/15, Yang) reports, "Police today announced charges against 23 people after raiding a suspected drug house on Chicago's South Side Wednesday morning," and "Undercover officers from the Chicago Police Department and members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration worked on their investigation, dubbed 'Operation Sith,' for 2 ½ months before raiding the home." According to authorities, "the suspects are all members of the Gangster Disciples street gang and they pedaled small packages of crack cocaine worth $5 each, earning $10,000 to $15,000 a day in drug sales," although "the DEA is currently analyzing the drugs confiscated during the raid, and has not yet estimated their total worth."

US Takes Up Case Of Iowa Abortion Clinic Crash. The Quad-City (IA) Times (9/15, Baker) reports, "Federal officials decided late Wednesday to take up the case against David Robert McMenemy, the Michigan man who is accused of crashing his car into a Davenport medical center Monday because he thought it was an abortion clinic." The Times continues, "The case will be pursued through the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of Iowa, Davenport, and the Rock Island office of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, or ATF." The Times adds, "Police say McMenemy, 45, came to Davenport from the suburbs of Detroit, and drove his compact car into the Edgerton Women's Health Center, 1510 E. Rusholme St., early Monday morning. … The facility was founded in 1972 to provide prenatal care and medical services to low-income and underprivileged women. It does not perform abortions, nor does it make abortion referrals, Center President Tom Fedje said." The Times notes, "After the car came to rest in the lobby area, Davenport police said McMenemy exited the vehicle and scattered gasoline over the car's interior before lighting it. He left the building and surrendered to Davenport firefighters, Fire Marshal Mike Hayman said. … Federal charges are appropriate in the case because McMenemy traveled across three states to commit the act of violence, Scott County Attorney Bill Davis said."

Celebrity Bounty Hunter Arrested In Hawaii. The AP (9/15, Niesse) reports, "TV reality star Duane 'Dog' Chapman and two co-stars on his show were arrested Thursday in Hawaii on charges of illegal detention and conspiracy in the bounty hunters' capture three years ago of a cosmetics company heir." The AP continues, "Chapman, son Leland Chapman and associate Timothy Chapman -- who is not related to the other Chapmans -- were taken into custody and did not resist arrest, said Mark Hanohano, U.S.

Marshal for the district of Hawaii. 'It went down without incident,' Hanohano said." The AP adds, "Mona K. Wood, a publicist for the star of the popular cable series Dog The Bounty Hunter, said Chapman would be vindicated. 'He arrests the bad guys -- and he is definitely not one of them,' she said." The AP notes, "The charges stem from Chapman's capture of Max Factor heir Andrew Luster on June 18, 2003, in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, said Marshals spokeswoman Nikki Credic in Washington. … Chapman's capture of Luster, who had fled the country while on trial on charges he raped three women, catapulted the 53-year-old bounty hunter to fame and led to the reality series on A&E."

The New York Times (9/15, Carr) reports, "In a twist that will not be lost on fans of Mr. Chapman's program, 'Dog the Bounty Hunter,' on the A&E cable network, Mexico is seeking to extradite him for posting bail and then failing to appear to answer criminal charges in July 2003. … His wife, Beth Chapman, also a star in the series, said Mr. Chapman left Mexico on the advice of his lawyers, who feared for his safety in the Mexican prison system."

IMMIGRATION:

Employers Concerned About Hiring Practices After Immigration Raids. The Miami Daily Business Review (9/15, Riddick) reports, "Federal immigration officials recently arrested 55 undocumented workers in a raid in Tallahassee. The workers from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, were employed by General Building Maintenance, which had a contract to clean state government buildings. They face deportation." The Review continues, "Federal officials declined to say how U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) found out about the illegal immigrants, or whether any company executives would face criminal charges." The Review adds, "Some South Florida labor and employment lawyers warn that such federal raids signal that companies here must take serious steps to ensure that they are not employing undocumented workers -- either directly or through subcontractors. That could have a major impact on Florida's economy, which quietly has depended on illegal workers. … Many employers in the state's large agricultural, tourism and construction industries are nervous. And so are immigrant workers." The Review notes, "Congress has hit an impasse in its debate over whether and how to crack down on illegal immigration. But ICE and its parent agency, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, have decided not to wait for new legislation. Relying on existing law, ICE has engaged in high-profile raids of worksites employing undocumented workers."

Two Polish Nationals Plead Guilty To "Leasing" Illegal Workers. The AP (9/15) reports, "Two Polish nationals have pleaded guilty to leasing out illegal immigrants from eastern Europe to work on U.S. farms, dairies and factories, prosecutors said. A third was sentenced to prison a year after pleading guilty to similar federal charges." The AP continues, "Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, pleaded guilty Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra to federal charges of fraud and conspiracy to transport, house and otherwise encourage illegal immigrants to remain in the United States." The AP adds, "Pavel Preus, 39, pleaded guilty to similar charges in September 2005. Marra sentenced him to 37 months in prison, followed by three years of supervised release. Preus was also ordered to pay $950,000 for unpaid payroll taxes. … Sentencing for Bogacki and Sawczuk was scheduled Dec. 15. Both face a maximum of 20 years in prison and fines up to $500,000. The U.S. government is also seeking the forfeiture of Bogacki's assets. … The three men were arrested in April 2005. Three citizens of the Slovak Republic also named in the original 26-count indictment are believed to be overseas, prosecutors said."

House Votes To Build New Fencing Along Mexican Border. CNN's The Situation Room (9/14, Blitzer) reported, "House Republicans voted 283-138 to build new fencing along the border with Mexico. The House approved that provision last year as well, but just weeks before congressional elections, Republican members are eager to show they're tough on border security."

The New York Times (9/15, Lipton, 1.21M) says "the fence proposal represents a last-minute push by Republicans for at least part of their border security agenda. … More than 60 Democrats joined with Republican House members" to vote for it," but "other Democrats in the House and Senate ridiculed it, saying that the fence alone would not solve the border problem and that the bill did not provide the more that $2 billion that it would cost to build." Republican leaders "are hoping to insert language into the larger budget bill for domestic security that is in a conference committee to address chemical plant security, FEMA restructuring and, perhaps, additional provisions."

The Washington Times (9/15, Hurt, 88K) reports, "When the House last year approved its border-security legislation, it included almost exactly the same fencing. The fence came to symbolize what many Democrats said was an unforgiving bill. They said the fence proved that Republicans harbored a hostility toward immigrants." But "by yesterday, more than 20 Democrats had switched their position to support the border fence -- including several who face tough elections this fall. Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Tennessee Democrat who is running for the Senate, said, 'For the country to be secure, we have to have control over who gets in and who's allowed to stay.'"

The AP (9/15, Gamboa) reports, "Supporters of the new House bill said the new fencing would let Border Patrol agents focus more on apprehending illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico rather than having to man the entire border." The bill passed yesterday "doesn't pay for the fence. Republicans, estimating the cost at more than $2 billion, said that will be covered in a later spending bill." Democrats "estimated the fence would cost $7 billion, based on information from the Department of Homeland Security on costs per mile of a double-layer fence." The bill also "directs the Homeland Security Department to take control of the border in 18 months and gives border agents new authority to stop fleeing vehicles. It also calls for a study of the need for a fence on the US-Canadian border."

The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Gaouette, 918K) reports the vote "demonstrated that even as Capitol Hill remained deadlocked over what to do about the millions of illegal immigrants already in this country, bipartisan support existed for significantly toughening border security, especially as the November election neared." The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Rogers, 2.03M) says "the leadership's primary concern" yesterday was "to try to help its vulnerable members shore up support among conservatives ahead of the Nov. 7 elections."

McClatchy (9/15, Montgomery) notes House leaders "have refused to consider a comprehensive Senate-passed bill that would put millions of illegal immigrants on a path toward permanent legal status and US citizenship. The measure also includes a version of the president's guest-worker plan, as well as stiffer border-enforcement measures." President Bush, "who met Thursday morning on Capitol Hill with Republican House members, this week renewed his call for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. His administration has embraced limited fencing as a partial solution to strengthening the border, but not to the extent proposed by the House."

Critics Said To Be Making Incorrect Claims About Cost Of Senate Bill. Robert Greenstein, executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, and James Horney, senior fellow at the center and former chief of the budget projections unit at the Congressional Budget Office, write in the Washington Post (9/15, A19, 748K), "Would offering undocumented immigrants a path to legalization bust the federal budget? Critics of the Senate immigration bill, which seeks to crack down on illegal immigration while giving many currently undocumented workers a chance to work legally in this country, tout a Congressional Budget Office study that they say shows the bill would cost a whopping $126 billion over 10 years. A fair reading of that study, however, suggests that the bill's actual impact on the deficit would be close to zero and that it could even be beneficial. … So how did critics of the Senate bill arrive at the sensational $126 billion figure, which appears nowhere in the CBO report? First, they counted all of the bill's spending increases while ignoring all of its increases in revenue. … They also incorrectly assumed that the Senate bill requires $78 billion in added discretionary spending." Greeinsyein and Horney conclude, "As Congress searches for agreement on immigration legislation, mistaken claims that the Senate bill would bust the budget only make this already difficult job harder."

Immigration Creating "Mini-Melting Pot" In Utah. USA Today (9/15, El Nasser, 2.27M) reports that as immigration "sweeps through Utah, traditionally one of the least diverse and most conservative states in the nation, its impact is particularly dramatic. About 98% white until 1970, Utah is becoming a mini-melting pot." While conservative Republicans in the House "are pushing to tighten borders and make illegal immigrants felons, factors unique to Utah are attracting Hispanics to this reddest of red states. Among them: the Mormon Church's philosophy of outreach and its embrace of large families." These influences "have helped give the state a reputation of being warm and welcoming to immigrants. Utah allows the undocumented to drive legally with a "driving privilege card." They can attend public colleges and universities and pay in-state tuition. Minorities — mostly Hispanics — make up 16.5% of the population, up from 8.8% in 1990. They could reach 20% by 2010."

TAX:

IRS Revokes Anti-Abortion Group's Tax Exemption. The New York Times (9/15, Strom, 1.21M) reports the Internal Revenue Service "this week revoked the tax exemption of an anti-abortion group, Operation Rescue West, after receiving a complaint that it had violated prohibitions on electioneering by nonprofits in 2004." The group had "promised tax deductions for contributions to help defeat the Democratic presidential candidate, Senator John Kerry. The organization said the agency's ruling would have little impact on its operations."

GOP May Add Estate Tax Cut To Government Funding Resolution. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Harwood, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

SCOTUS To Provide Same-Day Transcripts Online. The Legal Times (9/15, Mauro) reports, "Starting in October you won't have to be inside the marble chamber of the Supreme Court to gain a same-day understanding of the thrust and parry of a particular oral argument." The Times continues, "The Court announced Thursday that it will be posting on its Web site the transcripts of oral arguments on the same day they occur -- far faster than the previous practice of releasing them up to two weeks afterward. … The announcement may seem like a small step that falls well short of opening the Court to television or radio broadcasting. But at an institution that still hands out quill pens to lawyers who argue before it, the change is significant. And access advocates hope it signals a new climate of openness under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. " The Times adds, "Roberts' predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, experimented with same-day release of the audio of oral arguments to accommodate the public interest in the Florida presidential election cases of 2000. Similar releases have occurred sporadically ever since, and all the justices who have spoken publicly about the practice have said they approve. … But oral-argument transcripts have posed different issues, including the Court's relationship with the Alderson Reporting Co., which has long provided transcripts to the Court for free -- but at a more leisurely pace, usually a week or more after the argument. For a fee, Alderson would also provide transcripts late in the same day or overnight to interested lawyers and other parties, including the press. Alderson officials on Thursday declined to comment on the new arrangement and how it may affect the company's sales of Court transcripts to private parties."

The Washington Post (9/15, A8, Lane) reports, "There is no sign that the court is about to yield to calls for live television coverage, which the justices have steadfastly refused. But, in the quiet, tradition-bound world of the Supreme Court, yesterday's decision was almost revolutionary, court analysts said. … 'It's a tremendous opening to the outside world,' said Richard Lazarus, a professor of law at Georgetown University and co-director of the school's Supreme Court Institute." The Post adds, "Coupled with another recent innovation, the identification in the transcripts of which justice is asking a particular question, the court's new policy 'creates the potential for more intelligent speculation by more people than just those who were in the courtroom about how a particular case is going to come out,' Lazarus said."

House Changes Rules To Curtail Anonymous Earmarking. The AP (9/15, Abrams) reports, "The House changed its rules Thursday to require lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation, a modest step toward restoring the reputation of Congress in a year of ethical lapses and scandals involving relations with lobbyists." The change, "in effect only through year's end, is aimed at curtailing a practice whereby lawmakers anonymously insert 'earmarks' -- narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district -- into bills." President Bush "said in a statement the bill make sure 'lawmakers and the public are better informed before Congress votes to spend the taxpayers' money.'" Democrats "disparaged the measure, citing the failure of the Republican-led Congress to pass more comprehensive legislation to clean up lawmaker relations with lobbyists." The New York Times (9/15, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) notes "the resolution passed 245 to 171, with 24 Republicans and 147 Democrats voting against it."

The Washington Post (9/15, A1, Birnbaum, 748K) reports, "The rule change shelves a wider ethics bill…at least until next year. … 'This bill represents the death of lobby reform,' said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), a former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee." The Senate "is working on its own change in earmarks rules, which its leaders also hope to approve in lieu of broad ethics legislation this year, top staffers said. The staffers added that subjecting earmarks to more sunshine will allow lawmakers to tell their constituents that they addressed their ethics concerns even though the broad overhaul bill failed."

The Washington Times (9/15, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Watchdog groups estimate the nearly 10,000 earmarks submitted this year cost taxpayers $29 billion." GOP Rep. Jeff Flake, "one of the biggest critics of earmarking, called the bill a 'little dose' of accountability and transparency, but said he doubts earmarking will cease." The Los Angeles Times (9/15, Levey, Simon, 918K) also reports the story under the headline "House Takes a Cautious Step on Ethics."

Vitter, DeMint Will Block Von Eschenbach Nomination. The New York Times (9/15, Harris, 1.21M) reports, "Two Republican senators have promised to block the nomination of Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, illustrating just how difficult filling the top job at the agency has become." Sen. David Vitter "said Thursday in an interview that the Bush administration must legalize imports of some prescription drugs before he would allow the nomination to proceed." Also, Sen. Jim DeMint "will block Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination unless the F.D.A. takes steps to remove the abortion drug RU-486 from the market, said Wesley M. Denton, Mr. DeMint's press secretary."

Government Announces It Has Recovered Lost VA Computer. The AP (9/15) reports, "The government said Thursday it had recovered a Veterans Affairs Department subcontractor's lost desktop computer containing personal data for 16,000 veterans." The FBI and Veterans Affairs Office of Inspector General "said Khalil Abdullah-Raheem was charged Wednesday on theft charges after the Unisys Corp. computer went missing in July. The computer, which was taken from Unisys' offices in Reston, Va., contained personal data for veterans who received care at VA medical centers in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh."

Paulson Seeks To Restore Treasury's Role In Policy Process. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Solomon, 2.03M) reports, "Two months into his new job, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is moving to restore clout and stature to the department, tapping top-level experts to fill senior positions, seeking alliances with influential White House officials and insisting on holding key meetings at the Treasury Building." Paulson is "trying to put into practice assurances he received from the White House before agreeing to take the secretary job -- that he would be the president's main driver of economic policy." He has "held daily phone calls with the influential Allan Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council and a longtime friend of President Bush, and invited Mr. Hubbard to accompany him to China next week. He also talks frequently with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, hosts cabinet-level economic meetings at Treasury and is trying to reach out regularly to brief both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill on Treasury happenings." Still, whether "Paulson's efforts succeed -- and help him shape economic policy -- remains to be seen."

Senate Proposal Would Make Retirement Benefits A Factor In Contract Bidding. The Washington Post (9/15, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "In a move that has roiled federal contractors, the Senate has proposed making retirement benefits a factor when the Defense Department puts certain federal jobs up for bid. The proposal would prevent contractors from obtaining an advantage if they provided less generous retirement benefits than the government does to its employees. Contractors said that would drive up the cost of bids by 24 percent." The Post adds, "Contractor associations argue that the Senate's move, if agreed to by the House, would stop the Defense Department from trying to outsource work through a process set up by the Office of Management and Budget as part of President Bush's federal management agenda."

Lawmakers Argue For Relaxed Standards For Commercial Real Estate Lending. Arguing that proposed tougher standards for commercial real estate lending could hurt community banks and the overall economy, lawmakers and banking executives are urging federal regulators to relax them. USA Today (9/15, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports that Rep. Barney Frank "said the standards could force banks to pull back on lending to revitalize downtown areas or build affordable, multifamily housing. While Frank is a Democrat, there was bipartisan concern. Regulators, including the Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., generally defended their proposals. But John Reich, director of the Office of Thrift Supervision, said the guidance may go too far in some areas." USA adds, "Congress has not intervened on the legislative side, but lawmakers made it clear they want changes before a final version of the standards is issued."

Laura Bush To Keynote Clinton Foundation Event. The AP (9/15, Loven) reports, "Another member of the Bush family is getting cozy with former President Clinton. First lady Laura Bush joins the former president as a keynote speaker opening his three-day Clinton Global Initiative in New York next week." Clinton "also sparked curiosity when he was spotted at the White House last month. It turns out that he and the current president were having lunch, something White House aides said they do occasionally." Anita McBride, the First Lady's chief of staff, said Clinton, "aware of Laura Bush's involvement in issues that his foundation addresses…called several months ago to solicit her participation in the conference." Laura Bush "agreed, hoping to tell people about the good that their tax dollars are doing and to persuade other nations of the United States' good intentions."

Pelosi Introduces New Agenda For Democrats. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/15, A2), Dana Milbank says House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "began her weekly news conference yesterday holding up a red-white-and-blue brochure," titled "A New Direction for America." Pelosi "called the manifesto 'a compilation of many of the initiatives taken by our House Democratic Caucus that encompasses our new direction for all Americans.'" It was "a handsome booklet, full of homey photographs and popular proposals, but there was a problem. Democrats have had more 'New Directions' recently than MapQuest." Among the party's "campaign slogans this year: 'Culture of Corruption,' 'Culture of Cronyism,' 'Do-Nothing Congress,' 'Rubber-Stamp Congress,' 'Together, We Can Do Better,' 'Together, America Can Do Better' and, most recently, 'Six for '06.'" For those "keeping score at home, Democrats arrived at 'New Direction' yesterday by downgrading one of the 'Six for '06' issues (health care) and upgrading three others (honesty, civility and fiscal discipline), for a total of eight items on the contents page." Milbank adds, "By contrast, Republicans have settled on a single, unofficial slogan, which essentially says: Vote Democrat and Die. And in politics, scary and scurrilous usually trumps elaborate and earnest -- something Pelosi has experienced firsthand in recent days."

CQ (9/14, Kady) reports Pelosi "has been touting the agenda Democrats would pursue if they win back control of the House. So it was no surprise Thursday when she unveiled a red, white and blue brochure titled 'A New Direction for America.'" Though it "doesn't quite rise to the level of the specific promises House Republicans made in their 1994 'Contract With America,' but it details Democratic ideas on everything from homeland security to global warming." Yet when asked "how Democrats would change House procedures and caucus rules governing seniority, Pelosi clammed up. 'I'm not counting any chickens before they're hatched,' she said. 'Any changes would be considered after the election.'" CQ added another "reason for her reticence might be that Democrats aren't yet in agreement about what kinds of changes need to be made, especially in the area of seniority rules that would govern who gets which chairmanship in a Democratic majority. An internal document recommending a long list of changes has been circulating, but it has not been approved by party leaders."

Fox Poll Finds Bush Approval Rating At 40%. Fox News' Special Report (9/14, Hume) reported, "A new Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll finds 40% approve of President Bush's job performance."
